Moreover, sir, it is not difficult to show that the claim which is set up by the Administration for the necessity of this law is a manufactured thing of their own making, and that whatever necessity seems to exist for this law is really the result of the policy of this Administration. The people of this Union cannot be charged with having created it. They have never refused to support this Government. From the dark dawn of this rebellion, the most dismal hour of our national history, up to this moment the people have ever been true. Even when, groping in ignorance and fear, our leaders failed in council and faltered in the field, and lying here supinely on their backs cried lustily for help, then, sir, the militia rushed to the rescue, cutting their way through every obstacle; doggedly and eagerly they pressed on to save this capital and its archives from the rebel, if such might be, or perish in the common ruin of all that was dear to this nation. From the far West, the East, the South, and the North armed men flocked toward Washington as eagles gather around the eyrie threatened by the spoiler.

The bride at the altar."

* * * * *
"Came as the winds come when Forests are rended;
Came as the waves come when Navies are stranded."

Never before in the history of any people did citizens more readily, resolutely rally to the defense of their rulers. Abandoning every tie and habit of peace, they hastened to the scene of civil strife.

The Army formed at the uprising of the people has fought well and desperately through nearly two years of varying fortune. Its numbers, dwindled from hundreds of thousands to a force still formidable from its strength and discipline, now offers you again its scarred and battle-worn veterans to bear the banner of "Union and victory" against every foe. The same readiness with which the people first enlisted has been frequently manifested since the fall of Sumter. Often and sorely have you tried their fortitude and zeal by the untimely cry of "Wolf! wolf! The enemy are upon us." Nobly and promptly have they responded. The people are therefore innocent. You cannot charge the State authorities with embarrassing the national Government. Such a charge, if true, would unseat Republican Senators, and strike down the leaders of your own party. Nor would the people tolerate their existence in places of power and trust, even if the Administration were blind and bad enough to overlook such treason. Every aid in money, munitions of war, advice, comfort, and men, have been freely given by the whole people, and by the whole body of our rulers in every State not now in rebellion, and the necessity which you claim to have given rise to this draft certainly cannot be laid to their charge. Besides, sir, we have survived the crisis of this conspiracy against the people. If not unscathed, still we are masters of the broad sea and inland waters. We are impregnable on land. Our volunteers and regular Army have won a glorious name under the organization and enrollment established by previous experience to be the best suited to our manners and habits of life. Our foe is driven from many of his chosen strongholds; weakened and hemmed in, he confesses himself crippled. He has ceased the senseless boast of northern subjugation in a starving cry for food and clothing. The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Chase, informs us in cheerful tones that it is a distinguishing characteristic of our financial history of this rebellion that the public credit has steadily improved in the midst of the terrible trial it has brought upon the country. Our foreign relations have long ceased to threaten an armed intervention. Every department of the Government is represented by the members of the Cabinet to be in a thriving and promising condition.

The Executive, assured by his constitutional advisers of the gratifying state of each branch of his Administration, has put forth the capacious antennae of his sagacious mind to feel for peace through an amnesty proclamation. With his usual foresight and seriousness he has begun to prepare the public mind for a speedy end of this war by the olive-branch. Certainly, sir, in view of the present state of the nation as guaranteed to us by the highest authority, we ought not to continue a system of enrolling and calling out the national forces which could only be justified by the most desperate exigencies—a system that promises to become the nursery of a standing army, of a military aristocracy, and perhaps at no very remote day of a military despotism.

As this bill has, however, been introduced for amendment, it is evident that the Administration deem the experiment of the draft not yet fully made, and mean to continue the conscription. On this point they are no doubt resolved, and for very natural reasons: it is a creature of their making, a pet measure for attaining certain advantages held as invaluable by those who aim at centralized power and who wield the patronage of the Army.

But it becomes a paramount duty of every Representative on this floor, who is opposed to an unnecessary increase of administrative patronage at this time, to look narrowly into the course pursued by those in power in regard to this new and costly system of enrollment.

Well, sir, with reference to the point already made, that the only necessity that can be urged by those who foster and call for this bill arose from the policy of this Administration. If this be so, certainly both common sense and the common welfare forbid that the evils consequent to their policy should become law ex necessitate.

Now, sir, in the opinion of a very large and patriotic portion of the American people, "the party in power" never understood, nor do they now understand nor appreciate properly the crisis which came so near overwhelming this Government. They have never learned to know the true motives of earnest and honest opposition, but have in their greed for power grossly and coarsely rioted in the spoils of party. Insolent from excess of strength, the voice of remonstrance from the great heart of the people has been silenced in the jail, by banishment and death. Every name that mean malice could invent or party hate could suggest has been given to the legally chosen representatives of the Democratic party, not only by the press and on the stump, but even here on this floor by members of Congress in what should be courteous debate. Further than this, the almost daily proof of an inherent radical corruption and a mercenary spirit among all branches of this Government has shaken the faith of many in the so much boasted "honesty" of those in power, who set themselves up as sole judges of the necessities and rights of this nation at this time. By an overweening presumption on the one hand, and by a well-feigned or a real ignorance of the deep-seated love for the Union among the people, the Administration has created a necessity for a vigorous violation of the Constitution in every department of the Government, until the usurpations of legislative power by the Executive are as unblushing as the bold outrages committed by this Government previous to the rebellion, and the peculations of Secretary Floyd are dwarfed into insignificance by the reckless robbery of the Treasury by the agents of Mr. Chase.

Sir, it seems to have become a self-evident fact of history that had the authorities been equal to and conversant with their real powers, and had they known and trusted in the true heart of the people, the plea of military necessity could never have been urged with any honesty of purpose. Had the Administration rightly understood the nature of this crisis, they never would have informed the world that this war was to last only a few weeks or a few months, and that nobody was to be hurt. They would not have joked in the face of a devoted people rushing to death at their mad cry of "on to Richmond." They would not have hesitated at the outset to enroll and call out the whole force for the war. They would not have telegraphed over the country to close the enlistments, actually turning men away from joining our Army, while the enemy was threatening Washington. By this unwise course, the current of opinion was turned back, and men were made to believe that all enthusiasm for the public service was a waste of zeal; that no more soldiers were wanted. Thus the chain of sympathy was broken, which, up to that time, had bound the people to our Army as the career of every citizen until an honorable peace should be secured. By this isolation of the citizen from the Army, the Administration found a plausible ground for its present military system. No necessity could be urged for a draft so long as volunteers flocked to the national standard, and the old militia system worked well. Nor could a centralized national power be reared upon the ruins of the rights of the States of this Union without the aid of an armed organization whose initial idea should be implicit obedience to this Administration, whose very existence could be traced to its fostering care, and whose independence of all other influences should be complete.

As this policy began to develop itself enthusiasm cooled and enlistments became few. Suspicion that the real motive under this scheme was or might prove fatal to this Union; that the suppression of the rebellion was not the sincere wish of those in power; that, lost in the Egyptian darkness of a fanatical heresy about the superior worth of citizens of African descent, they were ready to sacrifice all other interests and classes of men to one idea. Freedmen, fresh from slavery, seemed the chief care of this Administration. Such narrow and short-sighted policy checked enlistment and made an increase of bounty, doubling the cost of this war by millions of dollars. An opinion soon fastened itself on the public mind that the old dragon under ground had got possession of some leading spirit of our rulers and filled him with the gift of persuasion over the reason and conscience of men. These peculiar and arbitrary bills looked like a bold stroke for a standing army whose body should be pliant to the will of the loyal league; that the judiciously adjusted patronage should be dispensed through proper committees in Congress; that the pliant head of this military machine should be a movable thing, fitting all the whim-whams of the supreme chief; while its other extremities should be left to the tender mercies of the contractor. The morale of this body was to be left to the care of a select few, all patriots of a certain stripe and color, most honorable men, capable of acting as legislators or as members of the bar, to suit circumstances. As if to confirm these suspicions and fears of the people, the Administration commenced a most undignified persecution of certain major generals personally objectionable to Republican leaders, and unwisely filled the hearts of our soldiers with a distrust of their officers, causing in consequence most disastrous defeats to our arms, and sowing dissension among our troops, until the vigor of our struggle with the enemy of our country and Constitution was weakened by a bitter rivalry among ourselves, until the sickening record of a second Bull Run forced the proud spirit of our people to the verge of despair.

And those who displaced McClellan were fain to shelter themselves in this capital under the genius and courage of an army led by its favorite general. The invader hurled back and the capital safe once more, Antietam was forgotten, and the favorites of the Administration were ordered to the head of our victorious soldiery, only to lead them to defeat and death at Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville. By a course of policy so unwise, ungenerous, and unconstitutional the party in power had apparently labored to alienate the people from sympathy and enthusiasm for the increase of the Army. By a happy coincidence everything planned to discourage volunteering has resulted in a return to that system as the cheapest and most consistent with our national character. When the pet measures of the draft, negro enlistment, and a Provost Marshal's Bureau were forced on the country, we were promised great things. Immense levies and large subsidies were to be the result. Public expectation was raised to the highest pitch, and private responsibility reduced to an equivalent in dollars and cents. Anybody could be a hero for $300. When lo! the armies were still un replenished, the coffers of the Treasury still subject to the visitations of the Secretary of War and his subordinates. Commutation money, the promised talisman by which blood was to be turned to gold, failed to work its charm. The gold was as the hid treasure of the pirate Captain Kidd, sought for in vain by the uninitiated, and spoken of in secret and with reverence by the knowing ones. Bounty continued to increase, the ranks were not filled, and enrollment by draft was far behind the demands of the service.

But the great and crowning testimony of the utter failure of the conscription act is found in the President's proclamation of the 17th of October last. By a stretch of power, before almost unequalled by even this reckless Administration, the public credit was pledged, without sanction of Congress, in the sum of over one hundred and five million dollars, calling for three hundred thousand more men at the rate of $300 for new recruits, and $400 for veterans who should enlist after that date without limit of time. In the blindness of a reckless spirit, our rulers appear not to have seen, or seeing did not care, what wholesale proof they were putting before the world in favor of the old constitutional militia and volunteer system: proving incontestably on the statistical tables of the exchequer that the draft was a failure; that to escape from its snare and delusion even national bankruptcy should be risked, and the sacred limits of the Constitution trampled under foot by the Executive. The people were kept ignorant of the fearful cost to the Constitution by which freedom from this conscript law had been secured: a thrill of satisfaction at this much desired result ran through the whole nation. Nearly every local newspaper is congratulating its readers that since Congress has gone back to the militia and volunteer system laid down in the Constitution, and are encouraging men to enlist by bounty, the fear of and necessity for a draft have ceased. Judging from the events of the past year we have had many and timely tokens that the genius of the American people clings to the hallowed associations which cluster around the Constitution. That protecting genius seems now to beckon us back from the wayward and perilous path of military enthusiasm to the sober consideration of right and justice. With a warning hand on the history of this law, she points to a future fraught with danger to the Constitution.

The failure of the draft to procure the necessary force to recruit our armies furnished the pretext to the President to violate the Constitution by pledging the public credit without due authority from Congress. He seized the sword under the specious plea of military necessity. He then cut the purse of the public with the point of that keen and convenient instrument of usurpation and tyranny. By this bold assumption of unconstitutional power over the destiny of the Army, the President has given a happy and well-timed pledge to the military element of this country that he alone, unaided, and untrammelled by constitutions or by oaths, stands ready to carry on the Government.

There seems no further need of Congress to check executive power. A general order from the War Department, or a Janus-faced proclamation from the White House, disposes of every question. When the habeas corpus act was violated; when the personal liberty of the citizen was violated; when the sacredness of the ballot was violated by armed men; when the right of free speech was violated, the Administration party cried traitor on all who dared denounce those treasonable violations of the Constitution. Are you still so blind, so insatuated, so mad with party zeal, that you are ready to applaud this last act of reckless violation of your own constitutional powers by the Commander-in-Chief? Do you not see the gradual encroachment upon every constitutional privilege and right closing around you slowly but with relentless purpose?

Are you true to the interests of the people and to the honor and welfare of this nation? Are you faithful to your oath to support the Constitution in submitting to these encroachments by the Executive? While you have yet the power to resist repeal this conscript law, a link in the chain being forged for your humiliation.

Repeat this law. It is unnecessary, a failure, and obnoxious to the best feelings of our people. An effort should now be made to strike it from our statutes. It is an insult to the masses of this country, who are justly proud of all they have done and suffered in this struggle for free government as embodied in this Union. By every voluntary sacrifice they stand ready, I firmly believe, to offer up all they have on earth save honor and independence in the cause of their country. They have proved this by many and unmistakable tokens, in spite of defeat, of sickness, of treachery, of future poverty to themselves; in spite of administrative corruption, of the waste of public money, and of the sacrifice of human life. The first instinct of every people is to preserve its national existence, in glory if it may, in sorrow if it must.

Sir, history is filled with outrages consequent upon an effort of the ruling class to force obnoxious laws upon the people. England has become wiser since the Boston tea-party, and unpopular laws are not now forced upon her subjects. Let the lesson of experience not be lost on us.

That this conscript law is obnoxious to the people of many parts of that section of this country faithful to the Constitution needs no proof here. The Administration needs no testimony to establish that fact. The past few months have been full of pregnant warning. The rage of the mob has been heard in our cities, and order has been restored only by armed force, at great cost of money and blood. No one deprecates the recent riots more than myself. I have no sympathy with such deeds of violence and inhumanity. But, sir, the terrible fact of armed resistance to the laws of this Union by an infuriated mob demands a calm and thorough examination by the law-making power. It is our duty, it should be our zealous desire to remove all causes of public disturbance from our midst at this time. The voice of the people has prophetic power; and in stormy times like these wise men seek to interpret its dark sayings. When that voice uttered in madness surges up from the depths of human society it seems to call on those to help who can the desperate and lost, as a signal gun booms forth at sea its dismal cry for rescue.

But, sir, danger besets us on every side. The wild deeds of a disorganized rabble cannot overthrow, although it may disturb this Government; it is too strongly rooted in the hearts of the people. Our real danger comes from the encroachments of the Executive upon legislative power. Whenever the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy assumes the power of the sword and purse, then, sir, we have cause to begin to tremble for the existence of our independence. He and his Army can plant a phalanx of mercenary bayonets around the citadel of the Constitution. Then this Union must perish and leave the spirit of representative liberty in duress here, it may be forever.

Sir, consistently with the views which I have just laid before this committee, I shall at the proper time move to recommit the whole subject to the Military Committee, with instructions to amend the House and Senate bills so as to strike out all that refers to a draft, and report a new bill which shall provide, first, for enrolling the names of all persons liable to military duty in the United States; second, for arresting deserters and preventing desertion.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I do not pretend to be the most devotional of men, but I do most profoundly thank God that this Government at this hour of its solicitude has not to rest for its support upon such patriotism as has been exhibited in the language uttered by the gentleman who has just taken his seat. I do not even claim to be a party man. I am here in this House as the representative of no party, declining even to take a party nomination. I came here in the character of an American citizen, and stand at all times and in all emergencies by the Constitution and the country. I came here to support the Administration in the prosecution of this war for the suppression of rebellion, and in the suppression of treason whether it be abroad or at home.

This is a free Government, and the gentleman [Mr. CHANLER] may thank God that it is a free Government. The sentiments he has uttered here to-day against the power of conscription he could not utter in the halls at Richmond as a confederate representative without being sent to the gallows. He talks about the merciless disposition of this Government, and the abuse of power by the Administration. Has the gentleman any sympathy with that other government which is now conscripting without reference to age or condition? Has he, in all the anathemas which he has heaped upon this Government and Administration, uttered one word of reproach for that act of tyranny which is now being enforced throughout the southern States, by which even a man who has paid his commutation money is no longer exempt from the power of the conscription?

I regret most seriously that necessity compels me to use language of this character, but when I hear such sentiments uttered as I have listened to to-day I will use it, because I believe it to be my duty. This Government is attacked for an arbitrary use of power, for a violation of the Constitution, and we are told that this conscription law is itself unconstitutional; that it interferes with the constitutional and vested rights of the States, through whose instrumentality alone such a conscription should be enforced in calling soldiers into the service. I deny the proposition. I assert that this is a sovereign and supreme Government, and that it has power over every acre of the public domain to enforce the conscription, if the duty of self-protection renders it necessary.

Let me ask you, before I turn to the Constitution to see what powers it confers, in what position would this Government be to protect itself if the ruling authorities of the State governments held such opinions and entertained such feelings as the gentleman has expressed who immediately preceded me?

Mr. CHANLER. I desire to say to the gentleman, as he is pointing to me, that I desire he shall speak so loud that I can hear him, if he is making any personal remarks in regard to myself. It would afford infinite satisfaction to me to know what he is saying, though I shall not interrupt him to reply at present.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I referred to the gentleman's charge that this Administration were guilty of palpable interference with the rights of the States in passing such a law of conscription as this. You said that the President was guilty of an abuse of executive power in making arbitrary arrests. You charge the President with centralizing the powers of this Government in derogation of the rights of the States and of the citizen. I rise to deny it. I have said, sir, that the position of this Government would be most unfortunate if it were left to call upon the States when gentlemen holding positions and opinions such as have been expressed here held control of the governments of those States. Under the Constitution, sir, we either have or have not a right to enforce the power of the Government over every State in calling upon it for troops to defend the Government. What is our power in the rebel States to-day? We claim that they are under the Constitution. The gentleman claims that they never have been out. How effective would be a call upon the Governor of South Carolina, or of North Carolina, or of any other rebel State, to raise troops for the defense of this Union?

Again, sir, I believe that the Constitution, as I construe it, expressly prohibits any State from raising troops except in certain contingencies save in obedience to the call of the General Government. And now, sir, cannot the Government do directly of its own volition and action what it may do by an agency? The whole question hinges upon the sovereignty of the States or the sovereignty of the Government. When I look to the Constitution of my country I find that it clothes the Government with every attribute of sovereignty; that it gives every power necessary to suppress this rebellion, and to make all laws which shall be essential to that end. It gives it power to declare war, to grant letters of marque and reprisal, to raise and support armies, to provide and maintain a navy, to make rules for the government and regulations of the land and naval forces, and it restricts every State in this Union from the exercise of every one of these powers, showing that the sovereignty is in the General Government, and not in the individual States.

But this is not the time for an elaborate argument on the constitutional powers of the General Government, and on those powers which, by its terms for local and social and not national purposes, are reserved to the States or the people.

I will only say that under the Constitution I can recognize, I can find, no sovereignty save that of the American Union, to which every State is subordinated in all affairs of national concernment.

I have heard arguments before made against conscription; I have heard that conscription is unconstitutional; and yet, sir, when a proposition was before the country to fill up our armies by volunteering, these same men who are now charging conscription to be unconstitutional, were saying that the only way to do equal justice was to enforce a conscription, and not to rely upon volunteering.

Now, sir, I do not know that so far as the gentleman or his particular friends and those who sympathize with him are concerned, this conscription act is to interfere with any evidences of their patriotic disposition. It does not prohibit him or any one else from going into the Army as a volunteer. The ranks are open, and all those who sympathize with him in his sentiments are welcome to go in and to array themselves in support of the country against its enemies. I have heard these arguments before, and the moment that the Government enacted the conscription law, that moment the argument was changed, and they said that volunteering was the only true way of raising troops to support the Government; and then the charge was made that the conscription act, which they before recommended, was utterly and entirely unconstitutional.

Now, sir, it is unfortunate indeed that the Representative of a district in New York city should be in favor of volunteering when all his constituents are opposed to enlistment; it is exceedingly unfortunate. If that were the disposition through the whole country, I doubt whether our armies would be filled very speedily. There is one thing to which I have made up my mind, and that is, that this rebellion is to be put down, and that it is to be put down notwithstanding the menaces which may be made on the other side, and notwithstanding all the opposition of rebels in arms. This Government is of too great value to be sacrificed for political purposes. When the gentleman alluded to the response which the people of this country made to the first call upon them after the fall of Sumter, he forgot that it was an expression of the popular feeling, that Democrats and all other citizens of this country came forward as one man to the support of the Government, except the political leaders; and it was only when the political leaders counseled together to see what was to be the result of this expression of patriotism upon party power that you saw the patriotism of many who had been ranked with the Democratic party waning away.

I well remember, sir, that those who favored a prosecution of this war without reference to party called a convention to be held in the city where I reside on the same day for which the Democratic party of New York called their convention, and they did it for the purpose of proposing a prosecution of the war for the country without reference to parties. And yet, sir, party leaders defeated that proposition, and we have the result of their action in the character of some of the Representatives who have been returned here from the State of New York. I thank God that there are men from my own State, sitting on the other side of this Chamber, who have been Democrats, who are Democrats now, but who are as true and loyal to the Government as I am, who are prepared to stand by it in emergencies, and who, although differing with me in some political views, are true to the Union and to the country. You will find them so. I have taken occasion elsewhere, in speaking in public of the elections in New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, to claim the results not as the triumphs of a political party but as the triumphs of the American people determined to support this Government, the triumphs of patriotic and Union men without reference to party.

But there is, unfortunately, another class which has never been able to withdraw itself from party influence, whose affiliations with party views have been so strong that patriotism is lost and ignored, and every interest of the country subordinated to the interest of political partisanship. For such men I have no sympathy and no respect.

This Government, Mr. Chairman, is charged with doing great injustice by means of arbitrary arrests. I deny the charge. I doubt not that in some of the numerous cases where that power has been exercised, injustice may have been done. But I tell you that if full justice had been done many a man who is now abroad at liberty would have been looking out upon the fields of the country through the bars of some prison, or studying the beauties of New York harbor through the port-holes of Fort La Fayette. I do not know but that the sufferings of men who have been under the operation of military arrests may have been suggested to the gentleman from New York by some individual member near him who has had a personal experience of its effects. Where has the power of the Government been exercised for the purpose of doing wrong to any man? I deny that the President, the Secretary of State, or any other man connected with the Government has, for personal or for party reasons, sent any person to prison or placed him under arrest. When a man has suffered in this way it has only been because he was considered and believed, upon reliable or at least prima facie evidence, to be a public enemy, sympathizing with rebellion and treason, and plotting the ruin of his country.

Now, I hold that every man within the jurisdiction of the Government, who claims its protection for his person and property, is bound to loyalty to that Government and fidelity to its laws, and is restricted either from communicating with its enemies or doing anything for their aid and comfort. No, sir; this Government has exercised no power except for the constitutional purpose of preserving its own existence. That it has a right to preserve that existence I find not only in the Constitution, but I find it as the inherent power of every Government. It is incidental to it. It is a right higher than the Constitution. It springs from the first law of nature, which gives to every creature the right of using his own powers for the protection of his own life. Even those who talk treason and who sympathize with treason in this hour and in this presence have that same right of self-protection.

The gentleman informs us that he regrets exceedingly the violence which occurred in the city of New York, denominated the New York riots. I have no doubt that many men who sympathize in the sentiments which led to those riots, and the expression of which sentiments precipitated and forced them on, do regret it; and some of them may express opinions now which are but the evidence not of original opposition but of subsequent repentance. I was in that city when the riots occurred, and I found to my astonishment that a person clothed with high authority in the suppression of the riots by the civil authorities of the State of New York was a celebrated individual who had declared at the outset of this rebellion that he would, if necessary, raise a regiment within that city, and march to the South for the purpose of aiding the rebels against this Government.

I regret those riots as much as the gentleman does, but I tell you they came because politicians prepared the way for them by anathemas against the Government, by charging the Government with the abuse of power and with an attempt to centralize the authority and power of the Government and subvert the Constitution. I believe that the leaders who proclaimed these sentiments knew better, and knew that the sole object of the Government was, under the Constitution, so far as in its power, to perform that duty which the Constitution imposed upon it, for suppressing the rebellion and protecting the liberties of the people.

Mr. Chairman, this conscription act, I trust, will be amended. It is no new process; we are but modifying an existing law. We are attempting here to adjust it to the wants and the circumstances of the country, to do equal justice to all men irrespective of party; and although if that conscription were enforced it might perhaps affect some of the constituents of the gentleman, who, like him, have no sympathy here with the Government, in their personal rights, and may force them to the ranks of our armies, it will be but placing them in my judgment where they should be placed, and where they would never go except by force of public law.

I deny the right of any man upon this floor or elsewhere to say that every citizen of this country is not bound in his person and by the use of all of his property, if necessary, to protect and sustain this Government. And if it be necessary to resort to conscription, let it come. If increased taxation be necessary, let it come. Let us submit to all sacrifices. Let us even, if necessary, drive out from among us those who, faithless to their country, are loyal only to its enemies.

Let us do full justice to the present, and let us retain for coming ages that glorious inheritance which has been guaranteed to us by our fathers. We shall do it. It requires but the united effort of all loyal citizens, the subordination of all party attachments, and the firm resolve that whatever we possess of material wealth, of intellectual power, or of physical vigor, shall be freely offered in the national cause to preserve our country in the unity of its empire and the beneficence of its institutions.

War is to be regretted. Its evils are multiform; and yet though life must be sacrificed, though onerous public burdens must be borne, we must submit to all like patriots, determined to protect our liberties from the machinations of men who feel sympathy only with rebels and with treason.

Mr. Chairman, in this struggle liberty is to triumph, and the country is not to be divided; its physical conformation forbids it. The interests of the human race forbid that the tide of civilization and of freedom should be rolled back for two hundred years by the indorsement upon this floor and the prevalence through the country of the sentiments uttered here to-day for the encouragement of rebellion.

This Union will be preserved for free labor and free men. The power of that social institution which inaugurated the rebellion for its aggrandizement and extension, and which still seeks to exert its influence here through political sympathy and political organization, has lost its hold upon every loyal citizen. The day of grace has been sinned away in the commission of crimes against the Union, the laws, and the human race, and by the irreversible decree of the American people it must be destroyed.

I wish, Mr. Chairman, that we might never again have uttered on the floor of this House a speech which is only worthy of being printed by order of the rebel congress.

Mr. YEAMAN obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. ANDERSON, who said: I rise for the purpose of personal explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. By a vote of the House this bill has been made a special order, and nothing that does not pertain to it can be discussed except by consent of the committee. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Kentucky will be permitted to make a personal explanation.

No objection was made.

Mr. ANDERSON. While absent last week, confined to my room by sickness, a member of the House with whom I am totally unacquainted, Mr. W. J. ALLEN, of the State of Illinois, made a speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will understand that it is in violation of the rules of the House to call members by name in debate.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman from Illinois, then, I should say, made a speech which I find published in the Congressional Globe of the 26th, in which I find the following language used in reference to myself. In speaking he says:

"With a cruelty quickened by public exposure, with his avarice stimulated by the success of former pillaging, and with a slavish subserviency to those whose motives he denounced for many years of his life, he is turned loose upon a rebellious people, who, whatever their sins may be, are at least sincere in regarding him as a monster. And when a few days ago a member from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] submitted a resolution calling for a committee to inquire into his conduct, the Republican members of this House, aided by one of the President's military appointees from Kentucky, [Mr. ANDERSON,] voted to suppress the investigation; and it was suppressed."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am totally unacquainted with the gentleman from Illinois, and why it is that he went outside of the legitimate sphere of his action to make this attack upon me I am unable to state; but I will inform the gentleman to-day that that statement in reference to myself is false and slanderous, without any foundation in fact.

I will further inform the gentleman that I was elected by as true, unflinching, sturdy Union men as breathe upon the continent of America; not professed Union men, but Union men who have been tried by the fires of persecution, Union men who have come out of this rebellion with unspotted garments, without the smell of treason upon them, Union men who have been robbed and plundered, who have been imprisoned, Union men who have been hunted with hell-hound ferocity by the rebels in arms against this Government, and who seem to have an apologist upon this floor to-day in the person of the gentleman from Illinois.

In reference to my election he must have known, because he lives in an adjoining district, how it was conducted. He knows that in January, 1862, the rebel sympathizers in that congressional district went to the ballot-box, voted and sent a member to represent that district in the so-called southern confederacy at Richmond. That was in January, 1862. The Union men took no part in that election, which they regarded as treasonable. They regarded it as a violation of the law and precedent. In 1863, when the election came on in that congressional district to send a Representative to the Congress of the United States, those men who had gone to the ballot-box in 1862 went to vote to send a rebel and traitor to the Congress of the United States, but they were prevented from voting, and therefore the Union men there have secured the indignation of the gentleman from Illinois. They were denounced simply because those rebels and traitors were not permitted to go to the ballot-box side by side with the Union men.

The gentleman from Illinois has the audacity to stand up in the Congress of the United States and say that I have been appointed by the President of the United States. Mr. Chairman, I will inform the gentleman from Illinois and the world that the election as conducted in my congressional district has been decided by the supreme court of the State of Kentucky to have been in accordance with the constitution and laws of that State. At the last August election in that district the Union man run for the office of county clerk was opposed by a rebel sympathizer, a man with the oath upon his conscience and treason in his heart and perjury upon his soul. The unconditional Union man was elected, but a traitorous county judge refused to qualify him and appointed another man in the place of this man who was regularly elected. Suit was brought, and the judge decided that the Union man was not elected. He took the case up to the higher court, and on the 25th of last month, while the gentleman from Illinois was howling his denunciations, that court decided that the Union man was entitled to the office.

One word further. The gentleman from Illinois pretends to be the friend of Union men in the border States. He makes the declaration that he is an unconditional Union man. If it had not been for that declaration, made over and over again by the gentleman in his speech, I would have thought that it was one made in the so-called confederate congress at Richmond. [Laughter.] He denounces the proclamation of the President of the United States of 8th December last, as applicable to the Union men. Do you find any Union men in the border States denouncing the President of the United States for that proclamation? No, sir. But not satisfied with denouncing Union men in my district, he goes further, and denounces men like Andrew Johnson, Brownlow, and Maynard, of Tennessee, and Hamilton, of Texas. Why, sir, they stand in patriotism and in loyalty as far above the gentleman from Illinois as heaven is above hell. [Laughter.] Andrew Johnson needs no defense from me; Maynard and Brownlow need none; Hamilton needs none. Their acts will live in the memory of the American people when the gentleman's name will go down to posterity "unwept, unhonored, and unsung."

There are other things I should like to reply to, if the committee will permit me. [Cries from the Republican side of the House of "Go on! Go on!"]

Mr. Chairman, from the commencement to the end of the gentleman's speech there is nothing but denunciation after denunciation poured upon the men who are to-day controlling the destinies of this Government. He says the President has raised an army by fraud, that he has obtained soldiers under the false pretense that they were to crush the rebellion and to maintain the Constitution and the laws. He asserts that the President and the Congress of the United States have changed the character of the war, and that they are now endeavoring to subvert the liberties of the American people. Why, does not the gentleman know that in his own State the very men upon whom he says that fraud has been practiced, that these old veteran regiments are again enlisting in this war? These men who, he says, were defrauded in their first enlistments are reenlisting—twenty-five regiments from Illinois in one day. Those men who have borne the heat and burdens of the conflict with armed rebels and traitors were again enlisting when the gentleman from Illinois was talking about the great Democratic party. [Laughter.] They are reenlisting East, West, North, and South; and I tell the gentleman that the American people can crush this rebellion of armed traitors, and when these soldiers return it may be they intend to crush out the disloyal men who have been vilifying them when they were fighting the battles of the Republic.

The gentleman says that there are one hundred thousand traitors in the North, and that there are many of them in this House. If that be the fact, why does he not move to expel them? Now, to show that the gentleman is not acting in good faith, let me say that the gentleman from Kentucky, from the Covington district, [Mr. SMITH,] offered a resolution in this House since the commencement of this session in which it was declared that there were but two parties in this country, patriots and traitors, and the gentleman from Illinois voted on that resolution in the negative. Why did the gentleman vote against that resolution when he had just before made the declaration in this House that the House was filled with men who are as base traitors as Jefferson Davis? To what is his vote attributable? Simply to the fact that the gentleman knew that the resolution struck him as one of the parties to which it referred.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that his colleague introduced a resolution into this House, declaring that there were but two parties in this House, patriots and traitors, and that I voted against it?

Mr. ANDERSON. I said that such was my recollection.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. Your recollection is sadly at fault.

Mr. ANDERSON. Then I stand corrected. One other thing I have to say. But before that, let me ask the gentleman if he voted for that resolution.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. I do not know what you are referring to.

Mr. ANDERSON. To the resolution offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, from the Covington district, on the 17th of December last. I find on referring to the Globe of that date that Mr. SMITH introduced the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That as our country and the very existence of the best Government ever instituted by men, are imperiled by the most senseless and wicked rebellion that the world has seen, and believing, as we do, that the only hope of saving this country and preserving this Government is by the power of the sword, we are for the most vigorous prosecution of the war until the Constitution and laws shall be enforced and obeyed in all parts of the United States; and to that end we oppose any armistice, or intervention, or mediation, or proposition for peace, from any quarter, so long as there shall be found a rebel in arms against the Government; and we ignore all party names, lines, and issues, and recognize but two parties in this war, patriots and traitors."

"Resolved, That we hold it to be the duty of Congress to pass all necessary bills to supply men and money, and the duty of the people to render every aid in their power to the constituted authorities of the Government in the crushing out of the rebellion, and in bringing the leaders thereof to condign punishment."

"Resolved, That our thanks are tendered to our soldiers in the field for their gallantry in defending and upholding the flag of the Union, and defending the great principles dear to every American patriot."

And among the negative votes on that resolution I find the name of the gentleman from the State of Illinois, [Mr. W. J. ALLEN.] What I stated before was upon information; and now I state it from the record. On the 17th of December, 1863, the gentleman votes, under the sanction of an oath, that the parties are not divided in this war into patriots and traitors.

Again, in a speech made on the 26th day of January last, the gentleman said that this House was filled with traitors, and yet the gentleman's act and conduct do not correspond with that declaration. Further, the gentleman said:

"The soldiers who volunteered for the sole purpose of putting down rebellion and vindicating the law are often forced to march among the women and children of the South, who are too often insulted and plundered by the bad spirit and pillaging propensity which seems to enter so largely into the policy upon which this war is to be conducted; and they who impatiently listened for the airs and anthems which once told of union and nationality, often hear only from negro soldiers doggerel praises of John Brown and his murderous crew. The uniform which is the badge of a gentleman and the ensign of honor is worn now by depraved negroes whose instincts are almost as low and brutal as those at whose instance the profession of arms has been disgraced."

The gentleman charges that the armies of this Government are sent South for the purpose of pillaging and robbing the women and children.

The gentleman further says in his speech:

"Jefferson Davis and his adherents who sought to destroy the Union by dismemberment are traitors to the Constitution; but they were bold enough to avow their purposes, to appeal to the sword, and risk the dreadful consequences of their crimes. Their followers may have been wicked or misguided, but they have made the issue boldly, and have so far met the consequences like brave and fearless men."

Yes, the followers of Jeff. Davis and his crew may have been wicked, in the gentleman's estimation, but the soldiers of the United States Government are robbers; but the former "made the issue boldly, and have so far met the consequences like brave and fearless men."

Nobody knew better than the gentleman from Illinois that the soldiers of Jeff. Davis, as they are called, the men in armed rebellion against this Government, not more than one month before the assembling of this Congress, invaded that portion of Kentucky adjoining his district. The gentleman must have known that fact. He knew that they robbed and plundered by wholesale almost every Union man in that district. He knew that they destroyed the railroad leading from Paducah to Mayfield. He knew that they fired into a train of cars as it was running, filled with innocent women and children. Yet no denunciation falls from his patriotic lips against those men; but the soldiers of this Republic, the men who have bared their bosoms to the thickest of the fight, and carried the flag of the Union down into the rebel States, he denounces as robbers and thieves. He says nothing against Jeff. Davis and his thieving gang, who are no less than murderers and robbers.

I said I was unacquainted with the gentleman from Illinois. I never have been introduced to him; but from reading his speech, if the declaration were not in it that he was an unconditional Union man I would not believe he was a Union man. I should take him to be one of those men who live in my country—Union men, but constitutional Union men. They are Union men, but they would not violate the Constitution by the further prosecution of this war.

I will ask the gentleman one question, if he has no objection. I see in the proceedings of a meeting held by this great Democratic party at Springfield, Illinois, on the 17th of June last, the following resolution was passed:

"Resolved, That the further offensive prosecution of the war tends to subvert the Constitution and Government, and entail upon the nation all the disastrous consequences of misrule and anarchy; that we are in favor of peace upon the basis of the restoration of the Union, and for the accomplishment of which we propose a national convention to settle upon terms of peace, which shall have in view the restoration of the Union as it was, and securing by constitutional amendments such rights to the several States and the people thereof as honor and justice demand."

I ask the gentleman whether he voted to adopt that resolution? [A pause.] Oh, come now, do not be bashful. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do, sir; I want him to answer the question.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. I decline to answer it now.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman from Illinois is called, but there is no response.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is no question but that there are two parties in this country: the men who are for crushing this rebellion by the strong arm of the Federal Government and who are willing to bring all the power of the Government to bear upon this rebellion, and the men who are opposed to that. The gentleman from Illinois refuses to respond to the inquiry whether he indorses a resolution adopted at one of his great Democratic meetings in 1863; he refuses to say whether he does or does not. Sir, I repeat there are two parties in this country: the men who are for this Government and those who are against it.

A man whom I delighted to honor in 1860 made the same declaration. I refer to Stephen A. Douglas, of Illinois, for whom I voted for President. In the last speech that he ever delivered he said there were two parties, patriots and traitors; and it is true to-day, and every man must take his side.

But, sir, the Union men coming from the district that I do, having been persecuted and hunted down by these fiends in human shape, as I have been because I would not turn traitor to my country, being assaulted in the manner that I have been, and having unjust and unfounded insinuations made against them, and that too by an "unconditional Union man," I thought that it would be unjust to myself and unjust to the people I represent to submit silently to the imputation and not hurl it back into the teeth of the gentleman and tell him that it is false and untrue.

Now, sir, the armies of the Government are going to crush out this rebellion; the supremacy of constitutional law will be upheld and maintained; the rebellion will be put down; and when it is, then gentle peace will return to the homes and firesides of this our once glorious and happy country. And when the soldiers of the Republic return, war-scarred, worn-down veterans as they are, to their homes and firesides and find that men have been engaged in persecuting and denouncing them while they have been facing armed traitors, then it is that the gentleman from Illinois may look for his doom, because these soldiers will sink him so low, in an infamy so profound, in damnation so deep, that the hand of resurrection will never reach him.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the committee, I desire to make a very few observations in justice to myself, and not in the light of a reply to what has fallen from the member from Kentucky.

In his personal explanation, the member has exhibited sufficient courageousness to say upon this floor that I have made false accusations against him and have placed him in a false position. I perhaps ought to apologize to the House and to the country that so much time should have been consumed about so unimportant a matter, and if I had known that it would have taxed the people to the extent that it has, the member's name would never have escaped my lips or appeared in my printed speech. But, sir, I could not foresee what was to follow. I charged, he says, that he is one of the military appointees of the President. He says he is not. He says he is not acquainted with me. I am in the same condition with regard to him. The charge I made he says is not true. I reiterate it; I say it is true. I am very well acquainted with the gentleman who opposed the member from Kentucky, the Hon. Mr. Trimble, of Paducah, and I am aware of the fact that that opponent of the gentleman was under military arrest until after the election. Does the member dare deny that? Does he dare to deny that it was for the sole reason that he was a candidate in opposition to the member that he was imprisoned, and that the day after the election he was liberated without any charge being brought against him or any proceedings had in reference to trial or punishment?

Mr. ANDERSON. Allow me to explain.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. Do you deny the charges?

Mr. ANDERSON. I want to explain.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. Well, you can explain after I am through.

Mr. ANDERSON. I will explain afterwards.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. I decline to yield to the member now. I have stated the facts. I have them from the mouth of Judge Trimble himself, and from other gentlemen whose character and veracity stand infinitely higher with all men who know them than the member from Kentucky; men whose loyalty was never questioned, men whose integrity is above suspicion, men whose moral character is above reproach. He says that the Union people of southern Kentucky elected him. The Union people! The bayonets were the Union people that elected him. To be sure, he may have received some Union votes; but, Mr. Chairman, do you not recollect, is it not a fact with which every member of this House is conversant, that the order of General Hurlbut, issued at Memphis, went over to and was in force in Kentucky at the very time the election occurred? It is a fact in our public history. Those who were allowed to vote had to do so in accordance with that order, and not otherwise.

The remark has fallen from the lips of the member from Kentucky that he thinks I would make a good representative down with Jefferson Davis, and that we ought to abuse Jefferson Davis a good deal more than we do. I have heard such contemptible twaddle from similar sources before. Let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, that the length and breadth and height and depth of the Unionism of many men, of that member's professions, consist in the abuse of Jefferson Davis to a much greater extent than in love for the Union and in reverence for the Constitution of the country. It is there that they have to go for the record of their Unionism. I have nothing to say in regard to my own. I have entertained but one view with reference to this war from its inception to the present moment. That view has been made known to my constituents from the very time of the commencement of hostilities, and I am here, by a free, untrammelled vote, backed up by a majority of more than six thousand voters of my district—given at a time, too, when such men as the member from Kentucky were harping about my having secession sympathies. I have nothing but the most sovereign and profound contempt for any such slang coming from any such quarter.

But, sir, I am threatened by the member from Kentucky with the vengeance of the soldiers; and in regard to that I desire to make this remark, so that the country may understand it. He says that I have charged the soldiers with being robbers. Mr. Chairman, were any man of standing or character to make such a remark as that I should not content myself with denouncing it as false, absolutely false. As it is, I will not even put myself to that trouble. The remark which I made, and which the member from Kentucky read here, was that the spirit which entered into the conduct and policy of this war made the soldier do many things and offer insults which that honest and brave soldier would instinctively have shrunk from if left to act upon his own impulses or ideas of right. That is the reading, the text, the language, the spirit of what I said; and the member from Kentucky has not criminal ingenuity enough, whatever other qualities in that direction he may possess, to make my remarks bear any other interpretation. I honor the soldier. I honor the man who went forward for the purpose of putting down this rebellion. I honor the soldier and I honor the officer who obeys orders looking to the restoration of the Union and the putting down of the rebellion. I have said so everywhere. I say so to-day. I am not afraid to trust the honest soldier. He cannot be deceived by such falsehoods as we have just listened to. I have talked with him in camp, talked with him when he was at home on furlough, and I understand him and he understands me. I may be allowed to say that the district which I represent has sent a larger percentage of men to the war than any other district in Illinois, though perhaps not so large as has been sent by the Union people of the southern district of Kentucky, which the member claims to represent! It may be that down there in that Union-loving region, in that region of Union men—a sample of whom we have had an exhibition of to-day on this floor—a larger proportion of the population has gone forward to aid in putting down the rebellion than has gone from my portion of the State; but I would like to see the evidence of it.

He says that the people of his district had the right to elect anybody they chose to represent them in Congress. I have not had the opportunity of seeing the returns from that district lately. It would be somewhat curious to see how many votes the member received, although his chief competitor was held in bonds, surrounded by a guard. The member himself knows something about the surveillance of guards, for I believe that he has had some experience of the kind, and that it is to the good offices of a system of exchange he owes the opportunity of being able to circulate freely in this Hall to-day and manifest his base subserviency to his masters and his contempt for the popular will of his district.

Now, sir, it is well known in my section of the State—for I represent a district running down the Ohio, from the mouth of the Wabash to Cairo—it is well known that the election in Kentucky was a mere farce; everybody so speaks of it, especially in that Union portion of Kentucky the member hails from.

Again, he asks me upon this floor if I indorse a certain resolution passed by a convention held at Springfield. Well, I do not exactly know what business he has to ask me any such question, but if anybody else, any respectable gentleman seeks to know my views about this matter, or anybody, however small, of respectable gentlemen, I hope he or they will select some other organ than the member who has spoken this afternoon. I cannot see for the life of me what particular interest that member has to know my views, and I take it for granted, out of respect for the opposite portion of the House, that the inquiry originated with himself; certainly he could not have been appointed by any respectable body of men as their medium for obtaining the information.

Now, sir, he asks me in reference to the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. SMITH,] whom I most pleasurably speak of as being a gentleman.

Well, sir, I will be frank and candid with respect to this matter. I think there are more than two parties in this country. I think there are men who do not belong to either one of the two parties mentioned in the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. SMITH.] The great Democratic party, with which I am proud to act, I believe is the great Union party of patriots, and I am unwilling to believe that all those who are opposed to it upon the other side of the House are traitors. [Laughter.] I cannot believe any such thing as that. There may be a sprinkling and a pretty large sprinkling of them who are really good Union men and good patriots, and I would not like, therefore, with my views of patriotism, to vote any such thing as that, or place them in the company of the member from Kentucky, [Mr. ANDERSON.] I do not include—I wish it to be distinctly understood—by any means in that list the member who has just spoken.

Now, sir, one other remark in reference to a matter personal to myself, and I have done. It was least in my thought a few minutes ago that this attack was to be made upon me. I was sitting quietly at my desk writing a letter, and one of the very best character, [laughter,] when my attention was arrested by the remarks of the member from Kentucky, and I felt it due to myself to notice them as I have done. I will add that whenever gentlemen in this House think proper to characterize the views that I entertain of this Administration and its policy as tainted with secession, I hurl back such puerile insinuations as absolutely false.

I am an unconditional Union man. I believe, as I have always said, that the rebellion was unauthorized by the Constitution, and that the Constitution vested the Government with power to put it down. I am willing to sustain the Government in the execution of that duty which devolves upon it by the Constitution. I am willing to give it all the constitutional aid necessary for that purpose, and I believe the Constitution gives the Government all the support, power, and authority necessary to accomplish it.

The member says that I characterized that portion of the House among which he seeks to affiliate as not being Union men. I do, sir, and whether the member falls in that category is perhaps not important now to consider. I know that many of the members on that side of the House with whom he seems disposed to consort have avowed upon this floor that they would not have the Union restored as it was; that they would have no union with slavery; that they were sick and tired of this talk about "the Union as it was and the Constitution as it is." Sir, I say here in my place that any man who entertains such sentiments at this critical juncture in the affairs of the nation is in my opinion an enemy to the best, the highest, and the dearest interests of the Government.

The Democratic party to which I belong stand pledged to restore to the Union the States that have endeavored to get out of it, with all their constitutional rights unimpaired.

I must be pardoned for still one other remark, in justice to one who was the friend of my youth and the pride of the nation. Sir, I do not like to hear sacrilegious mouths talking about Stephen A. Douglas. I do not like to hear those whose characters are as far removed from his as light is from darkness quoting him, or rather misquoting him. Douglas was, it is true, opposed to the rebellion, but while opposed to the rebellion, it is also true that he was opposed to the Black Republican party. He was opposed to making war upon the institutions of the southern States. He was for putting down this rebellion. He said in his last speech, save one, which he made at the capitol at Springfield, that the moment the character of the war was changed to one of aggression, to a servile war, and to a war upon the institutions of the South, he would fly to the rescue as quickly as any man in the country. That is the sum and substance of the speech. The member cannot quote the name of Douglas in making war upon the Constitution and the laws.

I have said, perhaps, more than I ought to have said. Lest, however, there may be some solicitude on the part of those who telegraph for the papers, as I have been charged with falsehood, I will add that I shall have no personal controversy unless strictly on the defensive. I cannot consent in justice to my own character to pay further attention to the characterless member from Kentucky. I have said what I have for the vindication of myself and those who act with me. This is the last of it.

Mr. A. MYERS obtained the floor.

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask the gentleman to yield to me fifteen minutes to reply.

Mr. ANCONA. I think that we have had enough of this.

Mr. STROUSE. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman has not the floor to make that motion.

Mr. YEAMAN. I rise to a question of order. I only yielded to my colleague, and did not give up the floor entirely.

The CHAIRMAN. If that be the case, then the gentleman from Kentucky is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. YEAMAN. I will with the consent of the committee.

Mr. PERRY. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can yield unconditionally to his colleague.

Mr. YEAMAN. I yield to him and to all others who want to debate it.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a special order, and debate must be confined to it unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent. Objection was made.

Mr. ROBINSON. I object, unless it is agreed on the other side of the House that my colleague may reply if he chooses. [Cries of "Agreed!" from the Republican side of the House.]

Mr. PERRY. I object.

Mr. ANDERSON. I obtained the floor for the purpose of making a personal explanation. I did not intend to carry the war into Africa, but only into Egypt, from which the gentleman from Illinois comes.

Mr. HARRINGTON. I object to any further personal controversy.

Mr. A. MYERS again obtained the floor, and yielded to

Mr. STROUSE, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAWES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration as a special order the bill (S. No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and had come to no resolution thereon.

COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL ARMORY.

The SPEAKER announced that he had appointed the following members as the select committee on a western national armory: Mr. KELLOGG of Michigan, Mr. MOOREHEAD, Mr. O'NEILL of Ohio, Mr. ARNOLD, Mr. DAWES, Mr. McDOWELL, Mr. RANDALL of Kentucky, Mr. LOAN, and Mr. ELDRIDGE.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Superintendent of Public Printing in regard to the agricultural report; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

NAVY REGISTER.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House two thousand five hundred copies of the Navy Register for the year 1864.

MISSISSIPPI AND TIDEWATER CANAL.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, asked leave to introduce the following resolution:

Whereas the President of the United States, in virtue of a joint resolution of the Thirty-Seventh Congress, appointed Colonel Charles B. Stuart, civil engineer, a commissioner to examine the canal between the Mississippi and tide-water on the eastern coast, with a view to a more perfect water communication:

Resolved, That the said commissioner be requested to report to this House the results of the examination made by him in conformity with said joint resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN objected.

And then, on motion of Mr. BAXTER, (at a quarter past four o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 3, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 26th of January, copies of orders issued by military authority concerning elections in the States of Kentucky, Missouri, Maryland, and Delaware; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster General, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 22d of December, 1863, information in relation to the failure of the mails between the cities of Washington and New York.

Mr. SUMNER. I had the honor to offer the resolution referred to in that communication some time ago, and I am glad that we at last have an answer to it. I move that the answer be printed for the use of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. POMEROY presented eight petitions of military storekeepers in the United States Army, praying for the passage of an act conferring on them the rank, pay, and allowances of captains in their respective departments; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. COLLAMER presented a petition of fifty citizens of Vermont, praying for the emancipation of all persons of African descent held to involuntary service or labor in the United States; which was referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

He also presented a petition of twenty-one women of Vermont, praying for the emancipation of all persons of African descent held to involuntary service or labor in the United States; which was referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. COWAN presented the memorial of Charles B. Ford, of Kenosha, Wisconsin, praying for relief against the operation of the "Act to promote the progress of the useful arts," approved March 3, 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. SUMNER. I present a memorial of a large number of citizens of Boston, chiefly Germans, protesting against the proposed system of reconstruction by the President of the United States, and calling upon Congress to make arrangements which will render the rebels politically harmless until a well-regulated condition of the seceded States has been secured. I ask that the memorial may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

It was so referred.

Mr. POWELL presented the petition of Waters & Fox, and others, importers, merchants, and dealers in castor oil, and producers of castor seed, praying for a reduction of the duty on castor seed; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented the memorial of R. Gregg & Co., and others, protesting against an increase of the tax on spirituous liquors retrospective in its action; which was ordered to lie on the table.

MILITARY AFFAIRS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I ask leave to submit to the Senate a memorial signed by some three hundred loyal citizens of Harrison county in the State of Missouri, setting forth the grievances under which they now labor—grievances of a most oppressive and humiliating kind. It is as follows:

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives:

We, your memorialists, citizens of Harrison county and State of Missouri, men who have always been loyal and true to the Government of the United States, would respectfully represent that in this county and in many other parts of this State former militia companies that have shown every anxiety to have this unholy rebellion put down, and who were in favor of restoring peace to our distracted State, have been mustered out of the service and deprived of their arms, while rebels and rebel sympathizers (men who have been loud in their denunciations of the Federal and State Governments) are organized to fill their places.

We, your memorialists, who have the interest of the whole country at heart, feel justly the insult thus offered, and, as there is no difficulty in the enforcement of the civil law, pray for such action at your hands as will hereafter prevent the arming of the disloyal population and returned fugitives in the midst of loyal men, and that such troops may no longer be permitted to organize in this county or State; and investigation of these matters is asked.

And, as in duty bound, we will ever pray,

HOWARD T. COMBS,
JOHN GRUCHER,
J. W. CARROLL,
JOSEPH F. BRYANT,
T. H. TEMPLEMAN,
Rev. S. G. ANDERSON,
And about three hundred others.

Mr. President, let me say here in explanation that the county of Harrison is one of the most loyal in the State, one situated near the Iowa line, one that has never had but four slaves in it if I remember aright, and has been correspondingly resolute to maintain the Government and put down the rebellion. The three hundred loyal citizens who concur in this memorial set forth, however, that the rebellion has virtually put them down; that they stand disarmed and disbanded, in presence of their wives and children, while rebel sympathizers, noted as such, or at least believed to be such by them, and to have no hearty sympathy with the national Government, are made their custodians. All this, if my advices are correct, has been done under the direction immediately of the district commander, General Guitar, who has been kept in command of the northern half of Missouri for many months past, in defiance of the almost universal protest of the loyal men of that section. Nor do I hazard anything in saying that, so odious has he made his rule, it has required an armed force, such as he has gathered there, to protect him in his person and his peregrinations.

Without going further, however, into the discussion of matters of complaint at present, it will suffice for the purpose I now have in view to say that among the leading causes of animosity entertained by the loyal citizens of north Missouri were, first, a system of vindictive arrests of those conspicuous for their devotion to the cause of freedom, and, secondly, conduct at variance with the regulations prescribed for the government of our armies, in seizing and returning into slavery, or permitting to be returned into slavery to disloyal claimants, colored persons actually employed as teamsters for the regiments. I do not repose these citations upon my own knowledge or assertion, but submit herewith, and to accompany this memorial, the affidavits I hold in my hand, which set forth specifically instances in which the wrongs were perpetrated. They are marked one and two and three and four.

And now let me say in conclusion, Mr. President, that believing such offenses should not be permitted to pass without scrutiny, first to ascertain their truth, nor without rebuke afterwards to prevent their repetition in the same or other States, I desire to refer these papers to the joint committee on the conduct of the war. It is, I believe, in contemplation by that committee, and if not, certainly it will devolve on them as a duty, to investigate the conduct of affairs in the department of Missouri, and I cannot but think that if transactions shall appear such as these glanced at—violative at once of citizen liberties and Army regulations—they will not hesitate to present a report such as will demand a dismissal from the service of all officers guiltily implicated; nor can I doubt, furthermore, that all officers so presented will be dismissed by the proper authority in deference to public opinion. I believe, sir, that the recent change in department commanders in Missouri, if followed up by a change in policy such as will no doubt suggest itself to the very able and sagacious general placed there, will right much of this wrong that has been complained of and restore a harmony that should never have been interrupted; and so trusting, I shall close my statement in this behalf by asking that the memorial and accompanying affidavits may be referred to the joint committee of the two Houses on the conduct of the war.

Mr. WILKINSON. I hope that reference will be made, and that the committee on the conduct of the war will take up and thoroughly investigate the operations of the military department of Missouri. I say this because my State has had several regiments in the field in Missouri, and they have fallen under the influence, and, as I believe, the evil influence of that department, and many of the most prominent men have written to me concerning the maladministration of affairs in that State. I have a large number of letters from men of intelligence from the State of Minnesota who are now in Missouri attached to the military department in that State, complaining in the most bitter terms of the whole management of that military department. I believe that if it shall be carried on in the future as it has been managed in the past it will have a tendency to demoralize the troops and to render them of very little effect in suppressing the rebellion or restoring order in that State. I am very glad that the Senator from Missouri has brought up this matter in the shape that he has, and I trust that the committee on the conduct of the war will give it that attention which the importance of the case requires.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The papers will be referred to the joint committee on the conduct of the war.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. GRIMES, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 81) to amend the charter of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 28) relating to members of Congress, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 51) amendatory of and supplementary to "An act to provide circuit courts for the districts of California and Oregon, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, reported it with amendments.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom were referred sundry petitions and memorials concerning the enrollment act, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 85) to provide for the examination of certain officers of the Army, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 144) to indemnify the owners of the British schooner Glen, reported it without amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Edward C. Doran, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 94) to authorize the settlement of the accounts of E. C. Doran.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will state that there is a vacancy in the Committee on the Judiciary occasioned by the resignation of the Senator from Delaware, (Mr. Bayard.) I move that the President of the Senate be authorized to fill that vacancy.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. There are two vacancies upon the Committee on Pensions, one occasioned by the death of the late Senator from Virginia, (Mr. Bowden,) the other in consequence of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. POMEROY] having been excused from service on the committee at his own request. I move that the President of the Senate be authorized to fill those vacancies.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. Foor and Mr. Brown to fill the vacancies upon the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. CHANDLER, the Vice President was authorized to appoint a member on the Committee on Commerce to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Hon. Mr. Bowden.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. LANE, of Kansas.

CHARGES AGAINST MR. HALE.

On motion of Mr. HALE, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the report made by the Committee on the Judiciary on the 1st instant, upon the resolution instructing them to inquire whether Mr. HALE had been guilty of any improper conduct in connection with the case of one Hunt, charged with crime by direction of the War Department.

The report was agreed to; and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (No. 199) to facilitate the payment of bounties and arrears of pay due for the service of wounded and deceased soldiers; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

The message further announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed, on the 26th of January, a bill (H. R. No. 65) to change the place of holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of West Tennessee, and for other purposes.

And that on the 29th of January he had approved and signed a bill (H. R. No. 33) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865.

PIER NEAR LEWES.

Mr. SAULSBURY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to inquire into the expediency or necessity of constructing a pier near or opposite to the town of Lewes, in the State of Delaware, for the protection of vessels navigating the Delaware bay and river.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. TRUMBULL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 22) in reference to lands belonging to certain States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WADE, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 93) to repeal so much of the acts of Congress approved March 3, 1845, and August 6, 1846, as authorize the transportation of goods imported from foreign countries through the United States to the Canadas, or from the Canadas through the United States to be exported to foreign countries; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives (No. 199) to facilitate the payment of bounties and arrears of pay due for the service of wounded and deceased soldiers, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

ENLISTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being no further business of the morning hour, with the unanimous consent of the Senate the Chair will lay before it the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill (S. No. 41) to promote enlistments in the Army of the United States, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON.]

Mr. CARLILE. I move that the further consideration of that bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up for consideration the bill (S. No. 30) to establish a uniform system of ambulances in the armies of the United States.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I make no objection to that if it will not take time; but I was about to suggest to the Senate that if all the Senators were ready to consider the question now, I would move to take up the bill for the increase of the revenue, which I reported yesterday. I shall not, however, urge it now if any Senator desires that it shall be put off another day, inasmuch as the bill has just been laid upon Senators' tables. If Senators are all ready for the consideration of that bill, the sooner we take it up and act upon it the better for the revenue and for the country; and if no Senator suggests that more time is desired, I submit to my friend from Massachusetts whether he had not better withdraw his motion and let me move to take up that bill.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly, if the Senator from Maine desires to take up to-day the bill reported from his committee I shall most cheerfully give way for that purpose. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I now move to take up House bill No. 122.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 122) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary read the bill at length.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The bill is now before the Senate, and is open to amendments. The amendments reported from the Committee on Finance will first be considered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Before proceeding to the consideration of the amendments proposed by the Committee on Finance to this bill, it may be well enough for me to say a few words in explanation of the views which governed the committee in proposing their amendments to the bill. I shall endeavor to make what I have to say as brief as possible, because I presume the question is one which Senators can readily understand without much explanation on my part.

The Committee on Finance in considering this bill did not suppose they had anything to do other than to determine, as well as they could, what action it was best to take in order to benefit the revenue as much as possible, having in view at the same time the interests and the feelings of the community at large, and doing as little damage as possible to the business of the country. If this view they did not feel that they had any right to consider any question outside of those. They determined that they would consider the question of distilled spirits precisely as they would any other article of commerce; that it was not their business to look at it in a sumptuary point of view, or with reference to any opinions that might be entertained in the community with regard to the question of temperance or otherwise. Our laws recognize distilled spirits as an article of traffic, as an article upon which it is proper to levy a tax for the benefit of the Government and the people; thus recognizing its existence as an article of merchandise, and to be treated, therefore, as all other articles of merchandise are. Neither did they consider that they were bound to inflict punishments upon any class of the community.

Much has been said with reference to speculation and speculators, and a desire to punish speculators for their action in reference to this subject within the last few months. For myself, sir, I am rather inclined to consider speculators, as a general rule, as a very useful part of the community. They are engaged in one particular branch of business, or in a particular mode of carrying on business; they bring their capital, if they have any, to bear upon it; and their "speculations," as they are called, are mercantile enterprises. At any rate, the committee did not feel inclined to go into the question of whether good or harm had been done by them; but simply to recognize the subject as one before them for their consideration, with the single view, as I said before, to see how far an additional revenue could be derived from the article itself, and, as I before remarked, with as little injury or oppression to the community or any branch of business as possible.

It will be remarked that the first amendment which we have made is one grading the tax in some measure. The bill as it originally came from the House of Representatives provided a tax of sixty cents on all liquor distilled after a certain day, which is the date of the passage of the bill. We have provided that that tax of sixty cents shall be levied on all spirits distilled from and after the date of the passage of the bill up to the 1st day of July next; and that upon all liquors that may be distilled after the passage of the act (in order to carry out the idea which we had of excluding spirits previously distilled) and sold or removed for consumption and sale on and after July 1st, and previous to the 1st day of January next, there shall be an additional sum of ten cents per gallon levied; and on all liquors that may be distilled after the passage of this act and sold or removed for consumption and sale on and after the 1st of January next, still another additional sum of ten cents, making it eighty cents in the whole.

With reference to the amount of tax that might be levied on liquors, the testimony before the committee convinced me that a tax of eighty cents might very well be added without doing injury in any way; that the article would bear that, and perhaps a still greater amount. With reference, however, to that portion of liquor which goes into the manufactures of the country, where the manufactures depend necessarily on this article, it must be obvious that the tax will be very burdensome; and I am not sure, although we do not undertake to make the exception here in any way, that it may not be necessary in the course of the session to legislate somewhat, if it can be done safely, with a view to that particular part of the article referred to which is used in the process of different manufactures.

With regard to the grading of the tax in the manner I have mentioned, there was some diversity of opinion in the committee; but a majority of the committee decided in favor of it. One argument that is used in favor of it is that, in spite of the additional tax levied, it will encourage distillers to keep their distilleries open and at work during these periods, in view of the additional tax that is to be levied at these several times. The main argument against it, as will be obvious to every Senator, is that this very thing encourages perhaps a rush of work with a view to the rise, and may operate in the same way with reference to this speculation by individuals in the community, which is so much deprecated, and of which so much has been said. That question, therefore, will be before the Senate for them to consider: whether it is advisable to adhere to a single rate of taxation, or whether it is best to increase the rate at different times as we have fixed it, or in any other way.

The next amendment is one of very considerable importance, and has created more discussion than any other. The Senate is familiar with it. That part of the bill, as it came from the House of Representatives, imposed an additional tax on spirits on hand, a considerable portion of which—how much we do not know—was made before any tax was laid upon liquors, and on another portion the tax of twenty cents has already been levied. The question arose—and it is a very important one, and one about which much may be said on both sides—whether that tax was advisable on the whole or not. Of course it has been very maturely and thoroughly considered by the committee, and considered, too, with the advantage of having testimony before us, most of which, and I do not know but all of which, was directed against the proposed tax upon liquors on hand, and which were manufactured before the passage of the act.

On that subject the arguments are various. I confess that my mind has been somewhat in doubt about it. I do not know but that I might have been willing under some circumstances—I speak now simply for myself—to put a less amount of tax on liquors on hand than that imposed by the bill upon liquors which were hereafter to be distilled after the passage of the act. That you cannot with any degree of justice, in my judgment, and I simply speak for myself, impose the whole amount of the tax, must be obvious, I think, to anybody who is acquainted with and has remarked the course of business in reference to this article. There has undoubtedly been since last fall a very considerable degree of speculation in the article.

that by the imposition of a tax upon that which is to be manufactured hereafter we immediately give a market value, by the amount of the tax levied, to that which is on hand, and that that market value, that increased price, would go into the hands of those who hold the article, whether they are the original manufacturers or those who have purchased it from time to time in the course of their business, or otherwise. The argument has been urged with much force that, after all, it would be no more than fair, as this tax must be paid by the consumers, the people of the country, that it should be divided at least between the Government and the persons deriving the benefit from the increased tax laid by the Government upon the article.

But, sir, although that may be true in some cases—that is to say, in the case of those manufacturers of the article who have held it from the beginning and not parted with its possession, and they would derive this additional benefit—yet with reference to the trade in the community it must be obvious that it is not true to any very considerable extent, because there is nobody probably, or but very few persons, and it is that class of the community particularly that I now speak of, who purchased the article originally at the then market price, before what is called "speculation" began, and have held on to it to this time. On the contrary, it has been gradually varying from its original start, whatever that may have been, forty-five or fifty or fifty-five cents, up as high as ninety-five cents, which is a very high figure; adding in fact the whole amount almost of the proposed tax, but perhaps not quite, and I am told that some have been sold as high as a dollar. That was the amount paid by the purchaser who now holds it. If you put on the whole amount of this tax so far as the speculator, as he is called, or the trader in liquor, is concerned, the result must necessarily be a very heavy loss to him, because if you put the tax on the purchase money that he paid it raises the price to a higher amount than the article can actually be made for by the manufacturer and the tax paid and then sold, creating very considerable loss. In addition to that, there are many men who carry on a regular business of one kind and another who are obliged to purchase and keep on hand a considerable amount of spirits, not for any long period of time, in carrying on manufactures largely, who must purchase at the market price, and buy, not for speculation, but for use in their manufactures, and consequently the effect on them would be very injurious, because it would create a loss.

That is one view that is taken of it. There is another which, perhaps, was not without very considerable influence in the minds of the committee. To tax an article of this kind on hand, and more especially in the hands of an owner, whether an imported article or whether an article subject to internal domestic duties which has already paid a tax, or which perhaps has not, is a thing entirely new in the revenue system of any country. I am told, and told on authority—I have not personally examined it myself, because I was told there was no doubt about the fact—that it never has been done in England in any case; and if we introduce it here it will be the first time in the history of any system of this kind, that you take an article of property which has already gone through the hands of Government and paid this tax to Government and again assess a tax upon it in the hands of the owner. I am told it has never been done at all heretofore in any country, and consequently we should be introducing an entirely new system, and one which might be attended with very considerable embarrassment.

Again, sir, if we undertake to do anything of this kind it must be obvious that we are departing from what we seemed to establish as a system when we passed the original internal revenue law. This very question was then very much discussed. I believe my friend, the Senator from Ohio, who is one of my colleagues on the committee, [Mr. SHERMAN,] proposed at that time that we should assess a tax on liquor on hand, half, if I remember rightly, of the amount which was assessed on liquor distilled afterwards. I think I favored it; but the Senate on very great consideration refused to adopt the suggestion, and the House of Representatives refused to adopt the suggestion, and we established then in the beginning as our system that we would not place any tax upon liquors except those that should be afterwards manufactured; that is to say, that we would not touch property in existence. There is a fairness, there is an evident propriety in saying to everybody, If you choose to create a certain kind of property you shall pay such a tax upon it; but if that property is already created and in their hands there would seem to be an injustice in singling it out to pay a tax (because all taxes should be equal) simply on account of the particular kind of property, whatever it may be.

It was considered—and I confess that I gave very great weight to the suggestion—that we had in the beginning settled what our policy was to be in that particular; and if there is any principle with reference to taxation which is considered an important and vital one it is that there shall be a certainty in the system; that there shall not be a continual variation and change. Trade needs something of that sort. It is subject to continual fluctuations. If it is to have no idea of what the policy of the Government is, no idea of how articles may be caught up and seized in the hands of those into whose possession they have gone after they have once passed through the hands of the Government, the tendency naturally is to create uncertainty, confusion, distress, doubt, and a feeling that the Government has no system and no principle, and that all trade in reference to such articles, whether large or small, is utterly unsafe. Thus creating confusion, it will have a tendency to diminish the respect which is entertained for the Government itself, to diminish confidence in the Government, confidence in the legislation of the country, and will thus create very considerable evils.

These, sir, were the principal considerations; but I do not know still—with the inclination that was upon my mind to reach the article of whisky if I could have been satisfied that the game was worth the candle—that I might not have adhered to my original impression with regard to it. Although, perhaps, the weight of the argument is against it, my desire to get money for the Government is so strong and my feeling of the necessity of it is so pressing that I do not know but that I might have yielded to the force of the argument the other way. There is, however, a great question, what we shall gain by it. Mark you, in laying a tax we are administering a system which is to run through a series of years. We do not calculate simply upon what we are to get this year or next year, but for a series of years; and it is very questionable whether there is any good policy in laying our hand upon an individual article at a particular time for the sake of getting a certain sum of money, and then stopping, which must necessarily end with the time the very first effort is made. If we lay a tax upon the liquor on hand it is only on that now on hand. There is none to be on hand next year in the same condition. It is to be only an effect to be produced for a single year.

How much should we gain by it? Upon this opinions vary. The opinion given before our committee was very general that two hundred and fifty thousand barrels would be the extent of all that the bill could cover. I had it calculated, and I believe that would produce, according to the rate of forty cents additional tax, $5,000,000. If it would produce only $5,000,000, you see at the rate of our expenditures at the present time, and the money we want, it would be a mere bagatelle. But then should we get the whole of that sum? These two hundred and fifty thousand barrels are scattered all through the community. Some of them are in the hands of the original manufacturers; you might get the tax on that. Some are in the hands of large dealers; you might find that. But very large quantities are scattered about in shops and in different directions in small amounts, and where you would not be very likely to get at it. If $5,000,000 is the amount, and you could reach the whole of it, the result would not be very productive; but regarding the thing as unjust and wrong as the community probably would, or at any rate those interested would, there would be a sort of feeling with every man that if the Government could be defrauded in this case it would be after all no very great violation of conscience. The effort would certainly be made, the community being so disposed under the circumstances.

Then again, sir, there are other evils connected with it. You must necessarily have a very great increase of officers, for the officers that are engaged in levying the taxes cannot now do this duty, scattered so largely and widely as the article is throughout the community. That would be out of the question; and my judgment is that, supposing on the whole it amounted to $5,000,000, the result would be that you would not get more than half that sum out of it, and you would spend a large portion of that in the expenses of collection; and besides that, you would excite and render angry a great many people in the community, perhaps with some appearance of justice, so that, as I said before, if that is the whole amount, I should consider that the game was not worth the candle, not worth trying for. Even if you go further, and double the estimate (and I think that is the utmost extent to which you could go) and call it $10,000,000, the amount you would really get might hardly be considered sufficient to pay you for the evils that would necessarily follow.

In saying these things, I am but repeating the arguments which have been adduced one way and the other with reference to this matter, and stating what I consider to be the several views to be presented to the Senate with reference to it. I have not gone through the whole of them, but stated the main considerations that have been advanced to us and that have occurred to us in the course of conversation with each other.

That is the main question, and is to be considered by the Senate, and it involves about all the amendments of any consequence which have been proposed, because you will observe that the same provision was made in regard to the duty which is imposed on cotton of two cents per pound, and an additional cent and a half a pound on all that in the hands of the owners which has already paid half a cent a pound. So also with regard to the seventh section, which provides for laying this same additional duty upon foreign liquors in order to make it conform. We have struck out there the same provision in substance, and made the additions necessary, grading the duties to conform to the amendment in the first section. One depends upon the other, and if the Senate should adopt the amendment proposed by the committee in reference to the particular subject to which I have referred, the liquor on hand, they will undoubtedly adopt the others in order to make the whole system conform.

There is another provision which we have struck out to which I will call the attention of the Senate. It is that which lays a duty on what are called rectified spirits. That also was considered very much at large and very thoroughly by the Senate when we passed the original bill, and it was then decided that we should confine our tax to the original article. The argument with regard to that perhaps it is not necessary for me to repeat; but the committee are entirely satisfied that it is impossible to levy a tax of this description, because spirits can be rectified by any man in his own house, in his own cellar, in his own garret, without any kind of difficulty. The system of passing it through charcoal is simple. I do not understand the whole process, but it is said to be entirely simple, such as anybody may carry on himself; and the result would be that if you attempted to lay a duty on rectified spirits you must necessarily break down all the large establishments where spirits are rectified for the benefit of individuals in their houses and shops and barns, because there you will find it impossible to get the tax, while you could reach it in the establishments where the business is openly and largely carried on. For that reason the committee adhere to the original decision which they made two years ago, when we passed the original bill, and recommend that the Senate adhere to it now.

To be sure, sir, much may be said with regard to the adulteration of liquors, &c.; but the answer is one that I gave in the beginning, and that is, that we are not legislating in regard to the morals of the community. If we were, sir, we should perhaps prohibit the article altogether; but we are considering what the interests of the Government require with reference to the raising of revenue, and we are satisfied that the effect of laying this duty would rather be to diminish than to increase revenue.

The other amendments are with reference to details, verbal amendments, which can be readily understood by the Senate without any explanation from me. They are very slight, many of them of very little consequence, except as correcting the phraseology of the bill. The ninth section we have struck out entirely, because it is predicated upon the part of the bill of which I have been speaking, that is, the duty upon liquors on hand; and if that should be struck out by the Senate, of course the ninth section will not be necessary. We have added one section which I suppose Senators will readily understand. Although it is not exactly appropriate here, it is necessary to pass such a provision very soon, for the reason that many suits have been commenced against revenue officers, and they are now pending in the courts, and they desire to remove them as other suits against original revenue officers into the courts of the United States; but the courts hold that by "revenue officers" under the original act, which is referred to in the amendment, are not meant internal revenue officers, and that they are not entitled to the advantages of that act. The design of this new section is simply to place them on the same level, and we desire to place them under the same protection.

This is all I desire to say in reference to the bill itself. I have not gone into any extended remarks on the subject, as I should think I was not treating the Senate properly if I were to do so; as members unquestionably understand now perfectly the whole subject as well as I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first amendment of the committee will be read.

The Secretary read the first amendment of the Committee on Finance, which was in section one, line nine, between the words "or" and "removed," to insert "distilled and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "sale," in line nine of section one, to insert "previous to the 1st day of July next;" so as to make the section read:

That from and after the passage of this act, in lieu of the duty provided for in section forty-one of an act entitled "An act to support the Government, and to pay interest on the public debt," approved July 1, 1862, and in addition to duties payable for licenses, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all spirits that may be distilled and sold, or distilled and removed for consumption or sale previous to the 1st day of July next, of first proof, the duty of sixty cents on each and every gallon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "gallon," in section one, line eleven, to insert:

And upon all liquors that may be distilled after the passage of this act, and sold or removed for consumption or sale on and after the 1st day of July next, and previous to the 1st day of January next, seventy cents on each and every gallon; and on all liquors that may be distilled after the passage of this act, and sold or removed for consumption or sale on and after the 1st day of January next, eighty cents on each and every gallon.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, this bill is one of much importance, affecting important interests, particularly of the Northwest. It has just within the last hour been laid in a printed form upon the desks of Senators. For one, I must say that I am not prepared to consider it at this time, although the explanation of the amendments proposed by the committee, by its chairman, has been very full and very clear. Still I do not feel prepared to act upon the bill at this time, and as it is a measure of importance, I feel justified in moving that its further consideration be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not rise to object to what the Senator proposes, if the Senate shall see fit to agree to it; but I wish to inform him that before calling up the bill—probably he was not in at the time—I stated that if any Senator desired that it should go over until to-morrow I had no objection; because it had just been laid upon the tables of Senators, and I should not press it if any member desired further time; but as no one did desire any further time I called it up.

Mr. HENDRICKS. When the bill was called up I was out of the Chamber, having been called out on business, and did not hear that statement of the Senator.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will state to the Senator from Indiana that it is very desirable, as he will see, that the action should be as speedy as possible, because it is probable the bill will have to go back to the House of Representatives.

Mr. JOHNSON. There was no objection to the bill being called up. I suppose every Senator desired that it should be called up, in order that we might hear the explanation of the several amendments proposed by the committee. That having been made, I am sure the chairman will not object to a postponement.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I make no objection if Senators desire that the bill be postponed until to-morrow; but I wish to notify them that I shall then ask the Senate to proceed with it. [Certainly.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

ALBERT BROWN.

Mr. HOWE. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Albert Brown praying for relief, to make a report on that subject accompanied by a bill.

The bill (S. No. 92) for the relief of Albert Brown was read a first time by its title.

Mr. HALE. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to consent to consider the bill now, and if I state it I think they will do so. It is a bill to pay for a lot of wagons made for the Army, but there was some trouble among the inspectors about receiving them. The report of the committee will show that the contractor did everything he was bound to do under an inspection by an inspector furnished by the Department, and he has been out of the $14,000 due him ever since. The case has been before the Senate once, when it was thoroughly investigated by the Committee on Claims, and the bill passed the Senate upon an explanation unanimously, without a division, at the last session. It is now reported again unanimously. It is the case of an honest man suffering for $14,100 which the Government withholds from him, and the consideration for which it received two years ago. I hope the Senate will pass the bill at once.

By unanimous consent the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Albert Brown, of Kingston, New Hampshire, of $14,000 in full for one hundred Army wagons manufactured by him under a contract made with Morris S. Miller, quartermaster of the United States Army, dated July 1, 1861, and duly delivered to the order of the Quartermaster General, dated August 13, 1861.

Mr. GRIMES. I call for the reading of the report in that case.

The Secretary read the report made by Mr. Howe on the 20th of January, 1863, from which it appears that the petitioner claims pay for one hundred Army wagons manufactured for the Government under a contract made with Morris S. Miller, of the quartermaster's department, which was entered into on the 1st of July, 1861. The wagons were to be built according to specifications contained in the contract, which are very full and minute.

The contract contains clauses which provide that the work might be inspected from time to time as it progressed by an officer or agent of the quartermaster's department, and that none of it should be painted until it had been inspected and approved by the officer or agent authorized to inspect it. When finished, painted, and accepted by an officer or agent of the quartermaster's department, and delivered as therein agreed, they would be paid for. The wagons, boxes, &c., were to be stored at Kingston, New Hampshire, at such place as the quartermaster or his agent might designate, and the contractor was to assist in taking them apart for shipping. It was agreed that forty of the wagons, complete, should be ready for delivery on or before the 31st day of July, 1861, and the remainder on the 31st day of August, 1861.

The evidence in the case shows that on the day of the date of the contract Major Miller appointed Mr. W. C. Patten, of Kingston, the agent of the department to inspect the wagons, instructing him, at the same time, in writing, how to inspect, and what sort of a certificate to give. On the same day Major Miller addressed to Mr. Brown, the contractor, a note in the following terms:

"SIR: The wagons to be manufactured under your contract with the United States of this date should be shipped when ordered by the Quartermaster General, on bills of lading or railroad receipts taken in duplicate; one to be sent by you to the consignee, the other to be sent, with your certificates of inspection and bill of wagons, to the Quartermaster General. The bill of lading is proof of delivery."

On the 13th day of August, 1861, the Quartermaster General, by letter of that date, directed the contractor to send the wagons to Perryville, Maryland, consigned to Captain C. G. Sawtelle, assistant quartermaster. Forty of the wagons were thus shipped on the 17th of August, and the remaining sixty on the 28th of the same month. The wagons were inspected by the agent, Mr. Patten, and approved by him in the very terms prescribed by Major Miller. The wagons arrived at Perryville, where it seems they have been allowed to remain. The Quartermaster General refused to use, to sell, or to pay for them. On the 4th of January, 1862, the Quartermaster General informed the agent of the railroad company at Perryville that the United States had "condemned and rejected the wagons," and that the railroad company, having a lien upon them for charges of freight, was at liberty, as far as the United States was concerned, to do what it found for its interest to secure itself.

Thus, through the action of the quartermaster's department, one hundred new wagons, purchased for $141 each, to which a team had never been harnessed, were squandered. Considered in connection with the fact that the same department disburses about two hundred and fifty millions annually, that is perhaps the most significant fact in the case. It suggests this problem. If the expenditure of $14,100 produces nothing to the United States, how much is likely to be produced by the expenditure of $250,000,000? The value of these wagons was lost. Whether the loss should fall upon the Government or upon the contractor was the question to be considered.

The committee addressed a note to the Quartermaster General asking him to communicate any evidence in his possession or any reasons he might have to urge why the claim of Mr. Brown should not be allowed. In his reply he states, "that because these wagons were not made in accordance with the contract, and because they are of inferior quality and workmanship, and worthless for use as Army wagons, they have not been received, and should not be paid for."

The committee were of the opinion that the Quartermaster General was mistaken in saying the wagons had "not been received." The wagons had been shipped from Kingston, New Hampshire, to Perryville, Maryland, a distance of several hundred miles. They had been shipped upon the written order of the Quartermaster General. They had been consigned to an officer of his department. They had reached Perryville. Bills of lading had been forwarded. The maker had been instructed by that department that such bills would constitute a delivery. The committee were of the opinion that, after all these things had been done, it was too late for the maker to reclaim the wagons, or for the Government to reject them. After having ordered the maker to send the wagons to Perryville, the committee did not think it becoming in a just Government to order him to come to Perryville, to pay the charges for transportation, and to take them back again. Whether the wagons were, in fact, of inferior quality and workmanship, and useless as Government wagons, was a question upon which the evidence was not entirely harmonious. In support of his allegation against the quality of the wagons, the Quartermaster General submitted to the committee copies of the reports made by Captain C. G. Sawtelle, of that department, of two different inspections made by him. The one was dated on the 31st of August, 1861, and the other on the 10th of September following. According to those reports it was evident to the committee that the wagons did differ from the specifications contained in the contract; but it was equally evident that neither of those reports exhibits a greater difference between the wagons and the specifications than do the two reports exhibit to each other.

The fact of making two reports and the discrepancies between them was explained by the Quartermaster General upon the ground that Captain Sawtelle made his first inspection of the wagons by comparing them with a copy of specifications upon which other contracts for Army wagons had been made, whereas the second inspection was made by comparing them with the specifications in the contract made with Mr. Brown himself. Captain Sawtelle himself urged the same explanation. The committee, however, felt bound to say that the explanation was not satisfactory. Indeed, it seemed not less extraordinary than the fact itself. For Captain Sawtelle himself asserted that the difference between the specifications on which his first inspection was made and those of the second was in the following particulars, namely: the one required hubs to be of elm and felloes of yellow oak, while the other required hubs to be of gum and felloes to be of white oak. The committee did not think these slight discrepancies imposed upon Captain Sawtelle the necessity for making a second inspection and a second report; and they are confirmed in that opinion by the fact that he has not, in either of his reports upon the wagons in controversy, informed them whether the hubs and felloes were of one material or the other. If, therefore, the testimony of Captain Sawtelle was the only evidence in the case, it would be somewhat difficult to say that the wagons were unsuited to the purpose for which they were built, because that testimony is contradictory in itself. But his testimony is also contradicted by the certificate of Mr. W. C. Patten, who certifies that the wagons were "made of good stock, and in accordance with the specifications laid down in the contract."

This evidence seems to the committee much more satisfactory than that of Captain Sawtelle; for even if it be not consistent with truth, it is, at least, consistent with itself, while the evidence of Captain Sawtelle is not. Besides, there is evidence in the case which shows that Mr. Patten is an experienced wagon-builder. There is no evidence to show that Captain Sawtelle ever made one. Mr. Patten saw the wagons while they were building; he inspected them before they were painted. There was no evidence that Captain Sawtelle ever saw them until they were completed and painted and removed to Perryville. The evidence shows that Mr. Patten was the agent of the Government, specially appointed for the very purpose of inspecting and reporting upon the construction of these wagons. There is no evidence that Captain Sawtelle had any more authority to inspect and reject those wagons than any teamster would have had who might be hired to drive them. There was evidence in the case to show that Mr. Patten is "a man of high moral character, and above the suspicion of practicing fraud in any capacity in which he may be placed." There was no such evidence in reference to Captain Sawtelle. Moreover, the evidence of Mr. Patten was corroborated by the statements of other witnesses. Robert Rowe made a part of the work and sold a part of the material. He certifies to the good quality of both. He examined the first forty wagons, and he certifies to their good qualities. J. R. Locke superintended the building of all the wagons. He certifies that they were "thoroughly made, of good stock, well seasoned, and, in every particular, agreeably to the specifications;" that he has had the experience of twenty years in building heavy wagons, and in that time has superintended several Government jobs.

Edward Riddle, of Boston, swears that he has had an experience of twenty years in the carriage business; that he examined these wagons as they passed through Boston on their way to Perryville; that he had frequently examined wagons made for the Government by other parties, and that these wagons were fully equal to any Army wagons that he had seen made in that State. There was, on the contrary, no evidence in the case corroborative of the testimony of Captain Sawtelle. Besides, the agent of the "Portland Company" certifies that he sold to Mr. Brown the axles for those wagons; that the latter purchased the best quality of axles, when he might have purchased the same articles made of common iron two dollars per set less than he paid. There was no evidence in the case to show that he purchased of any one inferior material for the sake of getting it at a reduced price. And, upon summing up the whole case, the simple question presented seems to be this: whether, when the Government of the United States has purchased goods, has received them, and removed them hundreds of miles from the former proprietor, it ought to pay for them. In the opinion of the committee it ought, and they accordingly reported a bill for the payment of Mr. Brown.

Mr. FOSTER. I confess, Mr. President, that from the reading of that report I come to a different result from that at which the committee have arrived. It appears that there was a contract made with this claimant for the making of one hundred Army wagons. That contract was made through the Quartermaster General. The claimant shows that he made the wagons, that they were sent to the place specified by some officer connected with the Government, and that when there, after an inspection directed by the Quartermaster General, they were rejected because not made conformably to the contract. There is in the report of the committee a comparison of the evidence on the question whether they were made conformably to the contract or not.

Mr. HALE. The honorable Senator will allow me to correct him right there, for I see he is in error. When the Government made this contract they put in it that William C. Patten should inspect the wagons while they were being built, and after they were built; and Mr. Patten did inspect them while they were being built, he having been agreed upon by the Government as the man who was to do it, and he inspected them after they were made and gave a certificate that they were properly made. He was the only man on earth who was agreed upon to inspect them. When they got to Perryville, an unauthorized individual, who had no authority in the case, made a second inspection.

Mr. FOSTER. Whether the individual who made the examination after they got to Perryville was unauthorized may admit of doubt. It seems that his action was recognized by the Quartermaster General, who is certainly an authorized officer of the Government and the authorized officer of the Government to make contracts of this description. He may make mistakes; he may commit frauds; but he is the officer through whom this Government acts in relation to matters of this description. As I understand his communication to the committee, he expressly states that these wagons were not made conformably to the contract and were not by him accepted, and that is the reason they were not paid for. It must, therefore, certainly be admitted that an authorized agent of the Government, the agent who made the contract, says it has not been complied with, and that is the reason why payment has not been made. I would not support an officer of the Government in doing injustice or in allowing injustice to be done to a contractor; but I would not assume that the officer had done wrong, nor would I find the fact that he had done wrong, until there was more evidence than I discover in the report of the committee in this case.

It may be that this is all right. I know nothing about the matter except what I gather from listening to the report as it has been read at the desk. The committee no doubt have more full and ample means of knowledge on the subject than I have; but from a single reading of the report it does seem to me that we shall be going further than it is prudent to go in the payment of claims to pass this bill while, at the same time, we are reproaching the officers of the Government for making improvident contracts, and unnecessarily wasting the public money. If that be the case, and we by way of correcting the evil vote to pay those whom they refuse to pay, the people, who after all pay these bills, will stand a chance of being twice fleeced, first by the officers of the Government and next by us; for we now propose to order payment where the officers refuse to pay, and they, as it is constantly asserted, pay much more than they should. I am in favor of the Government paying its debts. I am also in favor of having those who make contracts with the Government perform those contracts. I do not believe as a general thing that the officers of the Government are too strict in holding contractors to a performance of the contracts which they make; and I cannot therefore on this evidence vote to pay a contractor where the Government officer says the contract has not been performed.

Mr. HOWE. I have no sort of doubt that the Senator from Connecticut is in favor of the Government paying its debts, and therefore I have no sort of doubt that he will vote for the passage of this bill. I think the Senator from Connecticut has not had a fair opportunity to understand the question at issue.

Mr. GRIMES and others. Let it lie over, then.

Mr. HOWE. I have not the slightest objection. I did not ask to have it considered now.

Mr. GRIMES. The bill has only been presented this morning, and we are called upon to vote for it at once. I have never heard of it before. It ought to lie over until we have had an opportunity to look into it.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from Iowa called for a statement of the case when it was called up a year ago. The report was not then finished, but I made a statement of the case and the Senator himself was perfectly satisfied with it, and the bill was passed without any sort of objection from any quarter. I think I am not mistaken in saying that the Senator from Iowa called for an explanation of the claim. I have myself not the slightest wish that the case should be acted upon to-day. I did not ask for it; it was asked for by the Senator from New Hampshire. I have no more doubt of the entire justice and equity of this demand than if the man held the note of hand of the Government attested by every organ and every tribunal of the Government; but still if Senators wish to examine it I shall not object to its going over.

Mr. CLARK. Let the Senator from Wisconsin state now what he proposes to state, as he has the matter in charge, and then let it lie over.

Mr. GRIMES [to Mr. HOWE.] Say what you have to say when it comes up.

Mr. CLARK. Just as the Senator from Wisconsin prefers about that.

Mr. HOWE. I think, as there is a wish to have the bill go over, and there is no necessity for pressing it to action now, I had better not make any further statement at the present time, but allow the report to be printed, as I hope it will be, with the bill, and give Senators an opportunity to look at it.

The report was ordered to be printed, and the further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

AMBULANCE CORPS.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the bill (S. No. 30) to establish a uniform system of ambulances in the armies of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill provides that the medical director, or chief medical officer, of each Army corps, shall have the direction and supervision of all ambulances, medicine wagons, horses, harness, and other fixtures appertaining thereto, and of all officers and men who may be detailed or employed to assist him in the management thereof, in the Army corps in which he may be serving; that the commanding officer of each Army corps shall detail for service in the ambulance corps of such Army corps one captain, who shall be commander of the ambulance corps; one first lieutenant for each division in such Army corps; one second lieutenant for each brigade in such Army corps; one sergeant for each regiment in such Army corps; three privates for each ambulance, and one private for each medicine wagon; and the officers and non-commissioned officers of the ambulance corps are to be mounted. The officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates so detailed for each Army corps are to be examined by a board of medical officers of such Army corps as to their fitness for such duty; and such as are found to be not qualified are to be rejected, and others detailed in their stead.

There is to be allowed and furnished, and permanently attached to each regiment of infantry, three two-horse ambulances; to each regiment of cavalry two such ambulances; to each battery of artillery one ambulance; to the headquarters of each Army corps two such ambulances; and to each division two Army wagons; and each ambulance is to be provided with such number of stretchers and other appliances as shall be prescribed by the Surgeon General. The ambulances and wagons are to be furnished, so far as practicable, from the ambulances and wagons now in the service. The captain is to be the commander of all the ambulances, medicine and other wagons in the corps, under the immediate direction of the medical director, or chief medical officer, of the Army corps to which the ambulance corps belongs. He is to pay special attention to the condition of the ambulances, wagons, horses, harness, and other fixtures appertaining thereto, and see that they are at all times in readiness for service; that the officers and men of the ambulance corps are properly instructed in their duties, and that their duties are performed, and that the regulations which may be prescribed by the Secretary of War or the Surgeon General for the government of the ambulance corps are strictly observed by those under his command. It is to be his duty to institute a drill in his corps, instructing his men in the most easy and expeditious manner, of moving the sick and wounded, and to require in all cases that the sick and wounded shall be treated with gentleness and care, and that the ambulances and wagons are at all times provided with attendants, drivers, horses, and whatever may be necessary for their efficiency; and it is to be his duty also to see that the ambulances are not used for any other purpose than that for which they are designed and ordered. It will be the duty of the medical director or chief medical officer of the Army corps to issue the proper orders to the captain for the distribution of the ambulances for getting up the sick and wounded previous to and in time of action, and for the conveyance of the same while on the march, and it will be the duty of the captain faithfully and diligently to execute such orders; and the officers of the ambulance corps, including the medical director, are to make such reports from time to time as may be required by the Secretary of War, the Surgeon General, or the commanding officer of the Army corps in which they may be serving.

The first lieutenant assigned to the ambulance corps for a division is to have complete control, under the captain of his corps and the medical director of the Army corps, of all the ambulances, medicine and other wagons, horses, and men in that portion of the ambulance corps. He will be the acting assistant quartermaster for that portion of the ambulance corps, and will receipt for and be responsible for all the property belonging to it, and be held responsible for any deficiency in anything appertaining thereto. He will have a traveling cavalry forge, a blacksmith, and a saddler, who will be under his orders, to enable him to keep his train in order. He will have authority to draw supplies from the depot quartermaster, upon requisitions approved by the captain of his corps and the commander of the Army corps to which he is attached; and it shall be his duty to exercise a constant supervision over his train in every particular, and keep it at all times ready for service.

The second lieutenant will have command of the portion of the ambulance corps for a brigade, and will be under the immediate orders of the first lieutenant, and he will exercise a careful supervision over the sergeants and privates assigned to the portion of the ambulance corps for his brigade; and it will be the duty of the sergeants to conduct the drills and inspections of the ambulances of their respective regiments.

It is to be the duty of the surgeon-in-chief of the division to detail two medical officers and two hospital stewards daily, by roster, to accompany the ambulances of the division when on the march, to attend to the sick and wounded in the ambulances, and to see that they are properly cared for; but no person is to be allowed to enter and ride in an ambulance after the march is commenced without the written permission of the senior medical officer of his regiment. No sick or wounded man, who requires to be carried in an ambulance, will be rejected for want of such written permission, but the senior surgeon with the train will report to the surgeon-in-chief of the division the name of the surgeon of the regiment who may have neglected or refused to give such written permission. When on the march, one half of the privates of the ambulance corps are to accompany, on foot, the ambulances to which they belong, to render such assistance as may be required. The remainder will march in the rear of their respective commands, to conduct, under the order of the medical officer, such men as may be unable to proceed to the ambulances, or who may be incapable of taking proper care of themselves until the ambulances come up. When the case is of so serious a nature as to require it, the surgeon of the regiment, or his assistant, will remain and deliver the man to one of the medical officers with the ambulances. At all other times the privates are to be with their respective trains. The medicine wagons will, on the march, be in their proper places, in the rear of the ambulances for each brigade. Upon ordinary marches the ambulances and wagons belonging to the train will follow immediately in the rear of the division to which such train is attached. Officers connected with the corps must be with the train when on the march; but nothing contained in this bill is to be construed to prohibit the commander of an army, of an Army corps, or of an expedition, on the march, from giving the necessary orders to meet any exigency which may arise.

The ambulances in the armies of the United States are to be used only for the transportation of the sick and wounded, and, in urgent cases only, for medical supplies, and all officers are to be prohibited from using them, or requiring them to be used, for any other purpose. It will be the duty of the officers of the ambulance corps to report to the commander of the Army corps any violation of this provision, or any attempt to violate the same. And any officer who shall use an ambulance, or require it to be used, for any other purpose than as provided in this bill, for the first offense is to be publicly reprimanded by the commander of the Army corps in which he may be serving, and for the second offense be dismissed from the service. In all cases when ambulances are used the officers, non-commissioned officers, and men belonging to them will accompany them. When ambulances are required for the transportation of sick or wounded at division, brigade, or regimental headquarters, they may be obtained, as they are needed for that purpose, from the division train, but no ambulances belonging to this corps are to be retained at such headquarters. Whenever it may be necessary for a regimental medical officer to use one or more ambulances for transporting sick or wounded, or to accompany an expedition where they may be required for that purpose, he will make a requisition upon the first lieutenant of the ambulance corps for his division, whose duty it will be to comply with the requisition. No person except the proper medical officers, or the officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates of the ambulance corps are to be permitted to take or accompany sick or wounded men to the rear, either on the march or upon the field of battle. The officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates of the ambulance corps will be designated in such manner as the Secretary of War shall deem proper. Officers and men may be relieved from service in the corps, and others detailed to the same, subject to the examination provided in the second section, in the discretion of the commanders of the armies in which they may be serving.

The first amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia was to insert, after the word "shall," in line four of section one, the words, "under the control of the medical director of the army to which such Army corps belongs."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line six of section one to insert, after the word "medicine," the words "and other;" so as to read, "medicine and other wagons."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section two, line two, after the word "detail," to insert "officers and enlisted men."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section two, after the word "corps," in line three, to insert "upon the following basis, namely:"

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line nine of section two, to strike out the word "medicine" before "wagon."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section three, lines two, three, four, and five, to strike out the words, "and permanently attached to each regiment of infantry, three two-horse ambulances; to each regiment of cavalry, two such ambulances; to each battery of artillery, one ambulance," and in lieu of them to insert these words:

To each Army corps two-horse ambulances, upon the following basis, namely: three to each regiment of infantry of five hundred men or more; two to each regiment of infantry of two hundred men or more; and one to each regiment of infantry of less than two hundred men; two to each regiment of cavalry of five hundred men or more; and one to each regiment of cavalry of less than five hundred men; one to each battery of artillery—to which battery of artillery it shall be permanently attached.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to make a slight amendment in that amendment. Instead of reading "two to each regiment of infantry of two hundred men or more," I propose to make it read, "two to each regiment of infantry of more than two hundred and less than five hundred men." It only expresses the idea more clearly.

The amendment to the amendment was adopted; and the amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1864.

NEW SERIES....No. 30.

The next amendment was after the word "division," in line fifteen of section three, to insert the words, "train of ambulances;" so as to read, "to each division train of ambulances two Army wagons."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section four to strike out the words, in lines twenty-five, twenty-six, twenty-seven, and twenty-eight, "to issue the proper orders to the captain for the distribution of the ambulances for getting up the sick and wounded previous to and in time of action, and for the conveyance of the same while on the march;" and in lieu of them to insert:

Previous to a march, and previous to and in time of action, or whenever it may be necessary to use the ambulances, to issue the proper orders to the captain for the distribution and management of the same; for collecting the sick and wounded, and conveying them to their destination.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after "Surgeon General," in line thirty-seven of section four, to insert "the medical director of the army."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after "serving," in line thirty-nine of section four, the words, "and all reports to higher authority than the commanding officer of the Army corps shall be transmitted through the medical director of the army to which such Army corps belongs."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the seventh section of the bill, in the following words:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the surgeon-in-chief of the division to detail two medical officers and two hospital stewards daily, by roster, to accompany the ambulances of the division when on the march, to attend to the sick and wounded in the ambulances, and to see that they are properly cared for; but no person shall be allowed to enter and ride in an ambulance after the march is commenced without the written permission of the senior medical officer of his regiment: Provided, That no sick or wounded man, who requires to be carried in an ambulance, shall be rejected for want of such written permission, but the senior surgeon with the train shall report to the surgeon-in-chief of the division the name of the surgeon of the regiment who may have neglected or refused to give such written permission. When on the march one half of the privates of the ambulance corps shall accompany, on foot, the ambulances to which they belong, to render such assistance as may be required. The remainder shall march in the rear of their respective commands, to conduct, under the order of the medical officer, such men as may be unable to proceed to the ambulances, or who may be incapable of taking proper care of themselves until the ambulances come up. When the case is of so serious a nature as to require it, the surgeon of the regiment, or his assistant, shall remain and deliver the man to one of the medical officers with the ambulances. At all other times the privates shall be with their respective trains. The medical wagons will on the march be in their proper places in the rear of the ambulances for each brigade. Upon ordinary marches the ambulances and wagons belonging to the train will follow immediately in the rear of the division to which such train is attached. Officers connected with the corps must be with the train when on the march: Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall be construed to prohibit the commander of an army, of an Army corps, or of an expedition, on the march, from giving the necessary orders to meet any exigency which may arise.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section eight, line four, to strike out the word "officers," and to insert the word "persons."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section eight, line fourteen, after the word "service," to strike out the following words:

In all cases when ambulances are used the officers, non-commissioned officers, and men belonging to them will accompany them. When ambulances are required for the transportation of sick or wounded at division, brigade, or regimental headquarters, they may be obtained as they are needed for this purpose from the division train, but no ambulances belonging to this corps shall be retained at such headquarters. Whenever it may be necessary for a regimental medical officer to use one or more ambulances for transporting sick or wounded, or to accompany an expedition where they may be required for that purpose, he shall make a requisition upon the first lieutenant of the ambulance corps for his division, whose duty it shall be to comply with such requisition.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section nine, line three, after the word "corps," to insert the words

"or such persons as may be specially assigned, by competent military authority, to duty with the ambulance corps for the occasion;" so that the section will read:

That no person except the proper medical officers, or the officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates of the ambulance corps, or such persons as may be specially assigned, by competent military authority, to do duty with the ambulance corps for the occasion, shall be permitted to take or accompany sick or wounded men to the rear, either on march or upon the field of battle.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section ten, line three, after the word "designated," to insert "by such uniform or;" so that it will read:

That the officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates of the ambulance corps shall be designated by such uniform or in such manner as the Secretary of War shall deem proper.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following at the end of the bill as a new section:

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the commander of the Army corps to transmit to the Adjutant General the names and rank of all officers and enlisted men detailed for service in the ambulance corps of such Army corps, stating the organizations from which they may have been so detailed; and if such officers and men belong to volunteer organizations, the Adjutant General shall thereupon notify the Governors of the several States in which such organizations were raised of their detail for such service; and it shall be the duty of the commander of the Army corps to report to the Adjutant General from time to time the conduct and behavior of the officers and enlisted men of the ambulance corps, and the Adjutant General shall forward copies of such reports, so far as they relate to officers and enlisted men of volunteer organizations, to the Governors of the States in which such organizations were raised.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following at the end of the bill as a new section:

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be construed to diminish or impair the rightful authority of the commanders of armies, Army corps, or separate detachments, over the medical and other officers and the non-commissioned officers and privates of their respective commands.

The amendment was agreed to.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. That disposes of the amendments reported by the committee.

MR. WILSON. In section three, line fifteen, after the word "wagons," I move to insert these words:

And ambulances shall be allowed and furnished to divisions, brigades, and commands not attached to any Army corps upon the same basis.

The amendment was agreed to.

MR. WILSON. Mr. President, I desire to say a word or two in explanation of the provisions of this bill. The amendments that have been adopted by the Committee on Military Affairs and sanctioned by the Senate were the suggestions that came from officers in the Army and medical men connected with the Army. After the bill was introduced, the committee sent to several generals in different parts of the country and to leading medical men copies of the bill with the request that they should give us their opinions of it. We have the opinions of quite a number of general officers and of some of the medical directors of the Army, and we have made these modifications in accordance with their suggestions, keeping the bill substantially as it was introduced.

The bill was framed upon the order of Colonel Letterman, providing for an ambulance corps for the army of the Potomac, which was adopted at Harrison's Landing in August, 1862, and has been modified by orders since that date. Other armies have since organized ambulance corps on substantially the same plan that was introduced into the army of the Potomac. The bill introduced into the Senate and now before it for consideration is based substantially upon these various Army orders. We have stricken out an entire section of the bill relating to operations in the field, with a view of leaving that matter to such modifications and directions as may be necessary at different times and in different locations of the country, and in different armies; but the bill is substantially the bill as first introduced into the Senate.

It will be remembered that at the last session of Congress numerous petitions were presented and referred to the Committees on Military Affairs in both Houses, asking for a uniform ambulance system in the country. The Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate gave a great deal of time to the consideration of the subject. We had before the committee gentlemen who took an interest in the subject from various parts of the country. They gave us their views and their opinions. We consulted with the leading medical men of the Army and many generals in the Army, and we found the weight of opinion both of medical men and of Army officers to be overwhelmingly against the plan submitted to us. That plan provided for the appointment of some four or five hundred officers, and for the enlistment of from ten to twelve thousand men to have the care of the ambulances. It was desired by the gentlemen interested that the ambulances and all matters pertaining to them should not be under the control of the quartermasters of the Army, but should be under the control of the medical department of the Army.

This measure was for a long time before the Committee on Military Affairs. While they were considering the subject, it was introduced into the House of Representatives and, as the Journals and the Globe will show, considered very lightly, and passed through the House of Representatives. Their bill came here and was referred by the Senate to the Committee on Military Affairs in this body, and after the most thorough examination that we could give the subject, the committee could not come to the conclusion to adopt that bill. They believed that the system that had been organized in the army of the Potomac, which had been adopted in General Grant's army and General Rosecrans's army and General Foster's army and General Banks's army with certain modifications adapted to their armies and their sections of the country, was a far better system than the one proposed by that bill. They were sustained in that opinion by nineteen twentieths of the medical men and the officers of the Army. It was believed by the committee that the plan ought not to be adopted. They reported against its adoption, and their report was accepted without any division in the Senate.

The committee believed, and subsequent reflection sustains them in the belief, that the existing system was an admirable system; that, like everything else connected with our Army, it was improving; and that it might be made just as perfect as anything connected with the Army could be made. By that system, officers could be detailed from the various corps to perform this duty. If they failed to do their duty well they could be sent back again immediately. Privates could be detailed from other regiments to do this duty. If they did not do it well they could be immediately sent back to their regiments and new men detailed. Most of the men engaged in this service had been in it for months, and some of them for nearly two years. Many of those men had been wounded on fields of battle in the performance of their duty. It was believed that new officers and new men enlisted for this purpose would not compare in efficiency with the officers and men who had been detailed to perform that service, and that it would be a cruelty and a wrong to our soldiers in the field to take away veteran officers and veteran soldiers and enlist new officers and raw soldiers to perform this great duty.

Well, sir, time has passed by. We are here now considering this bill. Every hour's reflection goes to justify the position we then held; and to-day there are but few men in the country that ask us to make four or five hundred new officers and to enlist eight or ten thousand raw men to perform a duty that is now being performed by detailed officers and detailed men who have become veterans in the service and thoroughly understand their business. The committee, therefore, accepted the system that had grown up in the Army, and desired to make it a uniform system for all the armies of the country.

We sent to several of our leading officers to know their opinion on the subject. General Grant writes that the system as now proposed is a good one; that it may be subject to modifications that can be made by orders; but it is an admirable system to be adopted for all our armies. General Hooker says in regard to it, after suggesting a modification which has been adopted by the Senate, "in other respects I regard the bill as unexceptionable."

Mr. JOHNSON. Was a copy of the bill sent to him?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir, a copy of the original bill was sent to him. General Sykes, who commands a corps in the army of the Potomac, says:

"In its main provisions, it is identical with orders No. 85 of this army, of August 24, 1863. The system established in those orders has been tested and found highly satisfactory."

General Sedgwick, who commands the sixth Army corps, says:

"It is essentially the same as now organized in this army, and has been found to work admirably."

General French says of this bill:

"The system as embodied in the bill is almost practically perfect."

General Pleasanton who commands the cavalry of the army of the Potomac, says of the bill:

"I am very glad to find it so nearly accords with the system adopted for the service in this army. The experience of the past eighteen months has shown that the necessities of the service will be fully met by the provisions of your bill. While it provides in the most ample manner for the care of the sick and wounded, the checks against any abuse are well considered, and will prove effective."

General Thomas writes a letter indorsing the bill and suggesting an amendment which has been adopted by the committee. All the amendments recommended by general officers to modify the bill were mere matters of detail, and have been incorporated into the bill, and with those modifications it has the sanction of these general officers and also the sanction of several leading medical men who have examined the subject. I have full confidence, therefore, that the bill as it now stands will answer all the purposes needed. It is a general direction and guide, leaving sufficient scope for medical directors of armies to issue orders and make such modifications and changes of detail as may be necessary from time to time in their several armies. By striking out one section of the bill which provided for the administration in the field, we leave that whole subject to be regulated by orders, as we think it ought to be; for there should be, and must be, perhaps, some little difference of detail of operation between an army like the army of the Potomac, moving on land entirely, and an army situated in some other part of the country where they use boats and river communication or railroad communication, and have them at their command.

I think, therefore, sir, that the bill as it now stands will meet the needs of the country. It extends to all our armies the system adopted eighteen months ago in the army of the Potomac, and which at Fredericksburg, at Chancellorsville, and at Gettysburg, according to the testimony of our officers, worked most admirably. It has been improving every day, and no doubt will continue to improve so long as the war lasts; for, in this department, as in every other, they are every day learning something.

It has been suggested that we might introduce into the service mule litters. I think that power now exists in the War Department, and could be put under the same regulation; but if any gentleman thinks it necessary to introduce it into this bill, I certainly have no objection, leaving the matter optional with the Government to introduce it. I would not say here that they should do it, but would leave it to their option to introduce it. The present kind of ambulance has been found by experience to work very well. There are persons in the country who think they make better ones. That may be so; but we choose not to settle that question here, but to allow the proper departments to settle it. It is a matter of administration, and not of legislation.

Mr. JOHNSON. The explanation of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, so far as I am able to understand the subject, seems to be quite satisfactory. I understand him to say substantially that the system which his bill proposes is the system which has been in operation in the army of the Potomac for some fifteen or eighteen months, and the effect of the bill is merely to make that system uniform throughout the several armies of the United States. I was about to ask him whether in addition to the approval which he has cited, which is satisfactory to me personally, the bill has been submitted to the War Department and has received their sanction, or whether they have been consulted on the subject?

Mr. WILSON. The bill has not been formally submitted to the War Department, but I understand from conversations with the Secretary of War that the plan adopted in the army of the Potomac, and which has been used in the country, was such as he was in favor of, and such as General Halleck was in favor of. The plan proposed last year differed from this one in three respects. In the first place, the ambulances, horses, and all matters pertaining thereto, were to be under the direction and control, not of the quartermasters of the Army, but of the medical men of the Army. That was objected to on the ground that it would make it cumbersome, would require two quartermaster's assistants in reality in the same army, and that it was a thing that must not be. Nearly all the general officers of the Army were against it, and the overwhelming mass of the best medical men connected with the Army.

The next point was to organize the system in this way. By the system adopted in the army of the Potomac, and in all the other armies, the officers and men are detailed temporarily. If they do their duty well, they are retained; if they do not, they can send them back again at any hour. The practice has generally been to examine the officers and see if they were fit for the service. We provide in this bill that the officers shall be examined by a board to see if they are fit for this special duty. The proposition last year was to appoint some four or five hundred additional officers for all the armies of the country, which would create a large expense, and bring in a new class of officers. We thought that the old officers who would not add to the expense, being detailed for the service, would be better than the new ones. They would certainly be better until the new ones had learned a little of their duties.

That plan proposed also to enlist the men for this particular service. You would have to enlist new men, and it would take six or twelve months to enable those men to perform their duties as well as they are now performed by the men detailed for that purpose. We thought that was not a good plan. If we had time to prepare these men for the service, it might be a better plan, or it might be just as good, although, in my judgment, nothing can be better than the plan of detailing for this service; because, if a man is detailed to perform this duty and does not do it well, all that it is necessary to do is, not to bring him up and try and punish him, but send him back to his regiment and call for a good man.

It so happens that the soldiers like this duty. They are desirous of getting into this very corps, and just as many of them are desirous of getting into the quartermaster's and commissary's departments. These places are sought for. Under the present system we have the security where men seek the place that they can be sent back if they do not do their duty. It is said to be punishment enough generally to the soldier to tell him that if he fails in this duty again he will be remanded back to his regiment; and it is said that is a good corrective for the future.

Now, sir, this bill is simply a recognition of the present system in the army of the Potomac, applying it to all parts of the country. It has the weight of nearly all the Army officers and nearly all the experienced medical men of the country; and I am told in letters from some gentlemen who have strongly urged the other system, and who now find that that system will not be adopted, as consideration shows that it is not so good as the present system, that they are abundantly content with the bill as it now stands.

Mr. GRIMES. I have no amendment to propose to the bill, and have no objection to it, and shall vote for it; but I wish to call the attention of the committee to what I have already called the attention of the chairman of the committee to; and that is this: this bill goes upon the idea that there are to be no other than two-horse ambulances. It assigns a certain number of two-horse ambulances to every division, corps, brigade, and regiment, and assigns the number of officers who shall be connected with any particular number of wagons and the number of privates. Now, sir, we do not know where this war is going to be carried on in the future. It may be in the mountains of Tennessee or it may be in the swamps of Louisiana. If carried on in either of these places it will be just as necessary to have an ambulance corps there as it is on the plains of Maryland; but it may not be possible to have the same system there that you have here.

We all know that in the French service the mule litters or horse litters are almost exclusively used, and they are pronounced by French officers and surgeons to be superior to the wheel vehicles. It seems to me there ought to be a section attached to this bill which would authorize the War Department, or the commander of an army or a corps—I do not care where the power is vested—to change the character of these ambulances and to assign officers and men to the horse and mule litters in about the same proportion as they are now assigned to wheel ambulances. That is all I have to say. The bill is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. JOHNSON. We had better lay it on the table for the present.

Mr. GRIMES. I would not want to do that unless the Senator from Massachusetts is willing.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understood him to say he had no objection to it.

Mr. GRIMES. I think that amendment ought to be made.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move to lay the bill on the table until to-morrow morning.

Mr. WILSON. Wait a moment, and I will try to prepare such an amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. Very well.

Mr. JOHNSON. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. WILSON. I offer the following amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That horse and mule litters may be adopted by the Secretary of War in lieu of ambulances when judged necessary, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the medical director of each army.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think the amendment should read that they may be adopted "or authorized." I will move to insert the words "or authorized" after the word "adopted."

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be so modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

PAY OF COLORED TROOPS.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom the subject was referred, reported a joint resolution (S. No. 23) to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to have the joint resolution read in full, if there is no objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read at length, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read it. It directs that all persons of color who have been or may be mustered into the military service of the United States shall receive the same uniform, clothing, arms, equipments, camp equipage, rations, medical and hospital attendance, pay and emoluments other than bounty, as other soldiers of the regular or volunteer forces of the United States, of like arm of service, during the whole term in which they shall be or shall have been in such service; and every person of color who shall hereafter be mustered into the service is to receive such sums in bounty as the President shall order, in the different States and parts of the United States, not exceeding $100.

Mr. WILSON. I suppose it is not in order to discuss this bill unless with the unanimous consent of the Senate. I should like to make an explanation of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the further consideration of this bill at the present time. Is there any objection?

Mr. POWELL. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, it must go over.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Kansas, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 3, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. PENDLETON asked unanimous consent to introduce a bill to provide that the Secretaries of Executive Departments may occupy seats on the floor of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOLMAN objected.

SHIP CANAL AROUND NIAGARA FALLS.

Mr. SPALDING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to facilitate the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of Niagara; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

OBJECTS OF THE WAR.

Mr. COFFROTH asked unanimous consent to introduce the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas this once happy and prosperous nation has been for nearly three years attempting to crush a cruel, unjust, and unrighteous rebellion; and whereas Congress did on the 22d of July, 1861, with unparalleled unanimity declare "that in this national emergency Congress, banishing all feelings of mere passion or resentment, will recollect only its duty to the whole country; that this war is not waged on their part in any spirit of oppression, or for any purpose of conquest, or subjugation, or purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of these States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; and that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease;" and whereas the President of the United States did, on the 22d of September, A. D. 1862, and on the 1st of January, A. D. 1863, and on the 8th of December, A. D. 1863, issue proclamations in direct violation of this resolution; and whereas said proclamations have divided the Union people of the North, who at one time were united in their efforts to crush the rebellion: Therefore, in order to unite all the Union-loving people, and to carry out the spirit of said resolution and restore the "Union as it was" under the "Constitution as it is,"

He it resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to withdraw said proclamations, so that all the Union-loving people may again unite to maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired.

Mr. GRINNELL objected.

STOCKBRIDGE INDIANS IN WISCONSIN.

Mr. SLOAN, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be, and are hereby, instructed to inquire into the condition of the Stockbridge Indians in the State of Wisconsin, and the quality of the lands as regards soil and productiveness assigned to and now occupied by said Indians; and if it shall be found that said lands are unproductive and sterile, then to inquire into the justness and propriety of taking the necessary steps to exchange such lands for those that are sufficiently productive to enable said Indians, by the exercise of a reasonable amount of industry, to subsist and to acquire some of the comforts of life; and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HOLMAN. On Friday last the committees were not called for report of private bills. I ask leave now to report a bill from the Committee of Claims for reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PENDLETON objected.

HARRIET K. BELTON.

On motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Harriet K. Belton, to be returned to the claimant.

BOUNTIES TO VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. KELLOGG, of New York, asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be requested to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for bounties to be paid to such volunteers as regularly enlisted into the regiments first called out by the President for two years, and were honorably discharged from the service with such regiments, and before the expiration of two years, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HOLMAN. As there is no objection to the introduction of that resolution, it is before the House, and I propose to offer an amendment. I move to amend by striking out the words "requested to inquire into the expediency of" and insert the words "directed to report a bill." The subject has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs without producing any kind of result. From the number of resolutions submitted of this character it is manifest that the House deems this a legitimate subject of legislation.

Mr. ELIOT. I objected.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit the motion to strike out all the resolution which makes it a matter of inquiry, and to insert what will make it a resolution imperative upon the Committee on Military Affairs to report a bill for paying that class of soldiers who have been discharged within two years' service.

Mr. ELIOT. I want to debate that resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution was introduced by unanimous consent, and it is therefore before the House for action.

Mr. FENTON. The gentleman from Massachusetts, I believe, objected to the introduction of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and it is impossible for the Chair to recognize objections unless gentlemen rise in their seats and object.

Mr. ELIOT. I rose in my seat and objected.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman object when the resolution was introduced?

Mr. ELIOT. I did.

The SPEAKER. The Chair heard no objection; but as the gentleman from Massachusetts says he objected in proper time, the resolution is not before the House.

CONFISCATED PROPERTY.

The regular order of business being called for, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 18) to amend "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, on which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WADSWORTH] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The discussion of this subject, I am aware, has lasted long enough to take away its principal attractions. Certainly a great deal has been said that I would wish to say, but I believe not all; otherwise I should not now trouble the House, content to listen to others where so few will listen to me.

I shall not consume much time in discussing the constitutional interpretation of article three, section three. I think that part of the debate is pretty well exhausted, and I only wonder at that ingenuity which can say so much about so plain a matter. And, sir, without intending any disrespect to anybody, I must be allowed to say I have very little regard for that discovery which declares that, in the meaning of the Constitution, (article three, section three,) Congress has unlimited power to declare the punishment of treason, a discovery first introduced to the privileges of a courthouse by an adventurer whom the plastic hand of the President has indeed made a judge, but can never make a lawyer; and I would waste my time and the time of the House to dwell at any length upon that subject. It is left to the lesser file upon the other side of the House, by interpretations "too picked, too spruce," to find a justification in the Constitution for unlimited power in Congress to confiscate for the crime of treason, a construction already confuted and repudiated in this discussion by the ablest minds on the other side. I shall dismiss that part of the subject with a few observations, and advance to the discussion of the only ground upon which a respectable argument can be made in favor of that confiscation act to which the Judiciary Committee have offered their amendment. I mean, sir, that argument which places the right of confiscation among our war rights, among the rights conferred by the laws of nations, the right of conquest. And, sir, I feel that I am indebted to the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS], and I cordially return him my thanks, for having led this discussion away from this ingenious and novel interpretation of a plain clause of the Constitution, which we all supposed was well understood, to an inquiry into what are our rights in this war, not "public war," as he calls it, but this civil war against a rebel belligerent power.

I am not, sir, in the habit of admiring discoveries in legal science. I receive them at all times with the greatest caution and the greatest suspicion. That which has escaped the observation of Marshall and Story and other judicial luminaries for so many generations I may be permitted to doubt the value of, although brought to my attention by the great jurists of this House; I may be permitted to doubt whether this new light is indeed the true sun in heaven or only a jack-o'-lantern that has arisen to dazzle and lead us astray.

Sir, in times like these, questions of public law, questions of constitutional law do not depend upon commas dragged from the dust and cobwebs of seventy-seven years, nor upon the torture of a poor plain word, nor the depreciation of protesting jurists, crowned by the judgment of Christendom. And, sir, I do not suppose that this House or this country would undertake to march forward in the career of conquest and subjugation or of reconstruction upon any such nice interpretations or any such discoveries as those to which I have alluded. There are a few old-fashioned principles that are ineradicable from the American heart and mind, upon which I am content to rest, believing that the time will come when the American people, escaping from the jaws of revolution, will return to them for shelter and security. Among these are the right of trial by jury for "all crimes except in cases of impeachment," (article three, section two,) the right to be secure in our liberty, our lives, and our property except they be taken from us "by due process of law," (Constitution, fifth Amendment,) which rights are all violated by the act which the committee propose to amend.

I trust, sir, I will be pardoned for making one or two observations, before I proceed to discuss the matter which chiefly attracts my interest, upon the interpretation of article three, section three, of the Constitution. Gentlemen who invoke its aid yet differ upon it. Some assign one reason why this clause does not limit confiscation as punishment for treason, and some another. We are told, for instance, that the sole purpose of the language qualifying the power conferred upon Congress to declare the punishment of treason was to take away from Congress the power exercised in times past by the Parliament of Great Britain to attain and punish by confiscation or forfeiture persons who had long been dead, as in the case of Richard the Third, who fell at the battle of Bosworth field. Such a purpose as that would have been idle, because the Constitution had already declared that Congress should pass no bill of attainder, and had already adopted the fundamental principles of process, indictment, and trial by jury of "all crimes except in cases of impeachment." There could be no judicial punishment of a criminal deceased by our laws, nor was it so by the laws of England. Parliament only in the exercise of an assumed omnipotence punished the dead.

But, sir, this act confiscates the property of a man long since dead; long after death it takes the property of the person described in the act; it makes no matter in what disastrous battle he fell or by what dispensation of Providence he was removed from the presence and power of his fellow-men; the courts by this novel proceeding in criminal cases, the proceeding in rem, are to persevere, seize, condemn, and sell his property. How can there be two opinions upon the subject? There can be but two sorts of attaints, a legislative attain and a judicial attain. The Constitution forbids a legislative attain, and then it proceeds, after giving Congress power to declare the punishment of treason, in this way and in the same sentence: "But no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood," &c.; a qualification of the unlimited power to declare the punishment of treason contained in the first part of the sentence. But gentlemen say that that means the common law shall not "work corruption of blood or forfeiture," &c., but that Congress, by its enactment, may provide penalties which shall work corruption of blood and forfeiture for treason. And yet, sir, strange enough, the whole power and its limitation is in one sentence: "The Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason, but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted." What sort of attainder? None which Congress by any enactment can provide, for Congress cannot stain by bill nor empower the courts to stain by sentence. Our ancestors thought they had put an end to the war upon the family and upon property for the political crime of treason. So the people ever since supposed, until Underwood & Co. poured the flood-tide of a new light upon the subject.

I pass from that. Let it go. The true inquiry is that into which the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, went the other day with sufficient boldness, if not with sufficient candor. He who takes his position as a leader in times like these ought always to take it boldly and in advance, and thus make himself responsible to his followers, to contemporaries, and to history. We are in a war, he says, in a public war, a war between two foreign nations. He says that, being in a state of war, the laws of nations confer upon us certain belligerent rights which not only exist while the war continues but remain when the war shall be over. Among these rights, he says, is the right of conquest. It is a war, he says, which treats every person inside the hostile territory as an enemy, be he friend or foe, citizen or foreigner, who is in the predicament of residence in the hostile territory.

I desire, Mr. Speaker, since I have the greatest respect for the intelligence of that gentleman, for the boldness with which he meets all these questions, for the great ability which he brings to the discussion of them, and for the spirit of courtesy and fairness which he always extends to an opponent in debate, to state with some precision the exact position that he assumes. It is not the position of a solitary unimportant individual, but the position of a leading man in this House and in the country. My own opinion is that "whoever hits him on the head will knock out the brains of" the Republican party. [Laughter.] He says:

"I begin simply by denying that the Constitution has the least reference to any one of the provisions of the bill in question, and I intend to show that the act of 1862, which was modified by a resolution which, it has been truly said, was passed under duress very little to the credit of the Congress that passed it—that act of 1862 is not affected directly or indirectly by any one of the provisions of the Constitution, and that especially that part of the act which provides for seizing property and confiscating it in fee simple is purely a proceeding under the laws of war and under the laws of nations, over which the Constitution has no control, and in regard to which it has no effect whatever."

And he proceeds to argue that the property is to be seized and condemned not as the property of persons guilty of the crime of treason, but as enemies under the laws of nations. He says:

"This act of Congress, so far as it refers to seizures of property in fee, refers to them as seizures of the property of alien enemies, to be treated as such."

I understand him distinctly to repudiate the idea that we may hold these persons criminally responsible to our municipal laws for acts done since they have risen to the dignity of belligerents. He says that we cannot do it, and that in point of fact we do not do it; that having ourselves appealed to the laws of nations to interpret our rights in this war; having claimed the benefit of that condemnation in prize courts which the laws of nations authorize; having captured on the high seas the property of our own friends—perhaps the most loyal men of the South—we cannot now repudiate the laws of nations in any particular when applicable to the contest; and that, consequently, for acts done by any of those men since they have been subject to a belligerent power, with the rights of belligerents, they are not criminally responsible to our municipal laws, but only as enemies and to the laws of war. I agree with him in that.

The speaker's views as to the source of our right of confiscation as well as the relation of the States held by the rebel power to the parent Government are still further illustrated by another passage which I will read:

"It is, however, essential to ascertain what relation the seceded States bear to the United States, that we may know how to deal with them in re-establishing the national Government. There seems to be great confusion of ideas and diversity of opinion on that subject. Some think that those States are still in the Union and entitled to the protection of the Constitution and laws of the United States, and that, notwithstanding all they have done, may at any time, without any legislation, come back, send Senators and Representatives to Congress, and enjoy all the privileges and immunities of loyal members of the United States. That whenever those 'wayward sisters' choose to abandon their frivolities and present themselves at the door of the Union and demand admission, we must receive them with open arms, and throw over them the protecting shield of the Union, of which it is said they had never ceased to be members. Others hold that, having committed treason, renounced their allegiance to the Union, discarded its Constitution and laws, organized a distinct and hostile government, and by force of arms having risen from the condition of insurgents to the position of an independent Power de facto, and having been acknowledged as a belligerent both by foreign nations and our own Government, the Constitution and laws of the Union are abrogated so far as they are concerned, and that, as between the two belligerents, they are under the laws of war and the laws of nations alone, and that whichever Power conquers may treat the vanquished as conquered provinces, and may impose upon them such conditions and laws as it may deem best."

Again he says:

"Is the present contest to be regarded as a public war, and to be governed by the rules of civilized warfare, or only as a domestic insurrection, to be suppressed by criminal prosecutions before the courts of the country?"

The honorable gentleman answers in the affirmative, and repudiates the idea that they are traitors, criminally responsible to our municipal laws for acts done during the war. He endeavors, by citing a line from Judge Grier in the prize cases, to prove it a public war. And subsequently he inquires, "What, then, is the effect of this public war between these belligerents, these foreign nations?" He answers, in substance, that it abrogated all constitutional relations between the parent Government and the "organized States" in revolt, and put them out of the Union, with the right of conquest on their part as against us and the right of conquest on our part as against them. If conquered, all the people, loyal and disloyal, with their property, real and personal, are subject, not to the Constitution, but the laws of nations and of war.

"From all this the legitimate conclusion is, that all the people and all the territory within the limits of the organized States which, by a legitimate majority of their citizens, renounced the Constitution, took their States out of the Union, and made war upon the Government, are, so far as they are concerned, subject to the laws of the State; and, so far as the United States Government is concerned, subject to the laws of war and of nations, both while the war continues and when it shall be ended."

"By the laws of war the conqueror may seize and convert to his own use everything that belongs to the enemy. This may be done while the war is raging to weaken the enemy, and when it is ended the things seized may be retained to pay the expenses of the war and the damages caused by it. Towns, cities, and provinces may be held as a punishment for an unjust war, and as security against future aggressions. The property thus taken is not confiscated under the Constitution after conviction for treason, but is held by virtue of the laws of war. No individual crime need be proved against the owners. The fact of being a belligerent enemy carries the forfeiture with it. Here was the error of the President when he vetoed the confiscation bill passed by Congress. In the confusion of business he overlooked the distinction between a traitor and a belligerent enemy."

After claiming these extensive and extraordinary rights and powers, derivable from the laws of war and from the laws of nations, he proceeds to declare that he would execute them. "Towns, cities, provinces;" "every inch of soil of the guilty portion of this usurping power," he would confiscate, sell, and put into the Treasury. He would emancipate, of course; but that is done already; he would therefore only amend the Constitution and forever forbid slaveholding (of negroes) in America.

Finally, he winds up with this saying:

"The Union as it was and the Constitution as it is is an atrocious idea. It is man-stealing."

To some of these positions I give my assent. From others I dissent. The conclusion to which he comes I protest against and abhor. We are belligerents and have belligerent rights. Everybody inside the hostile territory is an enemy of the United States, be he friend or foe, in the prize-court sense of the term, but not in the common-law sense of the term. Their property on the high seas we may justly capture, condemn, and appropriate. All that are in line of battle or in any hostile position toward us, we may smite down with physical force, friend or foe; our bullets may not choose between them; the best and most loving heart that ever throbbed in the bosom of man may thus be pierced by our bullets, and we stand guiltless before God and man. They are necessarily public enemies, whether willingly so or not in individual cases; that is their predicament, and I accept the consequences that legitimately follow from it.

I admit that we must go to the laws of nations and not to the Constitution of the United States to interpret what war means, and for the rules to be observed in conducting it.

Our Constitution gives to us—to Congress and not to the President—the right to make war, but it does not define what war is. The laws of nations define that.

WAR IS THE REMEDY AND NOT THE RIGHT. It is said to be the prosecution of a national right by force (2 Black, page 666.) Some right has been obstructed, denied, or attacked by a hostile belligerent power, and we prosecute it, defend it, vindicate it, by war. The laws of nations define what public war means—a war between foreign nations; and what civil war means—a war carried on within the State, like the present contest.

And I submit that the honorable gentleman has fallen into an error in characterizing this as a "public war," or in supposing that Judge Grier meant to characterize it as a public war. I find in the very sentence from which the gentleman takes his quotation, the distinction clearly laid down between public and civil war. Public war is declared to be between independent and foreign nations, and civil war a struggle carried on within the State in which one party may have both sovereign and belligerent rights.

Our sovereign rights, it is true, are for the time obstructed, until by the exercise of our belligerent rights we have restored them. But, sir, whether this contest be a war carried on within the State or between "foreign nations," we must look to the laws of nations, to the laws of war, to interpret the manner in which the contest must be conducted.

But I am astonished how any gentleman can refer us to the laws of nations in support of this act which the bill now before us proposes to amend, in the support of the amendment or in support of the position taken by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] and those who agree with him.

Why, sir, the usages of nations in modern times forbid the very means which the gentleman would employ and the whole policy which he advocates. The laws of nations recognize the right of conquest between the parties to a public war, but do not authorize the seizure and confiscation of private property on land only in excepted cases; they do not authorize the conquest of individual property. On the contrary, they forbid it.

I am not going into a lengthy citation of authorities. They have been quoted freely in the discussions upon this bill. They were cited fully and pertinently the other day by the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINCK,] and I content myself now, in the main, with a mere reference to them. I rely upon all writers upon the public law who state the rule among civilized nations in modern times. Their testimony is uniform and explicit, uttering a united voice of condemnation upon the policy which the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] demands. I rely upon the principles declared by all the civilized nations of the world in modern times, French, British, and American, in State papers, treaties, and diplomatic assemblies, to support the declaration of the elementary writers, that by the usages of the civilized nations of modern times, private property upon land is exempt from the spoiliations of war, exempt from seizure and confiscation, except in certain specified cases. Wheaton states the rule in clear and precise terms:

"But by the modern usages of nations, which has now acquired the force of law, temples of religion, public edifices devoted to civil purposes only, monuments of art, and repositories of science are exempted from the general operations of war. Private property on land is also exempt from confiscation, with the exception of such as may become booty in special cases, when taken from enemies in the field or in besieged towns, and of military contributions levied upon the inhabitants of the hostile territory. This exemption extends even to the case of an absolute and unqualified conquest of the enemy's country."—Elements, &c., p. 421.

This doctrine is supported by all writers who state the usages of modern nations. I forbear to quote them again to the House. But I call attention to the language of Chief Justice Marshall in United States vs. Petersham, 7 Peters, 86:

"It is very unusual, even in cases of conquest, for the conqueror to do more than to displace the sovereign and assume dominion over the country. The modern usage of nations, which has become law, would be violated; that sense of justice and of right which is acknowledged and felt by the whole civilized world would be outraged, if private property should be generally confiscated, and private rights annulled. The people cherish their allegiance; their relation to their ancient sovereign is dissolved; but their relations to each other and their rights of property remain undisturbed."

In another part of the opinion he speaks of the attempt on the part of the new sovereign to confiscate the private property of the inhabitants occupying the acquired territory as "a wrong to individuals condemned by the practice of the whole civilized world." Again, speaking of the eighth article of the treaty by which we acquired Florida, Chief Justice Marshall says:

"This article is apparently introduced on the part of Spain, and must be intended to stipulate expressly for that security to private property which the laws and usages of nations would, without express stipulation, have conferred."—Page 88.

I cite also the letter of a former American Secretary of State of distinguished reputation to the French minister, written in the course of that discussion which grew out of the Paris declarations of 1856. By the laws of nations as previously existing, private property on land was exempt from seizure and spoliation in time of war; and it was proposed by the Paris conference to abolish privateering, and to that extent accord the same immunity to private property on the ocean. This Government was asked to assent to that principle being embodied in the laws of nations. The then Secretary of State (Mr. Marcy) replied very properly in behalf of this Government that this Government would not assent to the proposition unless the nations represented in the Paris congress would also agree to abolish the right to seize private property on the seas by public armed vessels, placing all private property on the high seas in the same position as private property on land. Mr. Marcy in that letter gives the weight of his sanction to the principle I now contend for, and I quote a part of it to establish the fact:

"The prevalence of Christianity and the progress of civilization have greatly mitigated the severity of the ancient mode of prosecuting hostilities. It is a generally received rule of modern warfare, so far at least as operations on land are concerned, that the persons and effects of non-combatants are to be respected. The wanton pillage or uncompensated appropriation of individual property by an army even in possession of an enemy's country is against the usage of modern times. Such a proceeding at this day would be condemned by the enlightened judgment of the world, unless warranted by particular circumstances. Every consideration which upholds this conduct in regard to a war on land favors the application of the same rule to the persons and property of citizens of the belligerents found upon the ocean."—Mr. Marcy to the Count de Sartiges, July 28, 1856.

The proposition of this Government to extend the principle recognized as prevailing on land to the sea was declined. On the whole I am inclined to doubt the propriety of the proposed extension so far as we are concerned. I do not know how blockades are to be made effective if private property of the enemy on the high seas is to be exempt from capture; nor does it seem wise to exempt commerce, the parent of so many wars, from its principal dangers.

Yet the present Secretary of State, by direction of the President, has offered to accede to the Paris declaration, so great regard has the present Administration for the sanctity of private property not only on land but on the sea also.

John Quincy Adams, in his correspondence both with the British minister and the American Secretary of State, affirmed the inviolability of private property on land, even in the case of slaves. I call the attention of the House to this great authority. In a letter to the American Secretary of State, August 22, 1815, he says:

"Our object is the restoration of all the property, including slaves, which by the usages of war among civilized nations ought not to have been taken." "All private property on shore was of that description. It was entitled by the laws of war from capture."

Again, to Lord Castlereagh, February 17, 1816:

"But as by the same usages of civilized nations private property is not the subject of lawful capture in war upon the land, it is perfectly clear that in every stipulation private property shall be respected, or that upon the restoration of places taken during the war it shall not be carried away."—4 American State Papers, 116, 117, 122, 123.

Mr. Adams contended that the British Government had violated the usages of civilized nations in taking away after the war was over, or in capturing during the war, slaves, because they were property upon land. It is known, sir, that by the treaty of 1814 indemnity was accorded by Great Britain for this very violation of the laws of war.

But it has been said, and there is a case—Brown's case—8th Cranch, referred to often to maintain the position that a nation has a right to do these things which the laws of nations forbid; that a sovereign accepts the laws of nations as addressed to his reason and justice and morality, but that if he chooses to disregard them he may do so. But, sir, my own opinion on that subject has been so well expressed by a distinguished judge—I mean Judge Hoffman—and concurred in by two of the judges upon the supreme bench in the New Almaden mine case, (2 Black,) that I beg the attention of the House while I read a short extract from it:

"But if it be admitted that humanity, Christianity, and the usages and rules observed by all civilized nations (which constitute public law) forbid even in war the use of certain means, the discussion whether such rights abstractly exist would seem to be a disputation savoring rather of the subtlety of the schools than of that practical sense which seeks to discover and establish the actual rules by which nations in a state of war are governed. That the rights of war, as deduced by Bynkershoek, from a consideration of its abstract nature, are mitigated by the laws of war as established by the general consent of nations, with respect to the effects of conquest as well as to the mode of warfare, is proved by the general recognition of the principle that, on the conquest of an enemy's territory, private rights of property are to be protected."

"But if a nation which has injured another is to be considered as confiscated with all that belongs to it to the nation that has received the injury, this confiscation must extend to private as well as public property."—Judge Hoffman, with concurrence of Catron and Wayne, 2 Black, United States vs. Castillero, p. 368.

I can add nothing to the force of these observations. Let it be remembered that it does not matter how much power or how little the Constitution gives Congress to seize and confiscate private property on land, the laws of nations and of war stamp the exercise of such power as inhuman, immoral, infamous.

I consider, sir, the maxims of Christian nations in modern times on that subject too well established to detain the House with further reference to them. They deny the right in this Congress, in the exercise of its war powers, or its belligerent powers, to attack temples of religion, to spoil works of art, or in general to seize and confiscate private property upon land, and when we do it we do it in the face of the indignant and protesting Christian world. We are then outside of the pale of Christian nations. We boldly spurn their maxims and despise and trample under foot their morality; and unless Christian nations reverse the judgments of the best and most enlightened men and multitudes and times we must stand condemned and disgraced.

The honorable gentleman takes the position that the eleven States now and formerly subject to the rebel power are out of the Union, and that we may make a conquest of them. Suppose I were to grant it. Shall we then put aside that law of nations which protects private property—a law sanctified by the self-interest of the conqueror, all the dictates of humanity, and the public opinion of the world? No; even conceding, which I do not, his right of conquest, no right to seize and confiscate private property upon land in general would be conceded.

BUT, SIR, TOUCHING THIS CONTEST CARRIED ON WITHIN THE STATE, RIGHT OF CONQUEST AND ALL OTHER SOVEREIGNTY RIGHTS ADMITTED BY THE LAWS OF NATIONS ARE LIMITED AND DEFINITELY BOUNDED BY OUR CONSTITUTION. I must recur to the distinction I have endeavored to establish, or which at all events I have stated—and I cannot do much more than state my position upon this occasion—that we do not look to the law of nations or the laws of war for a definition of our rights either in a public or civil war, for that matter. War is the remedy for a violated or obstructed right. We prosecute our right by force; that is, make war. We look to the laws of nations for the rules which are to govern the conduct of the war, but not for the objects for which we may lawfully wage it, or the manner in which we may realize its acquisitions, or the extent of our sovereign rights. Where are our rights declared? Whence do they come? Our rights for which we wield the sword—where do we get them? From the laws of nations? If we get them from the laws of nations one of two things follows: either the laws of nations carry over the conquered country the qualified and limited sovereignty of the United States, or it gives them an unlimited sovereignty.

I undertake to say that the laws of nations recognize in the conqueror an unlimited sovereignty. In a conquered province the laws of nations consent that you may set up a monarch, found orders of nobility, erect churches dependent upon the State, pass ex post facto laws, strike out equal State representation in the Federal Senate—you may do everything and anything you choose to do by your sovereign power. The laws of nations favor this. The laws of nations have no objections to kings, emperors, nobles, bishops. The protest against this infringement of the rights of man comes from America. Almost solitary and alone in the family of nations we are found to protest against the State with a king united to a church with a bishop. Yet, if it is there that we get our right of conquest and our sovereign right to rule the conquest, if it is there we go for a definition of our sovereign rights against a foreign and a domestic foe, and to interpret the manner in which we may enjoy the rights of conquest won either from foreign or domestic foes, to these conclusions must we come at last, or we come to the other, that by the laws of nations the conqueror does not conquer the sovereignty of a hostile Power, but merely substitutes his own sovereignty in place of that which has been expelled.

When Russia conquers Poland she strikes down elective monarchy and substitutes hereditary despotism in its place. If Turkey conquers a Christian province, the crescent is substituted for the cross. England makes a conquest, and by the omnipotence of unlimited power Parliament governs it according to its will. But if the Republic of America acquires territory, the exercise of sovereign right in that territory depends not upon the laws of Congress, of nations, of war, but upon the will of the sovereign people of America as expressed in the Constitution.

I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] to inquire where is the sovereignty of this country. The sovereignty of Russia is in the emperor. The sovereignty of Great Britain is in Parliament. Both are unlimited. The sovereignty of the United States is in the President and the Army. But should it be there? I deny it. It is in the sovereign American mass, in the people. There is no sovereign but the people. The people of America have delegated a portion of their sovereignty to the States, and another portion they have delegated to the Federal Government, our glorious, and, I trust, imperishable Union. The rest they have reserved to themselves. Consult that tenth article of the Amendments, which I believe this House did not quite lay upon the table when I had the honor to move it the other day; consult that and see "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." That sovereignty which in America can do no wrong like the sovereignty of Europe, at least no wrong for which it is criminally responsible, has delegated a portion only of that mighty sovereignty to the Federal Government. And in whom does it rest? In Congress, and not in the President and his Army. Conquests made by this country, foreign or domestic—if you admit such a monstrosity as a domestic conquest—are to be appropriated and settled and enjoyed and governed according to the laws of Congress, and by Congress admitted to the equal fellowship of States.

The war powers, whatever they may be, are vested in Congress and not in the Executive; and if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is as logical in action as in argument, the Executive of the United States must meet with his determined opposition. I understand him, indeed, in the very speech to which I have directed my attention, to sneer at the pretense that the Executive of the United States is vested with the Federal or State sovereignty at all. He denies the right of ten men to govern a hundred by the aid of the Army and Navy. I deny it, too, and it is an error which will die in the midst of its worshipers sooner or later, unless the central idea of American civilization is a falsehood, and the Declaration of Independence a cheat and delusion.

If I am correct in the position I have stated, that the sovereignty was in the mass of the American people, and that they delegated a part to the States and a part to the Federal Government, how then, admitting the principle of the gentleman from Pennsylvania of the right of conquest, does the successful conquest of eleven States vest the President with sovereign power in the States?

MR. STEVENS. I will interrupt the gentleman one moment to correct him. My position was that the sovereignty was vested in Congress.

MR. WADSWORTH. That was the position I assumed. I said there was no sovereignty in this country but in the sovereign mass, and that they had vested a portion of that in the States, and a portion in the United States, to be exercised by Congress. We seem, then, to agree. I was only inveighing against the presidential plan, and contended that the gentleman himself should lend his weighty support to overthrowing that plan, and all who plant their feet upon the neck of popular sovereignty. By his own principle Congress should undertake to settle the fate of eleven States. I prefer that Congress should do it. Woe worth the day when the American people consent that that portion of the sovereignty which they delegated to the States shall, by the accidents of fortune, or the malice of men, be vested in one man, and he the holder of the sword and the purse. But it is plain to any man who recurs to first principles that none of these consequences follow. These States are in the Union, and there is no power short of successful revolution that can drive them out of it; and, Mr. Speaker, it is no longer worth while for men of intellect and courage to deny the fact—rebellion, double damned as it is, has been met on our part and confronted with revolution, a revolution of the Federal Government against the States, of the rulers against the people, the sword against privilege, of power against liberty.

The States are not out of the Union. They are in the Union, in the old Union, thank God! not an "atrocious idea," but a living, imperishable reality, "dear to every true American heart;" a Union, sir, that will be the theme of historian and bard while time flies through the coming centuries; no degradation of this present, no recreancy of the friends of "liberty and union, one and inseparable," can dim the glory of its secure past. The old Union an atrocious idea! Founded by the most earnest, convinced, disinterested, and able men that ever blessed any age, by its career of prosperity it has demonstrated the value of its ideas and vindicated the wisdom of its wise founders, placing them on the roll of fame side by side with the builders of nations. At the mention of Romulus and Numa Pompilius the names of Washington and Madison rise spontaneously to our lips; and although not one complete century has labored upon the work projected and founded by these men and their compeers, yet the most sublime monument built to the glory of the fathers of nations has been the history by land and by sea; at home and abroad, of this old Union. That old Union, home of religion, of laws, of letters, of arts, of arms, in the career of greatness had no parallel in all the times before it, and distanced every contemporary nation; in the period rounded by one man's life, it rose from three million people to thirty million, from thirteen States to thirty-four; and the thousand years to come, should Heaven decree its restoration, will augment its renown. That Union an "atrocious idea!" The thought itself is the only atrocity. Is it necessary to destroy that Union that slavery may perish? No, whatever else may chance in this great convulsion, let the old Union be preserved with its central idea of popular sovereignty—sovereignty in the States in matters purely domestic, and in the United States in national matters, but behind and above, most powerful, invigorating all, the sovereignty of the people.

Sir, this is a much larger business, developing by the logic of events, than African slavery. We have got far beyond that. In this very act which you propose to amend there are the seeds of ruin that stretches beyond all questions of African slavery. You have heard it proclaimed that it rests upon the right of conquest, the obliteration of eleven—therefore of thirty-four—States. What, then, is in truth the real issue before the country? It is a question whether revolution shall go on or whether the American people shall arrest it. What a spectacle does it present in this the nineteenth century! A revolution of power against the people, of the ruler against the masses, of the Executive and the Army, if I am to believe its representatives on this floor, against the people. Shall the Executive of the United States have these vast powers confided to him? Shall we consent that by the conquest of Louisiana and ten other States he has become lord paramount in that country, the sovereignty of this people vested in him to be parcelled out to his sworn adherents, and we to furnish our blood and money to support the ten men against the ninety? Will it not be a question, when the question of African slavery shall be settled and forgotten, whether the people of this country shall rule or whether the Executive shall rule; a question whether Congress shall exercise the sovereign powers delegated to the United States or one man with the sword and the purse shall grasp and wield them all? And do not gentlemen fear for the stability even of that great party which now holds the nation trembling in its grasp when they go beyond that theme with which they have moved the masses in America and fomented those passions that now rage in the land, and attack the very ideas upon which our institutions are founded, the sovereignty of the masses and the right of self-government?

It will be seen, then, Mr. Speaker, that I agree this far, that in this civil war all the people inside of the hostile territory, and subject to rebel sway, are our enemies, and that we have a right to treat them as such while the war lasts; but it will be seen also that I maintain they are citizens as well as enemies, not responsible criminally since they became belligerents for their acts to our municipal laws, but against whom we wield the weapons of war to beat down the rebel force and restore our qualified sovereignty. The time will come, I trust, when the rights for which we wage war shall be restored to the localities from which they have been expelled, and the qualified sovereignty of the United States again asserted there; when our custom-houses shall be opened, our navy-yards reestablished, our forts recaptured and garrisoned, and our courts again opened, with the judge upon the bench. Then questions of protection and allegiance, the reciprocal rights and duties of Government and citizen, will be discussed and decided. I apprehend that it will be decided that all who levied war against the United States when the United States offered them protection, and was in a situation to protect them, are guilty of treason; but that all who submitted to a belligerent power, a revolutionary conspiracy at a time when the United States were neither willing nor able to protect them, might lawfully do so and pay their allegiance to that rebel power, and keep it faithfully in peace and war. I believe that from that time forward, while the Government of the United States continued unable to protect them they were enemies and not traitors, responsible to the laws of war, and not to our municipal laws; but that afterwards from the moment our flag again flew over them, and its authority was again restored, and the offer of protection made to them, the Government might lawfully challenge the obedience and allegiance of every man, whether willing or unwilling, and hold him criminally responsible thenceforward for every act of "levying war."

But these are not all the objections I have to confiscation. No, those which remain are insurmountable. Even if we had the power, under the Constitution or the laws of nations, to do this mighty mischief, on grounds of policy and justice I oppose and protest against it. Look at the power you put into the hands of one man. By this act you put the lives and property, real and personal, of six million men, women, and children in the hands of the President of the United States. He holds the power to execute that savage law upon them, or to grant them an amnesty upon such terms as he may dictate.

That man is again a candidate for reelection to the Presidency of the United States, and by our Constitution he may be a candidate a third, a fourth, a fifth time, or as often as his ambition prompts or the pressure of party necessities compels him. It will not do to tell me that he is a virtuous and unambitious man. I might concede that to the fullest extent, but the people of this country have not intrusted their rights and privileges to any single man upon a blind faith in human virtue, and they will be deaf to the teachings of their ancestors and the warning voice of history if they ever do.

But in addition to that power over six million people, this same man has an Army of veterans of five, six, or eight hundred thousand. He has at his control $800,000,000 per annum. The moral power of wielding that Army, of controlling that immense sum, and of exercising powers of life and death over six million of our fellow-citizens tends necessarily to the destruction of our liberties. There is no safety for democratic institutions when we confide those large powers to one man. I concede the necessity, I concede the propriety and duty of putting in his hands the sword and the purse to secure victory to our arms. We must do it. But I would do it surrounded with all those guards which a jealous love of our liberties demands at our hands; nor would I go one step further than the direst necessity compels. A candidate for reelection, with five hundred thousand men armed to the teeth, representing nearly every family in the land, with another army of one hundred thousand office-holders or more stationed in every village in the land, with $800,000,000 per annum—a fabulous sum—should we not tremble with apprehensions for the future in view of such a power?

You will recollect that the idea of $20,000,000, $30,000,000, or $40,000,000 a year in gold set the nation crazy with the discovery of the precious metals in California. You will recollect how the adventurers of Europe swarmed on the discovery of America, when they learned that it was rich in silver and gold. But all the gold that has arrived from California since its discovery would not amount to the sum which the President of the United States now has within his control every year, and falls far short of the wealth which confiscation surrenders to rapine and plunder. Behold the moral influence of it. We are a money-loving, a money-seeking nation. Be it mentioned among all the glorious virtues of the American people that they love money and seek it with passion and avidity. What expectations and hopes will not that $800,000,000 a year and the plunder of the South inspire! How many sycophants, flatterers, convertites, apostates, and plunderers will it make! The love of gain, the passion for sudden riches, already heated to fever, will spring up in all hearts and debauch the nation. Invited or uninvited, all look to and will be dependent upon the man who dispenses this coveted patronage and wealth, and all with active zeal will celebrate his virtues, and in spite of his shrinking modesty "buckle honors unwillingly on his back." How will the horse contractor, Mr. Shoddy, Mrs. Shoddy, Miss Shoddy, and Master Shoddy celebrate the praises of that one man, and cry "copperhead! copperhead!" upon every man animated by the ancient spirit of freedom and democratic jealousy of power who protests against this policy! In the midst of it all you arm this one man with power over the lives and property of six million people. Ah! you say, he will not exercise it. I pray Heaven he may not; but I have so often seen him driven from positions that he occupied and promised to keep that I fear the pressure of that power of plunder which this policy evokes and augments.

Then again it breeds a crop of venal plunderers, heartless and ravenous and limitless, to swarm over eleven States, to prey on helpless men, women, and children. We have had a specimen of it. Talk with those who have been down the Mississippi and in the West as to the influence on the Army and on citizens of those measures of the last Congress which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to seize and appropriate the products of the South. How many lately holding official stations, or sitting in the halls of legislation, have gone where these richer fields of adventure invite? How many have resigned commissions in the Army to engage in speculation in the midst of those scenes of social chaos, where the only law is "the good old rule, the simple plan," the law of fraud and force? Do you think the passion for plunder is confined alone to shoddy and horse contractors? No, it is to be found everywhere. Everywhere in all classes the passions of avidity, venality, riches-getting rage. The clergy, the laity, soldier, civilian, contribute to the flood of venality that pours a lava tide of blight and death over the land; and Congress cries havoc! and hounds it on.

I maintain that the virtue and the integrity of the citizen are the surest bulwark in peace or war; and that system of legislation which places temptations mighty as these before the citizen aims a fatal stab at democratic institutions.

The leading jurists of America, as of the world, have expressed their hearty condemnation of confiscation. Are we wiser and better than them all? I beg now, sir, to call the attention of this House and of the country to the voice of only one—Judge Story. Judge Story, speaking of the reasons advanced by the advocates of confiscation, says:

"But this view of the subject is wholly unsatisfactory.

It looks only to the offender himself, and is regardless of his innocent posterity. It really operates as a posthumous punishment upon them, and compels them to bear not only the disgrace naturally attendant upon such flagitious crimes, but takes from them the common rights and privileges enjoyed by all other citizens, where they are wholly innocent, and however remote they may be in lineage from the first offender. It is surely enough for society to take the life of the offender as a just punishment of his crime without taking from his offspring and relatives that property which may be the only means of saving them from poverty and ruin. It is bad policy, too; for it cuts off all the attachments which these unfortunate victims might otherwise feel for their own Government, and prepares them to engage in any other service by which their supposed injuries may be redressed, or their hereditary hatred gratified."—Commentaries, page 172.

Upon these and similar grounds Judge Story thinks the Convention adopted article three, section three.

And again he says:

"The history of other countries abundantly proves that one of the strong incentives to prosecute offenses, as treason, has been the chance of sharing in the plunder of the victims. Rapacity has been stimulated to exert itself in the service of the most corrupt tyranny, and tyranny has been thus furnished with new opportunities of indulging its malignity and revenge; of gratifying its envy of the rich and good; and of increasing its means to reward favorites and secure retainers for the worst deeds."—Commentaries, page 173.

Sir, I cannot forbear to enrich and fortify my argument against this policy with another quotation from an authority already great on both sides of the ocean, destined to be still greater when history comes to estimate the men and events of these times. It is a general order published by that soldier, statesman, and patriot, George B. McClellan. He says:

"The general commanding takes this occasion to remind the officers and soldiers of the Army that we are engaged in supporting the Constitution and laws of the United States and in suppressing rebellion against their authority; that we are not engaged in a war of rapine, revenge, or subjugation; that this is not a contest against populations, but against armed forces; that it is a struggle carried on within the State, and should be conducted by us upon the highest principles known to Christian civilization."

This policy surrenders society in fifteen States to confusions and strifes that will afflict and convulse them long after war is nominally at an end. Peace will be no peace to us, Mr. Speaker, with this policy. Unhappily the contest now rages in our part of our common country; armed forces of both belligerents trample down our fields, eat out our substance, and struggle in our midst; our fences, our houses, (public and private,) our villages are consumed by fire; robbery and murder do their demon work; from sections thus afflicted the remnant of the people depart and leave it a desolation. From calamities like these, for which we of all other people of the United States are least responsible, (since we never hated any, but loved all the States and peoples of the great family,) we would fain at some early date escape. But confiscation will perpetuate these strifes and render peace and harmony to our people impossible. Neighbor from neighbor, friend from friend, father from child, husband from wife are divided; and thus the body-politic is paralyzed, the family cursed, and each honest heart broken in pieces. Will the plunder of estates reconcile these differences, heal these divisions, and give us peace when the war is over? No; with a refinement of vengeance our sectional enemies, heated by long political strifes with which the heart of Kentucky never sympathized, propose to curse our future with emancipation and confiscation, and thus destroy the only hopes and happiness which desolating war might otherwise leave us.

From these woes, Mr. Speaker, most of the honorable gentlemen of this House with their constituencies are happily exempt. I rejoice that it is so; our true and brave people crave no fellowship in misery. But though thus removed far from these scenes let them not close their eyes to our situation, despise our advice, mock at our calamities. Why should they hate treason more than we do? We have suffered most from its crimes, and had most to dread from its success in the future; yet all whom we are willing shall live at all we are anxious shall live upon terms that will not degrade them and make it impossible to reconcile them to the State and to us.

Gentlemen try to scold this policy by continually assuring us that the lands of the South are held by few; but in that, sir, they are mistaken. In many of those States, if not in all, the distribution of real estate is general. As members of the family, or by the ties of blood, much the larger part of the population is interested in the real estate. But, sir, the confiscation act in terms embraces the entire population, since all have been compromised by the rebellion, and proposes the most widespread and barbarous robbery of property of which history furnishes an example. It cannot be executed to any extent without a sum of human misery at which every humane man must shudder. Sir, it is not only the policy of endless future strifes, but the policy of extermination and recolonization. Some boldly and audaciously proclaim this, like Wendell Phillips, the Anacharsis Clootz of this revolution. And can such a policy succeed? Why, more than half of the people of thirty-four States oppose it. How magnificent, sir, is the confidence of that minority, which, in the face of growing discontents and ever widening divisions of the people, each day multiplies its tasks and amplifies its projects. It proposes to conscript one half the nation to exterminate and recolonize the other half.

The policy prolongs the war indefinitely by compelling a brave and numerous people to struggle, not for national independence, but for liberty and existence. I confess I shudder for the consequences to our Union as the contest assumes that form. Is it possible upon these principles to subdue six million people, occupying so vast and fertile a territory, a warlike and intelligent race like ourselves, and, too, by a people divided in half upon this policy, and, to judge from the tone and temper manifested on either side, separating further and further day by day? How long will it take to make the conquest? How much will it cost to keep it? It is a lifetime since Poland fell a prey to the Russian; battle and halter and scourge have dealt upon Hungary; Ireland is in chains; but the despots who rule those people have never broken their spirit nor crushed them into quiescence. Are the people of the eleven States less intractable, or have they been less free? Or would they remain more passive slaves to the executive ten percent, guarded by a negro army, with all that makes life supportable irreparably lost? From time to time, as occasion served, the injured and oppressed would break their chains and strike for liberty. Sir, it will be a difficult task to keep Americans in slavery in sight of Camden, Eutaw, Guilford, and Yorktown. They cannot crouch down there in abject submission to a servile, oath-bound minority, remembering where they are, and what they were. They would prove but restless subjects in this democracy. Let us not try subjugation and forfeiture. Arms against arms, pardon, immunity, equality, liberty to all who submit, will be found more potent, more secure, more speedy, more honorable. The greatest of human seers and bards has said, speaking by the mouth of England's greatest conqueror, "When lenity and cruelty play for a kingdom, the gentle gamester is the soonest winner."

But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] urges the seizure and sale of the lands of the South to pay our huge debt and relieve our heavy taxation. Sir, confiscation will produce but a trifle; the plunderer will get all, the Treasury nothing. The estates must go for nothing. What buyer will risk them at a tolerable price? How enviable the lot of that northern man who drives out the family of some lost father, and sits down beneath the vine and fig-tree he never planted! What a welcome guest at every good man's feast! But his bed will not be a bed of roses; the torch will rouse him from his slumbers, the crack of outlaw's rifle will stretch him lifeless on his new domain. Or when the yellow harvests crown his fields, and he is ready to say, "Soul, take thine ease," the southern Roderick Dhu, beholding his ravished birthright from his glen, will sally forth to "spoil the spoiler" as he may. Revenue from such a source accursed is a delusion. I would farm these "conquests" another way. I would cut the national debt in twain by halving it with restored and reconciled brethren; I would lighten the load of taxation by widening its basis, and giving to the South order, self-government, and peace. Under that policy I would expect to see "grim-visaged war smooth his wrinkled front," industry revive throughout her borders, her great products once more cumber the levees, once more fill our tonnage, and on "woven wings" fly to eager foreign marts, thence to flow back on America in golden streams reinvigorating our finances, augmenting our revenues, consolidating our credit, and scattering the blessings of prosperity and plenty throughout the whole land. And by the blessing of God, under this wise, honorable, humane, and constitutional policy I should hope at no distant period, these sad days remembered only as a horrid dream, to see the great Republic clothed with all its former strength and beauty, advancing to realize the hopes of its founders.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the gentleman from Kentucky have permission to go on and finish his remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed, if no objection be made.

Mr. PRICE. I object.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE obtained the floor.

Mr. DAWES. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has expired.

ENROLLMENT ACT.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Before doing so, however, I will move that all general debate upon the bill under consideration in committee be terminated at three o'clock to-day.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now ask for the vote upon going to committee.

The motion was agreed to.

So the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWES in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being Senate bill No. 36, to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863.

The CHAIRMAN stated the pending question to be upon the amendment offered yesterday by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] to strike out all after the word "enlisted," in line nineteen, page 4, down to the end of the fifth section, as follows:

And if any drafted person shall hereafter pay money for the procurement of a substitute, under the provisions of the act to which this is an amendment, such payment of money shall operate only to relieve such person from draft on that call, and his name shall be retained on the roll, and he shall be subject to draft on future calls; and the maximum of commutation under said act shall hereafter be $400 instead of $300.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

And so much of the thirteenth section of the act of which this act is an amendment as authorizes exemption from military service by the payment of a sum not exceeding $300 is hereby repealed.

Upon which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. A. MYERS] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. A. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will not be alarmed at the small bundle of papers I have before me. The remarks I have to submit have not been committed to writing. Last evening when, after the little storm of debate which occurred in this House, I had obtained the floor, I went home, sat down in my room, and jotted down a few notes as heads of the disconnected remarks that I shall make upon the subject which is properly before the committee; for I may get into the congressional habit of wandering somewhat from the subject under debate.

I have had the pleasure of listening to several speeches during my short experience in this Hall upon both sides of the House, and on various subjects; yet I am sorry to say that from the other side of this Chamber, from judicial experience and astuteness down to juvenile congressional verbiage, I have failed to discover a warm support of my country in its trying hour. And until I hear a different train of argument, until I hear words indicating different motives, I shall have to continue, as I have in the past, to admire the persons more than the principles of the honorable gentlemen on the other side of the House.

In the discussion of the various questions that have come up I have scarcely heard one speech, I have scarcely listened to one argument, and I believe scarcely a resolution coming from the left side of this Chamber, the beginning, the middle, and the end of which has not been denunciation, abuse, misrepresentation, and obstruction of every effort of the Administration, while the country is struggling for its existence. Perhaps I have not always heard correctly, but that has been my understanding.

The question now before the committee is, shall we pass or amend so as to make a more effective enrollment law? Now, sir, before going into the discussion of the merits of this bill, I had almost betrayed myself into an anecdote. They tell me they are not dignified in an assembly like this; and it may be that in my little efforts in my oleaginous district, [laughter,] which always runs smoothly upon questions of the Union, I am sometimes betrayed into such undignified diversions to illustrate a position.

I know not whether some gentlemen in this Chamber ever pray for their country; I know not whether some gentlemen in this Hall ever pray for the Administration, that its counsels may be guided by a wisdom that may be transmitted to its successors; perhaps they may be like a clergyman in the heart of the rebel States, after we had defeated the armies of Jeff. Davis at one point. The next day the religious people at that place got together for prayer, but they could find nobody good enough to pray except one nervous, excitable clergyman. He arose, and lifting his holy hands to pray in reference to the disaster which had befallen the rebel arms the day before, looking up toward heaven, he said, "Oh, Lord! I never saw such a day as yesterday, and I don't believe you did either." [Laughter.] I say, sir, if prayers go up for this Administration from some quarters it will be to tell the Ruler of all things that neither the person petitioning nor Him supplicated ever saw such an Administration, including that of Jeff. Davis.

We are told, Mr. Chairman, that the draft law is unpopular. It may be in the estimation of some. Who made it so? It is the declarations of such traitors as Chauncey C. Burr, Clement L. Vallandigham, John U. Andrews, formerly of Virginia, and lately, as that word has been introduced here—I did not introduce it—lately the copperhead orator of the city of New York. And I am sorry that language such as that which has been used has found repeaters in this House. Chauncey C. Burr said, in a speech in New York concerning the draft, that "it is merely a highwayman's call on every American citizen for $300 or his life." Did we not hear yesterday the remark, "your money or your life?" "It is to your clemency," he goes on to say, "that Abe Lincoln and all his satraps were not upon the gallows eighteen months ago. The old booby thought he was king. Jeff. Davis never did anything half so bad as Lincoln." Honorable gentlemen do not use the last sentence affirmatively, but they adopt its sentiment or acquiesce in it.

What did Clement L. Vallandigham say upon the same subject? I read from the Philadelphia Inquirer:

"VALLANDIGHAM IN NEW YORK.—One thing the Government may as well understand first as last, and that is, if the sentiments which were uttered and applauded last evening at the Democratic Union Association meeting are to prevail, the enforcement of the conscription bill in the city of New York is entirely out of the question. Vallandigham was the orator. Referring to the insurrection in Poland, he said 'The people there had risen up against a conscription, which, bad as it was, was not half as odious as ours. Austria was considered a tyranny until she had ours. As long as free assemblies and free discussion were allowed, he was in favor of seeking redress for these grievances at the ballot-box, but when those safeguards were invaded, he was in favor of seeking some other and more efficient mode of defending their liberties.'

"Then, in regard to the bill empowering the President to suspend the habeas corpus, 'that bill,' he said, 'was unconstitutional, and the same right of resistance that common law gives a man to prevent a trespasser from entering his house, exists with reference to that enactment.' These are specimen 'bricks' from the rhetorical temple of disloyalty, which the gentleman from Ohio constructed for the edification of his hearers, and his hearers stretched their lungs to give expression to their delight. A stranger dropping into that hall, with but little effort of the imagination, might have fancied himself in Richmond or Charleston—not in one of the loyal cities of the North."

But there was one specimen of Democratic oratory presented to the city of New York, by Captain J. U. Andrews, formerly from the first families of Virginia, I suppose. Did we not hear yesterday the demagogical cry—the same cry that he uttered to create prejudice between the white men and the black men—that our purpose is to elevate the black man to an equality with the white man? If I dared to use the argumentum ad hominem, I think that gentleman would be sorry to rise up to the height or go down to the depth of that position.

What were the declarations of Andrews? "You must resist the draft. You must be careful, for the Republicans will endeavor to elevate the black man to an equality with the white man." Let us follow him. After making one of these eloquent, soul-stirring speeches to the Democracy of the city of New York, let us follow this immaculate gentleman. Let us see him as he winds his way through the streets and lanes until finally he reaches the little house which he calls home. Arrived there he is within the paramount influence of the one whom he loves. Byron, once looking up at the moon, carrying away the inspiration for which England loves him so well; when he was looking at the moon, which at the time happened to have retired behind a black cloud, Byron said:

"The pale round moon looks dimly, darkly down."

Captain J. U. Andrews, when he found his home, falling upon his knees and looking up into the face of her who sat before him, might truthfully exclaim, "You look dimly, darkly down, Josephine, my dear." [Laughter.] Ah, sir, the equality sought to be fixed upon black men, indeed!

If honorable members, Mr. Speaker, would recollect the great distinction that they might make from moral science—I trust that they have learned it, and I have the charity to believe that they have forgotten it—that God has created all men equal so far as their rights are concerned and their condition as diversified as the individuals themselves. Now, I believe that I have almost brought myself within the congressional rule of not speaking to the question.

I was almost tempted to refer to the doctrine of States rights, of which we hear so often and so eloquently. I will not argue the question; but I will state a proposition. When was it that the States were sovereign? Was it when they were dependent colonies of the mother country? No, sir. When was it that the States could revolve in a radius wider than that of the national Government? These States when born were born in the United States. They never had the so-called doctrine of States right attached to them. I would like a political philosopher of this day to tell me when the States were born into the national sovereignty, except such as ties them to the Union. Let us ask ourselves the question, "Have we a right to pass anything like what is called a draft law?"

I may be a little dry now—and the committee will excuse me—while I resume the track from which, for a while, I switched off.

I say, sir, that without one single syllable in that Constitution except what is contained in that preamble we have a right to pass a law like this, or any law which will bring to the help of the Government the military power of the nation. Who so well qualified to frame a Government as those who had just come out of the conflict and storm of the Revolution? The preamble to that instrument contains words which are sufficient as a foundation upon which to build legislation like that which the majority of this House intend by this bill.

"To provide for the common defense" was a part of the purpose for which this people compacted—not leagued, but compacted—together, and it is the power by which they were united. But, sir, in section eight of the Constitution we have these words: "to raise and support armies." There is our power as clear as the English language can express it; and whenever a power is granted to Congress, all the means, all the appliances, and all the ways are necessarily given for the purpose of carrying the granted power into effect. Would not this section alone be sufficient? But to make the thing perfectly clear, these clear-headed fathers of the Republic wound up that section with the following language: Congress shall have power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers." What is an enlistment act but a law to carry into execution powers delegated to Congress to raise and support armies?

But we are not without authority upon that point; and you, Mr. Chairman, and every lawyer, know that if we can place our hands upon the case, then, unless something is presented more authoritative against it, we have carried the court and jury. The Supreme Court of the United States long since has decided or announced the doctrine that all the powers vested by the Constitution in Congress are full and complete in themselves, may be exercised to their utmost limit, and that there are no restrictions upon them, only those prescribed in the instrument. (See Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, 196.)

But we have other authority; we have the authority of a man who was once Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, who was a soldier in the armies of the Revolution, and one of the first soldiers of the nation, and one of the first judges of the land. What does he say in his Life of Washington? In showing that the draft was made use of, he says:

"In general the Assemblies (of the States) followed the examples of Congress, and apportioned on the several counties within the State the quota to be furnished by each. This division of the State was again to be subdivided into classes, and each class was to furnish a man by contributions or taxes imposed on itself. In some instances a draft was to be used in the last resort."—Marshall's Life of Washington, vol. 3, p. 241.

Do we want better authority than this as to the power of Congress, or as to the practice of our nation in the days of its infancy?

I find my time is rapidly passing, though I did not intend to occupy my hour. I must hastily proceed. I ask this question, "What is a draft?" Before answering that question, I would like to lay down a proposition which I believe to be sound, with all due deference to those who differ with me. I say every man in this country owes it to his country to support it in time of trial; that every man is bound to take up arms in defense of the life of the nation. Every man is bound to do that; and I know that Government, in its humanitarian ideas, in its liberal notions, in its exercise of sovereignty as it pleases, may exempt whom it will and how it will. But, sir, the great proposition stands out boldly, and as the truth, that every man is bound to march to the battle-field to defend his country in the day of its danger. In other words, the Government at this time has a draft upon every man. She has her hand upon every man's shoulder saying, "Come; my life is in danger; I am drawing you to my support; come, help me out of these troubles." That is the position that the Government occupies toward every citizen. Every man is bound to go. There is a connecting link, a sort of drawing-string between the Government and its citizens; and the draft is to ascertain which of those strings shall be cut. We have been told that the draft is to ascertain who shall go to fight the battles of our country. Sir, that is a mistaken definition. The draft is to ascertain who may stay at home, for all are bound to go; and the man who cannot see that has studied the Constitution and the meaning of the true requisitions of our Government to very little purpose, or he has gone to a very bad school teacher for patriotic education.

Now, sir, will you recruit your forces? I do not approve of some of the provisions of the bill now before the House. I was not on the Military Committee. I never thought of such a thing. I am not sufficiently a fighting man for that, that is, in practice, although I may be almost as bold as some other gentlemen in profession. I say that the true policy would be to make a draft for a shorter period. I believe the committee has decided that against me. I think the true policy would be to retain the $300 commutation clause, and perhaps it may be right to exempt those persons also who from conscientious scruples and by the articles of faith to which they are attached are opposed to engaging in actual conflict, yet to make them pay something and appropriate it to peaceful purposes. But, sir, I am not going to argue that question. There is another point I might add, and I will add it for fear some one else may get up and do it at some other time when it has nothing to do with the question before the House, that I think we ought to increase the pay of the soldiers, which will aid in drafting, as drafted men will get the same pay as other soldiers.

We are told by some that we can rely upon volunteers, and that the people prefer that mode of recruiting our forces. By what process of reasoning, by what sound logical conclusion can we arrive at the result that because we have an enrollment act volunteering is prevented? Ah, sir, I can imagine why some of us are so much in favor of volunteering and so terribly opposed to drafting. I can imagine it for this reason, that I find when there is volunteering all the willing go, and when there is drafting some of the unwilling have to go. There might, perhaps, be a partisan motive—though I do not charge it—in saying let us have nothing but volunteering, especially when the returns show that the volunteers all vote one way. I think this is germane to the question, as showing one of the reasons why opposition is made to the passage of this or any similar bill.

Now, sir, I have here the vote of the volunteers, and I will give it you in a very brief and condensed form. I will commence with Pennsylvania. I like to begin with her, not only because she is my own State, but for a better reason, because on her soil is the field of Gettysburg, and there, like Bunker Hill in Massachusetts, "it will be forever." The Pennsylvania soldiers, before our would-be Governor decided that they were not fit to vote, cast their suffrages thus—

Mr. STILES. I would ask my colleague who decided that the soldiers were not fit to vote?

Mr. A. MYERS. I do not like to have my time consumed.

Mr. STILES. Perhaps my question is troublesome.

Mr. A. MYERS. I will yield to my colleague for a moment.

Mr. STILES. I ask him what candidate for Governor in Pennsylvania decided that the soldiers were not fit to vote?

Mr. A. MYERS. The Hon. George W. Woodward decided that soldiers had no right to vote when they were away from home in the field, because they were not at home, and last fall, when they came home, the Democratic judges at election boards decided that they had no right to vote because they were at home. [Laughter.]

Mr. STILES. He decided no such thing. He decided your act to be unconstitutional, together with a majority of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, which decision you disregarded.

Mr. A. MYERS. Yes, sir, he did decide that the act was unconstitutional, and when the soldiers got a chance to vote they decided that he was unconstitutional. [Laughter.]

But, sir, Pennsylvania soldiers in 1861 gave 11,351 votes for the Union ticket, and 3,173 votes to the other ticket, making a majority of 8,178 in favor of the Union ticket. Iowa—oh, I like to come to her next, she stands right here, not alphabetically, it is true, but she stands right on the record everywhere and all the time, and her increasing majorities for the Union make one love to call her next on this roll—Iowa, in 1863, gave 17,041 for the Union and 3,004 for the Democratic ticket, making a majority of 14,037. No wonder that some of us are opposed to a draft! Wisconsin, glorious State—it does not take long to count her votes—Wisconsin polled 9,257 for the Union and 747 for the other side of the political Jordan. Sir, I come to another State, and perhaps I ought to have said that I come to one more gladly than all the rest; for, sir, the question was squarely made between the soldier and a man who was as much like Judge Woodward as the Siamese twins were alike. If you sever the political cartilage that binds them together both will die. Ohio soldiers in 1863 cast for the Union 41,453 votes, and for the man who now sits near Niagara's roar and sings "God save the Queen," 2,391. Here is the vote from Libby prison, not rebel, but Union prisoners: for Brough, 162; for Jewett, 1; for Vallandigham, 0. [Laughter.]

Sir, these are interesting statistics. I would not have read these figures but that I want them to go on the record of the nation. This little book in which I have them entered might not live long enough.

But, sir, the Administration could not be let alone without a fling at it the other day in respect to its treatment of what was called the favorite general of the army of the Potomac. I did not intend, if it had not been thrown out in this way, to say one word against that once favorite general, either here or elsewhere. But when an attempt is made to stab this Administration, to misrepresent this Administration, one which the people have taken up, determined that he who for four years has held the helm of State so steadily shall run the good ship into port, I cannot be silent. Politicians may think and say and do as they please, but God and the people are for Abraham Lincoln. Jeff. Davis and the others may be for whom they like. [Laughter.]

General McClellan may have been the favorite of the army of the Potomac for a while, and perhaps he was to a great extent until, the night before the Pennsylvania election, he changed his base. What did he do? He issued a bulletin which was posted upon the street corners throughout the city of Philadelphia and in all the eastern towns which could be reached by print, and which was flashed to the utmost extent of the telegraphic poles on swifter pinions than the wings of the wind, that he had been in consultation with George W. Woodward; that on comparing notes, on looking at the report of the peninsular campaign, and at the last report of the decisions of the Pennsylvania supreme court, he came to the conclusion that they were exactly alike. Well, the soldiers do not like the man who says he agrees with one who, in 1863, said he was in favor of withdrawing our troops to north of Mason and Dixon's line. They do not like the man who decided that soldiers had no right to vote in Pennsylvania. They have no love for the man who was an original Know-Nothing in Pennsylvania, commencing this principle in 1837, when he thought that foreigners were not good enough to vote. And when their favorite general undertakes to say that he agrees in such sentiments, he is to be the favorite no longer. Our people, sir, are an adaptive people. You can make them a nation of soldiers from being shepherd boys in six months; and you can make them worship and curse the same idol within twenty-four hours.

I think, sir, that I have heard it said, after claiming that this act was unconstitutional, that if the necessity existed the member would waive all objection and vote for it. That is: "I swear to support the Constitution of the United States. That law is unconstitutional, but if it is necessary, I will violate my oath a little and vote for it." [Laughter.] Sir, we did no such thing as that.

We want this draft for the purpose of filling up to as great an extent as we can our ranks from the unwilling. We want to put them into the old regiments. I care not how much of a copperhead (the word has been brought into this debate and I take the liberty of using it) a man may be, just sandwich him between two old veterans, and I will insure you he goes into the fight. [Laughter.]

Sir, there may be a great struggle in the spring, and we owe it to our country that we should speedily fill up our Army. The way to make the struggle brief is to present a bold, united, strong front to the enemy, and that is the object of this bill. We want men to be drafted into the Army. The soldiers in the Army want a draft, and I say let the soldiers' will be done. Let us have a draft and an increase of the Army, so that we may encourage the daring and heroism of our brave soldiers to crush out the last rebel foe that comes against them. Let us do that, and then let us, oh, let us confiscate every species of property of rebels now and forever.

"What will you do with this property when confiscated?" I have a way of disposing of it. I would take a part of it and throw it into our Treasury, about the solvency of which some people have so much concern. The rest I would parcel out into sections and give them to the men who have fought our battles. I do not know as it is necessary to go into the details of that division, but I think I would give to every single man eighty acres, to every married man one hundred and sixty, to every married man with a child one hundred and eighty acres, and if God bless them with twins, three hundred acres; and tell all the soldiers that like merit shall have a like reward. [Great laughter.]

Sir, when this war is over, when the contest is ended, there will be some men in our country heartily ashamed of their expressions. Oh, they would give their fortunes to have the record of their words blotted from the archives of the nation. When the contest is over two classes of people will leave the North: the colored man will go South because the North is too cold for him, and the copperhead will go South because the North will be too hot for him. [Laughter.] The first will be the result of geographical frigidity; the second the result of a mental patriotic burning torridity.

Sir, I say again, fill up our armies. Let us have no more of this whining, faltering, partisan spirit. At first, some tell us, we were all united. Yes, sir, we were, and if we have become divided, pray, sir, which side are you on? If it be true that Abraham Lincoln has been guilty of some wrong, does that make traitors and rebellion right? Never. Away with such nonsensical, illogical arguments as that.

One word more, and I have done. I say, let us come back then to our first unanimous outburst of patriotism upon this subject. Let us have no more of this party cry. The people, the soldiers, and all the unconditionally loyal are for a draft. Who are the men who oppose it? I have heard it said that men are subject to two births. I am not going to argue the theological distinction. I believe it is true that one marks the entering of a man upon his existence—an important period—and that the other marks the period when a man, looking up to the great Creator of all things, hopes for a better life beyond the grave, enters upon a new existence which shall never end. And may it not be also true that nations are the subject of two births? Would it be illogical to say that this nation, when it first took its stand among the nations of the earth passed its first birth, retaining in its nature, it is true, some grains of original sin, and that it is now in the throes of its second birth? I know that in this great trial an ocean of patriot blood has been and must be poured out; yet beneath that purple flood the nation is to be cleansed, and she will arise from her baptism, washed from every guilty stain, to walk away in newness of life. When that happens the goddess of Liberty which stands above us will then look over all this country, from Maine to the Gulf, from ocean to ocean, and she would say, if she could speak: "This, all this, is my country." But, sir, years after this she will look over one hundred million people, and if she could speak she would announce: "These, these are my countrymen, and all of them free."

Mr. STILES. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with some amusement to the rambling tirade of my colleague [Mr. A. MYERS]—I cannot characterize it as a speech—and I rise for the purpose of vindicating the character of a prominent citizen of my own State, perhaps the most prominent to-day, and whose private and public character scarcely needs vindication before this House and before the country. I refer to Hon. George W. Woodward, late candidate for Governor in Pennsylvania. I do not intend to reply at length to my colleague's unwarrantable attack, uncalled for and unwise, in a discussion upon the bill before the House. He said that the gentleman to whom I have alluded, who was a candidate for Governor of Pennsylvania in October last, as a judge of the highest tribunal of the State had decided that the soldiers were not fit to vote. I repeat that charge as not true. The distinguished gentleman to whom my colleague refers I believe was legally elected Governor of Pennsylvania at that election. But, sir, he was defeated by the vote of the Army then stationed in many portions of the State to carry out your draft under this bill, and the numberless men sent from the field pledged before obtaining furloughs to vote against him. He never decided in any opinion delivered by him that the soldiers were unfit to vote, nor that they were not entitled to vote. He did decide in the case of Chase vs. Miller that their vote out of the election district where they resided before enlisting was against the constitution of the State, and under the law of the State their vote taken in camp was illegal. In this I believe all the judges of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, with perhaps a single exception, concurred. The decision was expressly that the soldiers could vote upon complying with the requisites required by our laws. That decision has been approved by the people, for since it was pronounced the necessary steps have been taken to change the constitution allowing soldiers to vote in the field. The decision was entirely upon the statutes of Pennsylvania under its constitution, and no judge of that or any other State ever denied the right of a soldier to vote when at his legal residence, and after complying with the requisites of the law.

My colleague has referred to the fact that Judge Woodward was defeated for Governor. It was believed at the time and is now believed that if there had been a fair expression of the sentiment of the people at the ballot-box, that if the soldiers who returned to their homes had been uninfluenced by the officers in command, and the Administration had not interfered, the majority would have elevated him to the highest office in their gift. He received two hundred and fifty-four thousand votes—a much larger Democratic vote than was ever polled in that State by many thousand. The soldiers who returned to their homes expressly to vote against him were pledged, before they left the field, in opposition to him, and upon that pledge alone they were allowed to return; and I have evidence of the fact that those who refused so to pledge themselves were denied furloughs. As I said, sir, I did not rise to answer the rambling and incoherent remarks of my colleague, but for the purpose of placing the foremost man in my State in a proper position before the country. Judge Woodward has, however, decided the act conscripting the people, the amendments to which are now under consideration, unconstitutional. That is why the attack is made upon him. A majority of the supreme court, as it was then constituted, concurred with him in that opinion, and the court pronounced their judgment that the act was unconstitutional and void. It is true that the injunctions granted in the case of Kneeder vs. Lane, and the other cases decided in November last, have been dissolved by that court, as it is constituted now, a Republican judge, who was elected by the same influence that defeated Judge Woodward, having taken the place of Chief Justice Lowrie upon the bench. However, while the decision stood as the law of the State, it was wholly disregarded by the persons holding positions under the Administration, although it was the law of the State. It was disregarded by my colleague and his whole party. The officers conducting the draft everywhere set the decision at defiance, together with the whole civil authority of the State.

Mr. Chairman, while I did not propose to discuss at length the bill before the House, I cannot allow this bill to pass without protesting against the whole provisions of the original bill and the amendments now proposed. Your draft has been a failure, so acknowledged by the Secretary of War, by the Provost Marshal General, and it is admitted here that thus far it has been a failure. Out of the three hundred thousand men called but fifty thousand were raised, and nine tenths and perhaps more were substitutes. It was a good revenue measure, it is true, because ten to twelve millions of money was raised, which was to have been expended for the procurement of substitutes, but which I believe has never been so expended according to the spirit and intention of the act. Some portion of it has been applied, we are told, for the purpose of procuring negro soldiers from the insurgent States. I say, sir, the people are opposed to the conscription bill, and that opposition is confined to no party, no classes; all alike are opposed to it. It is not the plan for raising men to fill up your mutilated Army.

I say, sir, that the people of this country ratify and confirm the decision of this court to which I have alluded. That public expression is now denied because the freedom of elections does not exist; and the people are powerless before your Army, who are compelled to do the bidding of their masters. If this war were honestly waged to restore the Government in all its power and its unity, there would exist no necessity for a draft of its citizens. Enlistments would be ample for this or any other war. You cannot fill your Army with conscripts. Your purpose in this bill is to impress into the service under the name of "the national forces" every civil officer of the States except its executive, and every citizen between twenty and forty-five years of age. You go further and impress every civil officer of the General Government, with the few exceptions named in the thirteenth section. The judiciary of the States, all the officers of the public Departments, all the municipal officers are to be conscripted, and enter the service as common soldiers. Stripped of all the machinery necessary to make a State organization, you leave it utterly defenseless. The Federal Government in this sweeping stretch of its power overshadows and breaks down State rights, State sovereignty, and assumes all power reserved to the States and the people.

Speaking of this in the case which I have referred to, Chief Justice Lowrie says:

"It seems to me this is an unauthorized substitute for the militia of the States. If valid, it completely annuls, for the time being, the remedy for insurrection provided by the Constitution, and substitutes a new and unprovided one; or rather it takes that very State force, strips it of its officers, despoils it of its organization, and reconstructs its elements under a different authority, though under somewhat similar forms. If this act is law, it is supreme law, and the States can have no militia out of the class usually called to militia duty; for the whole class is appropriated as a national force under this law, and no State can make any law that is inconsistent with it. The State militia is wiped out if this act is valid, except so far as it may be permitted by the Federal Government. If Congress may thus, under its power to raise armies, constitute all the State militiamen into 'national forces' as part of the regular Army, and make them 'liable to perform duty in the service of the United States when called out by the President,' I cannot see that it may not require from them all a constant military training under Federal officers as a preparation for the greatest efficiency when they shall be so called out, and then all the State militia and civil officers may be put into the ranks and subjected to the command of such officers as the President may appoint, and every one would then see that the constitutional State militia becomes a mere name. The Constitution makes it and the men in it a national force in a given contingency, and in a prescribed form; but this act makes them so irrespective of the constitutional form and contingency. This is the substantial fact, and I am not able to refine it away." * * *

"If Congress may institute the plan now under consideration, as a necessary and proper mode of exercising its power 'to raise and support armies,' then it seems to me to follow with more force that it may take a similar mode in the exercise of other powers, and may compel people to lend it their money; take their houses for offices and courts; their ships and steamboats for the Navy; their land for its fortresses; their mechanics and workshops for the different branches of business that are needed for Army supplies; their physicians, ministers, and women for Army surgeons, chaplains, nurses, and cooks; their horses and wagons for their cavalry and for Army trains, and their provisions and crops for the support of the Army. If we give the latitudinarian interpretation, as to mode, which this act requires, I know not how to stop short of this. I am sure there is no present danger of such an extreme interpretation, and that even partisan morality would forbid it; but if the power be admitted we have no security against the relaxation of the morality that guides it. I am quite unable now to suppose that so great a power could have been intended to be granted, and yet to be left so loosely guarded.

"It may be thought that even voluntary enlistments in the regular Army have the same sort of inconsistency with the militia system as forced recruiting has; but more careful reflection will show that it is not so. Enlistment in the Army takes away a part of the militia; but every militia system allows for this, and the general purpose of both is the same—the constitution of a military force. And, besides this, it is of the very nature of the system that it leaves every man free in the pursuit of his ordinary calling, and binds no man to any part of the militia, except by reason of his residence, which he may abandon or change as he pleases."

You thus deprive the State of its means of defense against an invasion, and leave its government, its capital, its cities, and its people without any means of protection or defense, and ignore all its rights which are guaranteed independent of Federal power.

This question affects the rights of the States. Thus usurpation assumes complete and absolute control of the militia of the States. Judge Woodward, in the case to which I have alluded, says:

"To raise armies—these are large words; what do they mean? There could be no limitation upon the number or size of the armies to be raised, for all possible contingencies could not be foreseen; but our question has not reference to number or size, but to the mode of raising armies. The framers of the Constitution, and the States which adopted it, derived their ideas of government principally from the example of Great Britain—certainly not from any of the more imperial and despotic Governments of the earth. What they meant to make was a more free constitution than that of Great Britain—taking that as a model in some things—but enlarging the basis of popular rights in all respects that would be consistent with order and stability. They knew that the British army had generally been recruited by voluntary enlistments, stimulated by wages and bounties, and that the few instances of impressment and forced conscriptions of land forces had met with the disfavor of the English nation, and had led to preventive statutes. In 1704, and again in 1707, conscription bills were attempted in Parliament, but laid aside as unconstitutional. During the American Revolution, a statute, 19 George III, chapter 10, permitted the impressment of 'idle and disorderly persons not following any lawful trade, or having some substance sufficient for their subsistence,' and this was as far as English legislation had gone when our Federal Constitution was planned. Assuredly the framers of our Constitution did not intend to subject the people of the States to a system of conscription which was applied in the mother country only to paupers and vagabonds. On the contrary, I infer that the power conferred on Congress was the power to raise armies by the ordinary English mode of voluntary enlistments."

"The people were justly jealous of standing armies. Hence they took away most of the war power from the executive, where, under monarchical forms, it generally resides, and vested it in the legislative department, in one branch of which the States have equal representation, and in the other branch of which the people of the States are directly represented according to their numbers. To these representatives of the States and the people this power of originating war was committed, but even in their hands it was restrained by the limitation of biennial appropriations for the support of the armies they might raise. Of course no army could be raised or supported which did not command popular approbation, and it was rightly considered that voluntary enlistments would never be wanting to recruit the ranks of such an army. The war power existing only for the protection of the people, and left, as far as it was possible to leave it, in their own hands, was incapable of being used without their consent, and therefore could never languish for enlistments. They would be ready enough to recruit the ranks of any army they deemed necessary to their safety. Thus the theory of the Constitution placed this great power, like all other governmental powers, directly upon the consent of the governed."

"The theory itself was founded on free and fair elections, which are the fundamental postulate of the Constitution. If the patronage and power of the Government shall ever be employed to control popular elections, the nominal representatives of the people may cease to be their real representatives, and then the armies which may be raised may not so command public confidence as to attract the necessary recruits, and then conscript laws, and other extra-constitutional expedients, may become necessary to fill the ranks. But governmental interference with popular elections will be a subversion of the Constitution, and no constitutional argument can assume such a possibility."

"Supposing, then, that the people are always to be fairly represented in the Halls of Congress, I maintain that it is grievous injustice to them to legislate on the assumption that any war, honestly waged for constitutional objects, will not always have such sympathy and support from the people as will secure all necessary enlistments. Equally unjust to their intelligence is it to suppose that they meant to confer on their servants the power to impress them into a war which they could not approve."

"When to these considerations we add the ability of a great country like ours to stimulate and reward enlistments, both at home and abroad, by bounties, pensions, and home-steads, as well as by political patronage in countless forms, we see how little necessity or warrant there is for implying a grant of the imperial power of conscription."

"If the very improbable case be supposable, that enlistments into the Federal armies might become so numerous in a particular State as sensibly to impair its own proper military power, is it not much more improbable that the States meant to confer upon the General Government the power to deprive them, at its own pleasure, altogether of the militia by forced levies? Yet this might easily happen if the power of conscription be conceded to Congress. There are no limitations expressed—nothing to compel Congress to observe quotas and proportions as among the several States—nothing to prevent their raising armies wholly from one State, taking every able-bodied citizen out of it to the endangering, if not utter undoing of all its domestic interests."

I did not intend and do not now propose to discuss the question which is necessarily raised by this bill relative to the rights of the States and the citizens of States. This question was exhaustively discussed in the last Congress, and then unheeded. It will be so now.

This act rests upon the provision of the Constitution which declares that—

"Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, to suppress insurrections, and repel invasions."

And further—

"Congress shall have power to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress."

These provisions were never intended to take from the States their power over their militia, but in another provision giving Congress the power to raise and support armies, they had the power to "organize, arm, and discipline," that all the militia of the respective States when called should be regulated by a uniform system. But to the States is reserved the right to officer all who are mustered into the service of the United States.

Your bill not only takes the militia of the States but gives the President the power to appoint all the officers. You transfer to the President the absolute control over any citizen between certain ages, and through the machinery of this bill the power is transferred to the district provost marshal, who exercises absolute control in his military district. From his judgment there is no appeal, no remedy is given; and where is the remedy given by which the conscript can escape though he be under or over the age of the persons here named? Though you are threescore and ten, a political foe, raised to the dignity of a member of the press-gang, can make you of proper age, under forty-five, for the purpose of your being compelled to perform service. You give no appeal, and from his decision there is no review. Your indemnity bill protects every officer. With the writ of habeas corpus suspended and the civil courts, national and State, closed, you are at the mercy of him who says you are of proper age.

I say, sir, that your provost marshal holds in his hands the liberty of us all. The citizen says, I am under the age to which your bill is limited. He is told he is twenty years old. Where is the legal remedy if your wife is conscripted as a male citizen, if he says she is a male citizen? You say, perhaps, there is an appeal to the Provost Marshal General, or the Secretary of War, or the President. There is no such appeal, as I have been informed. The judgment cannot be reviewed. Your habeas corpus is suspended everywhere, and if you do not comply with notices and orders you are court-martialed, and must suffer the pains and penalties provided for cases of desertion. Says the bill, if the drafted person does not comply with the orders issued by the provost "he shall be deemed a deserter, and shall be arrested by the provost marshal, and sent to the nearest military post for trial by court-martial;" and the penalty, though you never were in the service, may be that of death.

There can be no such thing as desertion before the party is in the service. No one is subject to the articles of war who is not mustered into service. Inflicting the penalty of death upon one because he neglects or refuses to obey the orders of a marshal would be murder.

The dangers of an army in repose or in active service as a standing army was debated long and well when this Government was formed. It is the bane of republican forms of government, and the people wanted no standing armies. The reserved powers were to prevent standing armies and raising a military power. You strike down those rights and anarchy will follow, and that power most to be feared, an army extending its dominion, will rear here at your very capital a military despotism more to be feared and more dangerous than that of Russia or France, with not even the semblance of a Government republican in form. Transfer all your rights under your general and local laws to a provost marshal holding rank in the Army, allow him to be the arbiter, and there is no safety even now. You will blot from the great charter the amendment which declares that "no person shall be deprived of his liberty or property without due process of law." And by what tortuous language will you say that a trial before a military court is "due process of law?" Is the tenure of your liberties to hang upon the judgment of such a tribunal? Was that the meaning of those words which the highest and humblest understand to mean judges learned in the law and a jury of his peers?

Your draft has failed; it will fail again. The President has issued a call for eight hundred thousand men. Can you raise them under this bill? The free citizens of this country are opposed to this mode of replenishing your Army.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to inquire of my colleague where he hears that a call, of which he speaks, for eight hundred thousand men has been made?

Mr. STILES. I should hope to get that information from my colleague. I have seen a call for three hundred thousand men, and lately another call for five hundred thousand; which makes eight hundred thousand.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman will take the pains to read the President's proclamation he will find that the five hundred thousand call embraces the three hundred thousand of which he speaks.

Mr. STILES. That is not in the proclamation. There is no such statement. Does my colleague speak from authority?

Mr. KELLEY. I would inquire whether my colleague does not very well know that the entire call is for only five hundred thousand men?

Mr. STILES. The first call of the President was for three hundred thousand, and now there is another call for five hundred thousand. In the order for five hundred thousand nothing is said about the three hundred thousand.

Mr. KELLEY. The whole call is embraced within eight lines of printed matter; and the five hundred thousand expressly embraces the three hundred thousand as a part of it.

Mr. STILES. Is that embraced in the order?

Mr. KELLEY. It is.

Mr. STILES. It is not mentioned.

Mr. KELLEY. The order is plain, I apprehend, and if my colleague will permit me I will read it. The President gave notice that he would call for three hundred thousand men, but no such call was made. The order for five hundred thousand men is now made, and it is in these words:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON, MONDAY, February 1, 1864.

Ordered, that a draft for five hundred thousand men to serve for three years or during the war be made on the 10th day of March next, for the military service of the United States, crediting and deducting therefrom so many as may have been enlisted or drafted into the service prior to the 1st day of March and not heretofore credited.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Mr. STILES. I say that that order says nothing about the three hundred thousand men, and the inference is that eight hundred thousand are called for. I have so understood it. If the gentleman speaks by authority I would like to know whether five hundred thousand men are to be drafted or eight hundred thousand?

Mr. KELLEY. Were one to rise from the dead to explain to the man who does not understand that, he would not speak by sufficient authority to convince him.

Mr. STILES. I would take it from a dead man as soon as I would from my colleague. [Laughter.]

Sir, this question was alluded to yesterday by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] with some apprehensions of alarm. The people in some of the States have submitted willingly, it may be; in others they have not so willingly submitted. The danger of this experiment, because it is an experiment, may not now manifest itself, but I fear that the time will come when a power greater than you can control will boldly declare that it is a violation of personal liberty which the people of the country will never submit to. The right of all redress by the civil authority denied in the clearest case, subjecting us all to the iron power of military courts, the people may take into their own hands the question of their reserved rights, and the question of their own individual liberty. Amending your bill, giving the right of appeal before a civil court in case of illegal and unwarrantable restraint, may do much to change the bitterness and harshness of this obnoxious measure.

Mr. Chairman, the people are to be overshadowed by an army, an army of millions; a standing army it may be, because the President, under this bill, can make it as perpetual as his ambition for power; thus vested with a power never contemplated in the powers delegated to him. With an army there can be no elections; they cannot exist together; they never existed in any country, and never will. The citizen, knowing his own individual weakness, would give way before the power of an armed soldiery. He would surrender settled opinions and fixed principles before the army that any Executive might raise and maintain under this bill. An impending draft and the power of the Army carried the elections in my State last fall. In the border States, it is said, the bayonet is in some districts at least represented here, and not the people.

Sir, the people are watchful, but impatient. They are looking to this Congress, without hope, I fear, for restoration, for quiet, and for the "beginning of the end" of this great struggle. They are looking to you, the dominant party here, you who ask nothing from this side of the House, to give them a ray of light in this dark night. They have had your promises for three years that this conflict, terrible and devastating, would soon be over. "What of the night" now? I charge you not to deceive them longer. Your bills and your speeches calling for all—the last man and the last dollar—will be sad news now. "Tax, fight, emancipate," said the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] two years ago. Add to that confiscation and conscription, and what will not be added to the objects and aims of those in power? Surrender up all will only satisfy.

Sir, it matters little to the people whether their liberties are lost by armed rebels or by daring usurpations of power. You must leave to them the freedom of elections, at least. They have resolved to maintain that right to the last. The resolution of the New Hampshire Democratic State convention, recently held, will meet with approval everywhere, and I insert it here as the determined sentiment of my people:

"Resolved, That the freedom of the ballot must and shall be maintained sacred and inviolable; and that we, the Democracy of New Hampshire, will unite with our brethren of other States, by force of arms, if need be, in resistance to every attempt, from whatever source it may come, to overturn or abridge, by menaces or direct interference by military force, the independence and purity of the ballot-box in the ensuing elections, State and national; and to this end we pledge, each to the other, and to our brethren of other States, our lives, fortunes, and sacred honor, being firmly resolved to maintain at all hazards our rights as free and patriotic citizens of the American Union."

Mr. Chairman, I have detained the House longer than I had intended. My purpose was to say a word in reply to my colleague who might have been supposed to speak the sentiment of our State, and I deemed it proper to make an immediate reply. Having been drawn into some remarks upon the immediate question before the House, I repeat that this bill is unpopular, and the people of my State have not submitted to a draft without murmuring. In my own county where there is a large Republican vote, but one single man, I believe, out of nearly thirteen hundred drafted, went to the Army under the conscription bill. I say again, conscription is unpopular, and the people are opposed to that mode of raising men to replenish the armies. They are opposed to it in every portion of my State, and in every other portion, I believe, of this country. You must resort to some other mode by which to raise up men to fill the Army, if filled it is to be. This will not do it. That is utterly impossible. If it be that after this bill is passed, the people shall refuse to obey this law which you inflict upon them, you will have been warned in time. I tell you the people are opposed to it. They have submitted to your taxation, unequal and unjust as it is, and will, I suppose, submit; but this bill should be repealed. The raising of volunteers for the armies should be by paying bounties, and not by force.

My colleague says this rebellion will be put down and the country restored. I hope it may be. I have doubts whether it will be put down under this Administration with its present policy. As was said by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] this country could not survive with a war that should continue through another Administration. My colleague says Mr. Lincoln is to be reelected, and that he is to bear the ship of State safely into port. The gentleman from New York said he did not believe this country could endure another four years of an Administration like this. I believe it, sir; and I believe that during the next four years, under the policy inaugurated in the beginning, if continued, we shall not see the end of this war nor the restoration of the Union.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, if this had been a new question I should have felt greatly embarrassed as to the policy or propriety of commencing military service for money. This is a war measure, and not a revenue measure. The Government wants men and not money. The latter has been furnished by the people with unstinted and ungrudging liberality; nay, with a prodigality which has surprised ourselves, and at which the world stands amazed. I do not know how to value the stout heart or the strong arm of the American freeman in the current money of the merchant. I do not like the traffic in men and muscle and sinew, whether it be white or black. Looking to the experience of other republics, I should greatly deprecate the conversion of the soldier of ours into a mercenary. Between men of American growth and training and the richest of the metals I know no common standard of comparison. With me they are quantities incommensurable. When the Republic demands the services of her children I know no answer they can make except that of Isaac, that they are ready for the sacrifice. It is the answer which their uncalculating instincts prompted when the echoes of the guns in Charleston harbor thrilled along their nerves, and half a million of them sprang to their arms at the first summons of the President to avenge the insult to our flag; when the very yearnings of maternity were hushed, and the American, like the Spartan mother arrayed her youngest born as though it had been for the bridal, put the musket in his hands, and sent him out with the invocation of God's blessing upon his errand, and the injunction to do his duty and come back upon his shield, if such were the fortunes of war, but not without it. It is the answer which they would still make if their ardor were not chilled by the fatal and inglorious inaction, the wearisome delays, the inadequate results, and the want of earnestness, which have distinguished so many of our commanders; or, what is worse still, if their love of country was not overlaid and smothered by the devilish suggestions of wicked counselors who have squatted at their ears and distilled into them the subtle venom of party.

They have ceased, however, to make that answer. Enthusiasm was too weak to survive rebuffs and disappointments, while treason at home was but too ready to make them the occasion for denunciations against the Government and questions as to the rightfulness and the successful results of the war. It has become, of course, a necessity to remind the backward of their duty, and to insist that it shall be performed. These arguments have prevailed, however, with many of the people who had been accustomed to take counsel from the malcontents. They have held back accordingly until it has become indispensable to awaken them to a sense of the obligations which they owe to their country. Their advisers do not, however, deny the duty; so far as lip-service is concerned, there is an abundance of it. But they insist that the performance shall be a voluntary one, or, in other words, that it shall rest in their own discretion. Like Falstaff, they would do nothing on compulsion. To compel a Democrat to fight would be anti-republican, or if there is to be compulsion it must be, upon the authority of a great casuist of the Romish church, who has not read Bellarmine in vain and knows how to turn a corner as adroitly as the original and inimitable Jack himself, a voluntary one, a sort of compulsion in the Pickwickian sense. To compel him in any other way would be a violation of his prerogative as a freeman. A perfect liberty is the right of doing what we please, but never anything on compulsion.

And now a word or two in sober earnest on the objection taken seriously here, and urged throughout the country, in relation to the legitimacy of the draft. I need not apologize for speaking on that point. It is always important to satisfy the people not only that a thing is law but that it is right. It is always well to add the sanctions of conscience and the sense of duty to the mandates of the lawgiver. Without this laws are practically impotent. The "sic volo, sic jubeo, stet pro ratione voluntas" of an imperial rescript is not the argument for an American citizen. He wants more than this, and he wants it here because immense pains have been taken to cloud his perceptions and pervert his moral sense by representing the compulsory performance of the highest of his duties as a violation of his liberties. The oracles of the Opposition have proclaimed—their highest legal authorities in Pennsylvania, in the exercise of a jurisdiction heretofore unknown, have decided—that the act of the last session was unconstitutional. Men equally trusted by them here have insisted that its principle was anti-republican. It is important, therefore, to inquire whether these things are so—whether there is anything here to authorize these imputations or to excuse even a reluctant submission to a measure which is essential to the safety of the nation and has been made necessary by the counsels of the very men who now complain of it.

I do not propose to enter into objections of detail arising out of the peculiar features of the law or to argue the question upon merely technical or professional grounds. These are for the courts. This is a higher forum, and the objection made to the principle, radical as it is; an appeal from the lawyer to the publicist, from the courts to the people. It is the statesman who must decide it, and not the judge.

Is it true, then, that a compulsory levy of troops—a conscription, if you please—in the extremity of a State is anti-republican in principle, or, in other words, at war with the spirit of our institutions and the genius and character of this Government? It has been so announced on this floor, on authority supposed to be conclusive, and has gone to the country without contradiction. It was a challenge of the law from a higher point than the Constitution. It was not the assertion in terms that the law was at variance with the Constitution, but in effect that the Constitution itself was not republican, and did not conform to the fundamental idea on which it rested. It was the proclamation of a higher law which the authority "to raise and support armies" had impinged upon.

Well, I am no higher-law man, except so far as the consideration of the public safety or the nation's life may make me so. I am not ashamed or afraid to recognize thus publicly the maxim of the salus populi suprema lex. It was a provision of consummate wisdom in the constitution of republican Rome, and one which in the judgment of one of the acutest and profoundest statesmen of any age was the source of all its grandeur as well as the guarantee of its stability, which created a dictatorship for times of great public peril, for the reason that such a power must be invoked in the extremities to which every State is subject, and that where it is wanting it becomes necessary to violate the constitution—which is always of bad example—in order to the salvation of the State.

For the sake of greater clearness, I quote the passage itself, translated by me from the French version in default of an English one, of the "Treatise on the Republic," by Machiavelli:

"This part of the constitution of Rome deserves to be remarked, and ranked in the number of those which contributed the most to the greatness of its empire. Without an institution of this nature, a State cannot escape but with great difficulty from extraordinary convulsions."

"It follows from this that all republics must have in their constitutions a like establishment. When it is wanting it becomes necessary, by pursuing the ordinary track, to see the constitution perish, or rather to depart from it for the purpose of saving it. But in a State well constituted no event must happen for which there shall be occasion to resort to extraordinary ways; for if extraordinary means do good for the moment, their example constitutes a real evil. The habit of violating the constitution to do good afterwards authorizes its violation to color evil. A republic, therefore, is never perfect if its laws have not provided for everything, held the remedy always in readiness, and furnished the means of employing it. And I conclude by saying that republics which in imminent dangers have no recourse either to a dictator or to like magistrates must inevitably perish therein."

The war power of our Constitution is the equivalent of the Roman dictatorship. It is, however, here as well as there, the extreme medicine of the Constitution, and not its daily bread. The mission of a republic is peace; war is a state of violence. To conduct an army upon the principles of republican equality would be fatal to all subordination and discipline. For such an exigency as this the normal condition of a republic will not serve. Its very organization would forbid it. War is anti-republican in its effects, and can only be successfully waged on anti-republican principles. While it prevails the law itself must almost necessarily be silent. Its code of laws is necessarily anti-republican. With such a Government, therefore, it is an unnatural condition, and the thirst for territorial aggrandizement through the agency of the sword does violence to its nature and its life. But while wars of conquest are anti-republican, a war of self-defense to preserve the nation's life is a legitimate because it is a necessary one. The doctrine of non-resistance would be fatal to any Government. When there is no mode left of supporting the Constitution, except by suspending the enjoyment of an individual right, that right must yield to the occasion. It is not the Constitution that authorizes the suspension of the habeas corpus. Recognizing, as its framers did, the necessity of putting the highest privilege of the citizen in abeyance, they do not grant but only qualify or abridge its exercise, by providing that it shall not be suspended except in the cases indicated. Every attribute of sovereignty which pertains to any Government that is supreme may be exercised when necessary, unless it is expressly forbidden. Thus the right of eminent domain, as it is called by the publicists, or that which authorizes the seizure or destruction of private property for public uses, and the kindred power of taxation which seizes it without other equivalent than the protection which the Government affords, are not the subjects of special grant, but only of special limitation. Establish a Government that is independent and sovereign, and they belong to it of course, because they are essential attributes, inseparable from its very being. If a Government can, however, take private property, which is the mere product of labor, without compensation, for a public use, it is but a step further, and an easy one, to take the producer himself, as it does when it compels him to work on the highway on the ground of public necessity.

It is not disputed, as I understand, by anybody here, that the Government is entitled to the military services of all its citizens when they are needed for its defense. The objection is only that a compulsory levy is anti-republican. If this be true, then the idea of such a thing as a republican Government is the wildest of chimeras. Admitting the duty, the right to enforce it is a corollary, a necessary consequence, in this case as in all others. The notion of any Government at all presupposes supremacy, subordination, and constraint. No Government ever did or ever can rest upon the mere voluntary principle. All the duties of the citizen, except those merely moral ones that are said to be of imperfect obligation—all that are political at least—rest upon the idea of coercion. That is the principle of every law. That is the import of the whole judicial machinery with which we are surrounded. The posse comitatus itself is nothing more nor less than a compulsory levy, an army improvised to execute the laws. When the time arrives—which will not be until the millennium foreshadowed by the prophets, and several years after the modern Democracy shall have died out like the extinct monsters of the earlier geological epochs—when men shall perform their duties voluntarily, there will be no further occasion for either Government or laws. The notion that the mob of New York, and the unnatural sympathizers with the rebellion everywhere, shall not be compelled to defend the Government that protects them in all their rights and endows them with the unwanted privilege of governing other people, is but the extension of the argument of the late Attorney General of the United States, and now reporter of its Supreme Court, that there could be no coercion of States, and that this great Government was without even the power of self-defense, was helpless against the parricide, and must uncover its bosom or wrap its robes around it and submit to death without a struggle whenever the murderous blow was aimed by the hands of its own children. That was according to programme. Both have the same purpose and meaning. That would have crowned the work of the traitors with immediate success. This is a slower poison, which would leave the defense of the nation to the loyal Unionist in the field, and transfer the direction of the Government to the hands of the auxiliaries of the rebellion, who choose "to kiss my lady peace at home;" who know that they can serve the cause they love with more effect and greater safety here by affecting loyalty, misrepresenting the designs of the Government, discouraging volunteering, and denouncing compulsory levies of men, than by taking their places openly in the armies of the confederacy. I do not know a man of them who is not now an "unconditional Unionist;" provided he can have "the Union as it was," which he knows to be impossible, whether we succeed or fail, or treat, as he desires us to do, and hopes to bring about by cherishing the disease, preserving the cause of the disunion, and declining to employ the most necessary and effective weapon which Providence has placed in our hands for compelling the eventual restoration of the Union itself. Thank God! the instincts of the people, the loyal army at home, have revolted at the special plea of the attorney, and even converted him at the late elections into the noisiest of patriots and the professed advocate of the vigorous prosecution of the war; that is to say, on peace principles, and provided you will refuse to allow the willing negro or compel the reluctant and recalcitrant Democrat to fight. The fear is, in view of the well-known Army sentiment, that it would change the very nature of the latter by showing him the realities of war and making him a radical, or, in other words, an earnest man.

We have the authority of one of the apostles of the new Democracy now holding a seat on this floor, if the newspapers have not misrepresented him, for the opinion publicly expressed in the great peace convention at New York, that a war Democrat is an impossible thing; and that any man who would draw a sword here in such a quarrel—I mean on this side of it—is no better than a Black Republican. And so it is that, while all the Democracy of Butler and Burnside and Hooker and other fighting generals of that stamp, who have proved that they were in earnest, has failed to shelter them from the denunciations of the rebel papers in Richmond and New York, the non-combatant qualities of the grave-digger of the Chickahominy and the loiterer at Bull Run have made him the idol of the Democracy in both those capitals. If the gentleman from Kentucky, who was taxed a few days ago by his colleagues with infidelity to his pledges to vote for a war Democrat, had adhered to the sentiment to which I have just referred, he might have answered that a war Democrat was a myth—a personage even more apocryphal than Prester John or the man with the iron mask.

If it be true, however, that a compulsory levy of men for the protection of the Government or the enforcement of its laws is anti-republican, then I say again that republican government is just as impossible a thing as a war Democrat. The nation which cannot command the military services of its people has no guarantee of life, and must inevitably perish in its first formidable convulsion. To presume that they will all rush to its standard at the first summons, and that they will adhere to it alike through good and ill fortune, alike through sunshine and through storm, is to suppose in the face of our present experience that it contains no bold traitors who will lift their hands against it in battle, no cowardly miscreants who, with professions of loyalty on their lips, will adopt the safer policy of skulking from its defense, or aiding and encouraging those who are endeavoring to overthrow it. The time was when this service was a privilege of rank or fortune; when the soldier served without wages, although he derives his name from the idea of pay, and when the craven who refused to respond to the summons of his country was visited with the dire anathema which is so well paraphrased by the genius of the immortal Scott, and finds its climactic in the imprecation "Woe to the traitor, woe!" A greater than he has remarked that "the age of chivalry is gone, and the age of sophists and economists has succeeded." It was not so at the commencement of this rebellion.

I happened to be at the seat of government of Pennsylvania when the news of the bombardment of Sumter came over the electric wires and shook its capital as with an earthquake throe, and then sped on its fiery errand along the Susquehanna and the Delaware and the limpid Alleghany, until it reached the distant shore of the great lake which bathes her northwestern confines. The fiery cross that passed from hand to hand and gathered the clansmen of the hills around the banner of their chief never so traveled, never lighted such a conflagration as was kindled by that message. Before the setting of another sun a hundred thousand Pennsylvania men were begging for the privilege of laying down their lives in the defense of the insulted flag of their fathers. The political managers of the Democratic party who had bargained against coercion and pledged themselves that Pennsylvania would take sides with the rebellious States were appalled by the demonstration, and slunk away from the public gaze which would have blasted them. It was only when reverses overtook our arms—reverses which were the consequence of the unsuccessful effort to propitiate themselves by taking counsel with and employing men of the same type of thought—that they ventured to reappear, and managed to seduce the loyal men of the Democratic party into the belief that a Republican Administration was unfit to conduct the war, which they reinforced by the argument that it was obliged to borrow its generals almost exclusively from the Democratic party. If a draft was made necessary after such a demonstration it was through their agency. If it has proved ineffective or unpopular it is because they have endeavored to make it so.

The country knows how the question was dealt with by the Democratic authorities of New York. It knows, too, the process by which the Democratic judges of the supreme court of Pennsylvania undertook, with indecent precipitancy, and in the exercise of a jurisdiction entirely new, to restrain the execution of the law which authorized it. And we are reminded here from day to day that there are men among us who apparently do not intend that the country shall find soldiers, either white or black, if they can prevent it; who insist that we shall not enlist the negro because it is a privilege which belongs only to the white man; who say to the white man that he ought not to volunteer because it is an abolition war; and that the conscription is unlawful and unnecessary because we ought to depend on volunteers; and who, after doing everything in their power to render the law ineffective, come here and, with a coolness that would be absolutely refreshing if the times were not so much out of joint, demand its repeal on the ground that they have succeeded! I have heard it stated that the district of the gentleman from New York who is most importunate on this point has yielded—under his patriotic auspices, no doubt—about three hundred and fifty soldiers, leaving his voters, of course, most comfortably intact, and in a condition to govern the nation at least, if they will not fight for it. If he favors the war, however, as he says he does, why does he not endeavor to amend the law? If the commutation clause is the difficulty with his constituents, and he thinks that a poor man can pay $1,000 for a substitute more easily than he can pay $300, why does he not move to strike it out?

I fear it cannot be made to suit gentlemen of that cast of mind and heart unless it can be so framed as to defeat the object entirely. Their constitutional scruples will not allow them to do anything for the salvation of this nation. They have found no difficulty heretofore in discovering in that instrument every power that was required to further the interests of the divine institution. They had no difficulty in regard to the Louisiana or Florida purchases; none as to the annexation of Texas; none as to the assumption of its debts; none as to the purchase or seizure, at the expense of another war like the Mexican if necessary, of the gem of the Antilles. When the attempt is made, however, to extract anything valuable from that instrument for the interests of humanity or the preservation of the nation's life, it is no better than a caput mortuum—without vitality, full of obstructions, impotent for good, but alive all over, in all its members, and actively omnipotent, too, for mischief. These constitutional expounders who strain at a gnat make no account of taking in a camel at a breakfast. I should despair of making anything out of them by a constitutional argument.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of three o'clock having arrived, all further general debate is out of order. The first question is upon the amendment offered day before yesterday by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] which will be reported.

The amendment was as follows:

Strike out on page 4, line nineteen, after the word "enlisted," all down to the end of the fifth section, as follows:

And if any drafted person shall hereafter pay money for the procurement of a substitute, under the provisions of the act to which this is an amendment, such payment of money shall operate only to relieve such person from draft on that call, and his name shall be retained on the roll, and he shall be subject to draft on future calls; and the maximum of commutation under said act shall hereafter be $400 instead of $300; and insert in lieu thereof the following:

And so much of the thirteenth section of the act of which this act is an amendment as authorizes exemption from military service by the payment of a sum not exceeding $300 is hereby repealed.

Mr. SCHENCK. Is that an amendment to the fifth section?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. SCHENCK. The committee had not concluded their amendments to the fourth section, and I intended to propose a substitute for that section.

The CHAIRMAN. A motion was made to strike out the fourth section, and that motion was rejected. The committee then passed to the fifth section. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Ohio will be permitted to offer an amendment to the fourth section.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will hear the amendment read, reserving meanwhile my right to object.

Mr. SCHENCK. I propose to amend the fourth section before any amendments are offered to the fifth.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is laboring under a mistake. An amendment to the fifth section has already been considered and adopted, and a second amendment to it is now pending. If, however, there be no objection the Chair will entertain an amendment to the fourth section. The gentleman will state his amendment for information.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to strike out all of the fourth section after the word "time," in the fifth line, which is as follows:

An acceptable substitute, who is not liable to draft, and such person so furnishing a substitute shall be exempt from draft during the time for which such substitute shall not be liable to draft, not exceeding three years; but no person in the service of the United States shall become a substitute to serve in any regiment or company except among the troops of the State in which he originally enlisted or from which he was drafted.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Previous to the draft an acceptable substitute, who is not liable to draft nor at the time in the military or naval service of the United States, and such person so furnishing a substitute shall be exempted from draft during the time such substitute shall be exempted from draft, not, however, exceeding the time for which said substitute shall have been accepted.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to this amendment being entertained?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

The question recurred on Mr. HOLMAN's amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. I hope the committee will understand that that amendment strikes out the entire privilege of commutation.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HOLMAN, and KELLOGG, of Michigan, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 26, noes 73.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend the section by striking out the word "four" and inserting "three," so as to leave the commutation as it is under the present law, at $300; and if that amendment carries, I shall move to strike out the balance of the section.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Michigan. I move to strike out after the word "calls" in the twenty-fifth line the words, "and the maximum of commutation under said act shall hereafter be $400 instead of $300." That will leave the law in relation to commutation as it now stands.

Mr. STEVENS. That amendment will accomplish my purpose, and I withdraw mine.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to strike out all of section five after the enacting clause, and to insert in lieu of it the corresponding section, section six, of the substitute reported by the House Committee on Military Affairs; which is as follows:

That any person drafted into the military service of the United States may, before the time fixed for his appearance at the draft rendezvous, furnish an acceptable substitute, subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War. If such substitute is not liable to draft, the person furnishing him shall be exempt from draft during the time for which such substitute is not liable to draft, not exceeding the term for which he was drafted; and if such substitute is liable to draft, the name of the person furnishing him shall be liable to draft in filling future quotas. And if any drafted person shall hereafter pay money for the procurement of a substitute, under the provision of the act to which this is an amendment, such payment of money shall operate only to relieve such person from draft in filling that quota, and his name shall be retained on the roll in filling future quotas; but in no instance shall the exemption of any person, on account of his payment of commutation money for the procurement of a substitute, extend beyond one year; but at the end of one year in every such case the name of any person so exempted shall be enrolled again, if not before returned to the enrollment list under the provisions of this section.

Mr. Chairman, if the labors of the Committee on Military Affairs of this House are of any value whatever to the House their substitute ought to come in competition, section by section, with the Senate bill. It is for that purpose that I offer this amendment, and I propose to pursue the same course with each section as we pass along. That seems to me to be the only way in which the labors of the committee can be made of any avail if they are valuable at all to the House.

Now, if the committee will notice one or two points of change, they will see the reason why we adopted our language instead of the language of the Senate. For instance, in the third line of the Senate bill we have added a clause, so that the first paragraph of the section will read "any person drafted into the military service of the United States may, before the time fixed for his appearance at the draft rendezvous, furnish an acceptable substitute." The language of the Senate bill on this point is ambiguous. We put in these words in order to provide that the substitute shall be brought in before the time fixed for the appearance of the drafted man at the rendezvous, so that men shall not be allowed to bring in their substitutes at any time, even after the time when they should have themselves appeared. It shall not be sufficient for the man to bring a substitute forty days after he is notified to appear, but he must bring his substitute before the day or by the day he was to appear for duty at the draft rendezvous. That limiting clause is found in our section of the substitute, but is not in the Senate bill.

Mr. COFFROTH. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether the person drafted is to be allowed to offer a substitute after he has undergone an examination for physical disability?

Mr. GARFIELD. That question is not touched, so far as I know, in this section. I do not know that I quite understand the gentleman.

Mr. COFFROTH. After the drafted man is notified to appear before the provost marshal, and after he has undergone an examination for physical disability, is he entitled to put in a substitute?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes; any time previous to the time that he should appear for duty at the rendezvous.

courts to stain by sentence. Our ancestors thought they had put an end to the war upon the family and upon property for the political crime of treason. So the people ever since supposed, until Underwood & Co. poured the flood-tide of a new light upon the subject.

I pass from that. Let it go. The true inquiry is that into which the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, went the other day with sufficient boldness, if not with sufficient candor. He who takes his position as a leader in times like these ought always to take it boldly in advance, and thus make himself responsible to his followers, to contemporaries, and to history. We are in a war, he says, in a public war, a war between two foreign nations. He says that, being in a state of war, the laws of nations confer upon us certain belligerent rights which not only exist while the war continues but remain when the war shall be over. Among these rights, he says, is the right of conquest. It is a war, he says, which treats every person inside the hostile territory as an enemy, be he friend or foe, citizen or foreigner, who is in the predicament of residence in the hostile territory.

I desire, Mr. Speaker, since I have the greatest respect for the intelligence of that gentleman, for the boldness with which he meets all these questions, for the great ability which he brings to the discussion of them, and for the spirit of courtesy and fairness which he always extends to an opponent in debate, to state with some precision the exact position that he assumes. It is not the position of a solitary unimportant individual, but the position of a leading man in this House and in the country. My own opinion is that "whoever hits him on the head will knock out the brains of" the Republican party. [Laughter.] He says:

"I begin simply by denying that the Constitution has the least reference to any one of the provisions of the bill in question, and I intend to show that the act of 1862, which was modified by a resolution which, it has been truly said, was passed under duress very little to the credit of the Congress that passed it—this act of 1862 is not affected directly or indirectly by any one of the provisions of the Constitution, and that especially that part of the act which provides for seizing property and confiscating it in fee simple is purely a proceeding under the laws of war and under the laws of nations, over which the Constitution has no control, and in regard to which it has no effect whatever."

And he proceeds to argue that the property is to be seized and condemned not as the property of persons guilty of the crime of treason, but as enemies under the laws of nations. He says:

"This act of Congress, so far as it refers to seizures of property in fee, refers to them as seizures of the property of alien enemies, to be treated as such."

I understand him distinctly to repudiate the idea that we may hold these persons criminally responsible to our municipal laws for acts done since they have risen to the dignity of belligerents. He says that we cannot do it, and that in point of fact we do not do it; that having ourselves appealed to the laws of nations to interpret our rights in this war; having claimed the benefit of that condemnation in prize courts which the laws of nations authorize; having captured on the high seas the property of our own friends—perhaps the most loyal men of the South—we cannot now repudiate the laws of nations in any particular when applicable to the contest; and that, consequently, for acts done by any of these men since they have been subject to a belligerent power, with the rights of belligerents, they are not criminally responsible to our municipal laws, but only as enemies and to the laws of war. I agree with him in that.

The speaker's views as to the source of our right of confiscation as well as the relation of the States held by the rebel power to the parent Government are still further illustrated by another passage which I will read:

"It is, however, essential to ascertain what relation the seceded States bear to the United States, that we may know how to deal with them in reestablishing the national Government. There seems to be great confusion of ideas and diversity of opinion on that subject. Some think that those States are still in the Union and entitled to the protection of the Constitution and laws of the United States, and that, notwithstanding all they have done, may at any time, without any legislation, come back, send Senators and Representatives to Congress, and enjoy all the privileges and immunities of loyal members of the United States. That whenever those 'wayward sisters' choose to abandon their frivolities and present themselves at the door of the Union and demand admission, we must receive them with open arms, and throw over them the protecting shield of the Union, of which it is said they had never ceased to be members. Others hold that, having committed treason, renounced their allegiance to the Union, discarded its Constitution and laws, organized a distinct and hostile government, and by force of arms having risen from the condition of insurgents to the position of an independent Power de facto, and having been acknowledged as a belligerent both by foreign nations and our own Government, the Constitution and laws of the Union are abrogated so far as they are concerned, and that, as between the two belligerents, they are under the laws of war and the laws of nations alone, and that whichever Power conquers may treat the vanquished as conquered provinces, and may impose upon them such conditions and laws as it may deem best."

Again he says:

"Is the present contest to be regarded as a public war, and to be governed by the rules of civilized warfare, or only as a domestic insurrection, to be suppressed by criminal prosecutions before the courts of the country?"

The honorable gentleman answers in the affirmative, and repudiates the idea that they are traitors, criminally responsible to our municipal laws for acts done during the war. He endeavors, by citing a line from Judge Grier in the prize cases, to prove it a public war. And subsequently he inquires, "What, then, is the effect of this public war between these belligerents, these foreign nations?" He answers, in substance, that it abrogated all constitutional relations between the parent Government and the "organized States" in revolt, and put them out of the Union, with "the right of conquest on their part as against us and the right of conquest on our part as against them. If conquered, all the people, loyal and disloyal, with their property, real and personal, are subject, not to the Constitution, but the laws of nations and of war."

"From all this the legitimate conclusion is, that all the people and all the territory within the limits of the organized States which, by a legitimate majority of their citizens, renounced the Constitution, took their States out of the Union, and made war upon the Government, are, so far as they are concerned, subject to the laws of the State; and, so far as the United States Government is concerned, subject to the laws of war and of nations, both while the war continues and when it shall be ended."

"By the laws of war the conqueror may seize and convert to his own use everything that belongs to the enemy. This may be done while the war is raging to weaken the enemy, and when it is ended the things seized may be retained to pay the expenses of the war and the damages caused by it. Towns, cities, and provinces may be held as a punishment for an unjust war, and as security against future aggressions. The property thus taken is not confiscated under the Constitution after conviction for treason, but is held by virtue of the laws of war. No individual crime need be proved against the owners. The fact of being a belligerent enemy carries the forfeiture with it. Here was the error of the President when he vetoed the confiscation bill passed by Congress. In the confusion of business he overlooked the distinction between a traitor and a belligerent enemy."

After claiming these extensive and extraordinary rights and powers, derivable from the laws of war and from the laws of nations, he proceeds to declare that he would execute them. "Towns, cities, provinces;" "every inch of soil of the guilty portion of this usurping power," he would confiscate, sell, and put into the Treasury. He would emancipate, of course; but that is done already; he would therefore only amend the Constitution and forever forbid slaveholding (of negroes) in America.

Finally, he winds up with this saying:

"The Union as it was and the Constitution as it is is an atrocious idea. It is man-stealing."

To some of these positions I give my assent. From others I dissent. The conclusion to which he comes I protest against and abhor. We are belligerents and have belligerent rights. Everybody inside the hostile territory is an enemy of the United States, be he friend or foe, in the prize-court sense of the term, but not in the common-law sense of the term. Their property on the high seas we may justly capture, condemn, and appropriate. All that are in line of battle or in any hostile position toward us, we may smite down with physical force, friend or foe; our bullets may not choose between them; the best and most loving heart that ever throbbed in the bosom of man may thus be pierced by our bullets, and we stand guiltless before God and man. They are necessarily public enemies, whether willingly so or not in individual cases; that is their predicament, and I accept the consequences that legitimately follow from it.

I admit that we must go to the laws of nations and not to the Constitution of the United States to interpret what war means, and for the rules to be observed in conducting it.

Our Constitution gives to us—to Congress and not to the President—the right to make war, but it does not define what war is. The laws of nations define that.

WAR IS THE REMEDY AND NOT THE RIGHT. It is said to be the prosecution of a national right by force (2 Black, page 666.) Some right has been obstructed, denied, or attacked by a hostile belligerent power, and we prosecute it, defend it, vindicate it, by war. The laws of nations define what public war means—a war between foreign nations; and what civil war means—a war carried on within the State, like the present contest.

And I submit that the honorable gentleman has fallen into an error in characterizing this as a "public war," or in supposing that Judge Grier meant to characterize it as a public war. I find in the very sentence from which the gentleman takes his quotation, the distinction clearly laid down between public and civil war. Public war is declared to be between independent and foreign nations, and civil war a struggle carried on within the State in which one party may have both sovereign and belligerent rights.

Our sovereign rights, it is true, are for the time obstructed, until by the exercise of our belligerent rights we have restored them. But, sir, whether this contest be a war carried on within the State or between "foreign nations," we must look to the laws of nations, to the laws of war, to interpret the manner in which the contest must be conducted.

But I am astonished how any gentleman can refer us to the laws of nations in support of this act which the bill now before us proposes to amend, in the support of the amendment or in support of the position taken by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] and those who agree with him.

Why, sir, the usages of nations in modern times forbid the very means which the gentleman would employ and the whole policy which he advocates. The laws of nations recognize the right of conquest between the parties to a public war, but do not authorize the seizure and confiscation of private property on land only in excepted cases; they do not authorize the conquest of individual property. On the contrary, they forbid it.

I am not going into a lengthy citation of authorities. They have been quoted freely in the discussions upon this bill. They were cited fully and pertinently the other day by the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINCK,] and I content myself now, in the main, with a mere reference to them. I rely upon all writers upon the public law who state the rule among civilized nations in modern times. Their testimony is uniform and explicit, uttering a united voice of condemnation upon the policy which the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] demands. I rely upon the principles declared by all the civilized nations of the world in modern times, French, British, and American, in State papers, treaties, and diplomatic assemblies, to support the declaration of the elementary writers, that by the usages of the civilized nations of modern times, private property upon land is exempt from the spoils of war, exempt from seizure and confiscation, except in certain specified cases. Wheaton states the rule in clear and precise terms:

"But by the modern usages of nations, which has now acquired the force of law, temples of religion, public edifices devoted to civil purposes only, monuments of art, and repositories of science are exempted from the general operations of war. Private property on land is also exempt from confiscation, with the exception of such as may become booty in special cases, when taken from enemies in the field or in besieged towns, and of military contributions levied upon the inhabitants of the hostile territory. This exemption extends even to the case of an absolute and unqualified conquest of the enemy's country."—Elements, &c., p. 421.

This doctrine is supported by all writers who state the usages of modern nations. I forbear to quote them again to the House. But I call attention to the language of Chief Justice Marshall in United States vs. Percheman, 7 Peters, 86:

"It is very unusual, even in cases of conquest, for the conqueror to do more than to displace the sovereign and assume dominion over the country. The modern usage of nations, which has become law, would be violated; that sense of justice and of right which is acknowledged and felt by the whole civilized world would be outraged, if private property should be generally confiscated, and private rights annulled. The people change their allegiance; their relation to their ancient sovereign is dissolved; but their relations to each other and their rights of property remain undisturbed."

the simplest, plainest, and best until our attention was called to the fact that it had been agreed in the Senate that the enrollment should be continuous; that the very day that a young man in a district arrives at the age of twenty his name shall be put on the list of the enrollment board.

Whenever an alien becomes a citizen his name is to be put upon the list and into the wheel. Thus the roll is to be added to every day. Now suppose the proposed amendment prevails and a man is drafted to-day and pays his commutation money; the provost marshal must commence an account with him to-day to ascertain when all the names now on the roll and in the wheel are drawn out before his name can be again entered. Another man is drafted to-morrow and the provost marshal must commence an account with him for the same purpose. And so he must do with every man who is drafted and pays his commutation money. If this measure prevails it will require more clerks than are in any Department in Washington to keep the accounts and conduct the business of the draft. And it is in this view of the matter, as a question of practical importance, that I urge the impossibility of carrying out, with any degree of fairness and justness, the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Now, the bill as reported from the committee does not, I repeat, allow a man to be drafted a second time until another quota is called for, and they are limited to one year as the time for which the $300 shall be available as an exemption. That may not be a perfect arrangement, and it may not be the best; but to the other there is a practical objection which cannot be got over. Gentlemen may think it a very easy thing to keep these accounts; but those men who have been keeping them for the last year tell us that it is impossible to keep these accounts under the proposed amendment with any degree of accuracy, and without the greatest entanglement and labor. I therefore appeal to the committee whether they will ingraft a provision on this bill which will put the whole matter in a state of interminable entanglement?

The question recurring on the amendment offered by Mr. STEVENS to the amendment, Mr. FARNSWORTH demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, and Mr. STEELE, of New Jersey, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 79, noes 49.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I do it in order to reply to what I conceive to be an erroneous statement made by my friend on the Military Committee, [Mr. GARFIELD.] I am not willing that his statements shall go to the country if I can correct them in a five minutes' speech.

The gentleman has presented to the committee the fearful issue, that under the operation of the enrollment bill, as it has just received the sanction of the committee, the entire available military force of the country will be exhausted without adding anything to the Army. Now under the enrollment act as it stands by the vote just given no man is exempt except for physical disability. Every man has got to serve, or offer a substitute, or pay the commutation. Under the late draft, the Provost Marshal General says—and he said so to me in the presence of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD]—that every commutation produced its man. Suppose you run entirely through the enrolled forces of the United States, amounting to several millions, excepting those exempted by physical disability who are not fit for soldiers, and you hold every man. Well, if they all pay commutation, all I have got to say is you have a full Treasury and you can fill up your Army at $5,000 apiece bounty. You get the drafted men, or the substitutes, or you get money by the hundreds of millions of dollars. That is the effect of the bill as it stands now, my friend from the Military Committee notwithstanding.

I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. My recollection is entirely at variance with that of my friend from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.]

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move to amend the amendment by adding the following:

No one shall be entitled to pay commutation money except ministers actually in charge of some religious congregation; men having a wife or child dependent on them for support, and not having an income of $1,200 independent of their industry; members of the religious Society of Friends, or other religious denominations conscientiously opposed to bearing arms. Any drafted man on whom a parent, wife, child, sister, or brother may depend for support, shall be allowed for each dependent ten dollars a month, not exceeding $300 in all, payable directly to such dependent or the guardian or person charged with the care of such dependent, and not subject to the control of the drafted man.

I suppose that those of us who desire to raise armies ought to be held responsible for doing that which will assuredly accomplish our purpose. The enemy now presses our forces in the field at every point within rifle-shot. Any sudden freeze may bring them directly into collision with our depleted Army. In any event, early in March the armies will come into collision. It is therefore important, unless the United States mean to abandon the contest, or unless they mean to be beaten directly at the outset of the campaign, that they should restore their armies to an adequate strength to meet and overwhelm the enemy.

A balanced campaign is a lost campaign; a balanced fight is for the United States a lost day, wasted blood, wasted honor, wasted time, wasted treasure. How are we to have armies? We are exhausting the resources of the country in stupendous bounties, paying men to discharge the duty that they owe to the country. I am opposed to it always and at all times. The Republic has a right to have the services of every man competent to bear a musket. The way, the democratic way, the republican way, the wise and efficient way to raise an army is to make every man within the military ages liable to military duty; and if there is to be any alleviation it should be only by allowing substitutes to be furnished by parties, and for the furnishing of a substitute the drafted man ought to be held responsible.

I therefore propose that there shall be no exemption by commutation money excepting in the narrowly limited classes that the amendment which I propose defines. There is no reason for that most odious, most undemocratic, most indefensible, most irrational discrimination between the poor who have no money to buy themselves off from military service, who leave their families dependent on the charity of their country, when they go out to fight, and the man who, merely because he is rich, chooses to say, "I can fling my $300 commutation in your face and exempt myself from the responsibility of service." There has never been an argument that can defend the gross and crying iniquity of it. Any Government that undertakes to defend it stands condemned before the civilized world, and above all condemned before a free and democratic Republic.

But let the ministers of the gospel remain to discharge their holy calling, and pay their commutation money. Let men who have persons dependent upon them and upon their industry for support pay their commutation money and remain at home to discharge those duties if they prefer. Let those whose religious scruples prevent them from bearing arms pay their money and remain at home. And then you will have only touched the outer rim of the great mass of the body of the people responsible to the Republic for military service. And when you have drawn them all, then take the charities of life under the protection of the law, and make allowances directly to the individuals who, when they leave their homes, leave persons whom they are bound to support and whom they commit to the charity of the Government when they go to render their highest duty to the Republic. Pay them reasonable sums; relieve them from the poor-house; relieve them from the variable charity of a cold or a liberal world, as the case may be; put it upon the same foundation that you put their pay, and then you will have an Army, and you will violate none of the charities of life.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I do not agree to the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS.] I will say, however, that if the House determines to adopt the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and which has been adopted by the committee, I will vote against any and all commutation. But, sir, in that case I would make it universal, and except from it no class or profession whatever. I do not see the propriety of exempting any class of men because of their profession. I do not think that the holy preaching of ministers is so requisite in time of war as the labors of the farmers and producers to maintain the Army.

I think it was in Pennsylvania, at the time of the adoption of the constitution of that Commonwealth, that some gentleman rose in the convention and moved that, as ministers of the gospel were set apart for the cure of souls, they should not be entitled to the elective franchise; whereupon another gentleman moved in amendment that whereas shoemakers were also set apart for the cure of soles, they should also be exempted. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, I said that I would vote for the abrogation of the commutation clause entirely, provided the amendment proposed, and which has been adopted by the committee, should be adopted by the House.

Sir, as I said the other day, the Government wants men, wants them by enlistment if it can obtain them in that way; but if not, it wants men and must have them. Strike out the commutation clause from the bill and you get no men whatever by enlistment. Then all recruiting your Army by means of enlistment ceases. But by retaining the clause, with the restriction proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs, making it the duty of the board of enrollment to return to the roll the name of the man who commutes, you have both things going on together. There is enlisting going on. Some men are drafted. Some men pay the commutation money. This keeps down the price of substitutes within the reach of men of moderate means. The Government is enabled to offer reasonably large bounties, such as are being now paid—from three to four hundred dollars—and the Army is replenished. But if this House shall adopt the amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union exempting for three years the man who pays $300, the military power of the Government will be exhausted long before the three years expire—if the war shall last so long—and you may have a pléthoric Treasury but no men for your Army.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of either the one thing or the other. If we retain the commutation clause we should retain it with a restriction which enables the Government to obtain men by the offering of reasonable bounties; or else let us strike out the commutation clause altogether, and depend solely and entirely on the draft, as you must do in that case. For my own part, I am in favor of filling the armies, as far as possible, by voluntary enlistment. My experience teaches me that the volunteer is the best soldier; that a regiment of volunteers is worth two or three regiments of drafted men. Even if you do sandwich the drafted man between two veterans you do not make him as good a soldier as the veteran himself.

I hope the committee will reconsider its former action in regard to the exemption for three years of a man who pays his commutation money, and that it will adopt the bill as reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KASSON. For the purpose of giving the committee an opportunity to see the amendment in print, and to consider it with more reflection before voting on it, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAWES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration as a special order the bill (S. No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and had come to no resolution thereon.

DR. WILLIAM TREVITT.

Mr. SPALDING asked and obtained leave to have withdrawn from the files of the House the papers in the case of Dr. William Trevitt.

CAPTAIN STICKNEY.

Mr. FARNSWORTH asked and obtained leave to have withdrawn from the files of the House the papers in the case of Captain Stickney.

PROPOSITION OF ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. STILES offered a resolution that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is hardly in order to decide to-day what the House is to do to-morrow.

ASSAY OFFICE IN ST. LOUIS.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to establish an assay office in the city of St. Louis, State of Missouri; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

UNION GAS-LIGHT COMPANY.

Mr. ASHLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to incorporate the Union Gas-Light Company of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

THE STEAM TRANSPORT UNION.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution to provide for the payment of the officers and crew of the United States steam transport Union, wrecked November 3, 1861, off the coast of North Carolina; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

CONFISCATION ACT.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced a resolution, which was read, considered, and agreed to, instructing the Judiciary Committee to inquire into the propriety and expediency of amending the confiscation act passed July 17, 1862, so as to require the court making any order or decree under it for the sale of estates containing more than five hundred acres, to cause the same to be divided and offered for sale in lots of not more than one hundred and sixty acres.

JACOB WEAVER.

Mr. NOBLE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Jacob Weaver; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. ELIOT. I rise to a personal explanation. During the morning hour, or before the commencement of the morning hour, a resolution was proposed by the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. KELLOGG] who sits near me. To that resolution an amendment was proposed by the honorable gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] I heard the amendment, and supposed it to have been an original resolution, and so supposing, I rose in my place and objected to it. The point was made that I did not rise in season, the resolution being already before the House, and the Speaker so adjudged. I insisted that my objection was in season, supposing that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana was an original resolution; and on my statement the resolution of the gentleman from New York was not received. I desire now to say that my objection was not intended at all to have been made to the resolution of the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he was confident the facts were as now stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts; but when he stated positively that he had risen in time, and his statement was confirmed by other gentlemen sitting near him, the Chair, deferring to the testimony of gentlemen on the floor, supposed he might possibly have been mistaken, and therefore entertained the objection.

Mr. ELIOT. What I objected to was the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, then, the resolution will now be presented.

Mr. KELLOGG, of New York. It is merely a resolution for reference.

The SPEAKER. Understanding that the resolution is in the hands of the reporters, the Chair, if no objection be made, will consider it as pending in the morning.

No objection was made.

TONNAGE ON VESSELS.

Mr. MARCY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be requested to inquire into the expediency of amending section fifteen, chapter one hundred and fifty-three, of an act increasing temporarily the duties on imports, and for other purposes, passed July 14, 1862. Registered ships from ports subject to paying ten cents per ton, as now required by law, said registered ships after paying ten cents per ton shall have the privilege extended to them of proceeding to any other port in the United States, if on the following voyage, free of foreign tonnage money as now required by law the second time.

NATIONAL FOUNDRY.

Mr. STROUSE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to establish a national foundry in the coal and iron region of Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

LOUISIANA LAND TITLES.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill authorizing the issue of patents for locations made and certificates granted under the authority of an act of Congress, approved March 17, 1862, allowing floats in satisfaction of lands sold by the United States Government within the Las Omegas and La Nana grants; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

H. A. KLOPFER.

Mr. BROWN, of West Virginia, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of H. A. Klopfer, for reference to the Court of Claims.

MISSISSIPPI AND MICHIGAN CANAL.

Mr. ARNOLD. I ask the consent of the House to report from the Committee on Public Lands a bill to construct a ship canal for the passage of armed naval vessels from the Mississippi river to Lake Michigan, and for other purposes, for the purpose of having it printed and recommitted.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman will allow the bill to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union I will not object.

Mr. ARNOLD. The object is simply to have the bill printed and recommitted to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to that.

RAILROAD TO PUGET SOUND.

Mr. COLE, of Washington, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the committee on the Pacific railroad be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the projected railroad from Sacramento to Portland, Oregon, to Puget Sound, Washington Territory.

SHIP CANAL.

Mr. HOLMAN. I objected to the reporting of a bill in reference to a ship canal unless it was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] proposes to report it, I understand, to have it printed and then recommitted. For that purpose I do not object. I only want the subject open to discussion when it comes before the House. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. ARNOLD, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported a bill to construct a ship canal for the passage of armed naval vessels from the Mississippi river to Lake Michigan; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the same committee.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OVERLAND MAILS.

Mr. COLE, of California, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so modifying the law in relation to carrying the mails as to authorize the Postmaster General, at any time, upon notice, to modify any contract for carrying the overland mails to the Pacific by shortening the schedule time on said route or altering the same; and also as to the expediency of such alterations, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

LEWIS BOLLMAN AND OTHERS.

Mr. HARRINGTON introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be referred to the Committee of Claims to consider, and report by bill or otherwise, on the claim of Lewis Bollman and others, for contributions to the agricultural volume of 1861, which contributions, it is alleged, are unpaid; and also that the papers accompanying said claim be referred to said committee.

And then, on motion of Mr. MORRILL, (at twenty minutes past four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 4, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BROWN presented a memorial of citizens of St. Louis, Missouri, remonstrating against additional taxes on rectified spirits and on spirits on hand, and praying that a tax may be imposed on the raw material in the hands of distillers; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the memorial of the National Land-Transfer Association of the State of Missouri, praying that aid may be given to them to promote the emigration of skilled and other laborers to that State; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONNESS presented a petition of citizens of California, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Los Angeles, California, to La Paz, in the Territory of Arizona; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of A. J. Conter, treasurer of the Overland Mail Company, praying that their present contract for carrying the mail may be extended for the term of five years from the time of its expiration, subject to such modifications as may be deemed necessary; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 45) to set apart a portion of the State of Texas for the use of persons of African descent, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of George Henry Preble, commander in the United States Navy, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 95) for the relief of George Henry Preble, a commander in the Navy of the United States. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 39) for the relief of William Porter and William Lurkins, reported it with an amendment.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, it was Ordered, That Michael Nash have leave to withdraw his petition and other papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. COWAN, it was Ordered, That the papers in relation to the claim of John Hastings be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HALE. I desire to ask leave of the Senate to withdraw from the files the papers relating to the claim of Captain John H. Aulick. I will state the circumstances. There has been an adverse report in the case, but there are among the papers some private letters from some distinguished friends who are now deceased that Captain Aulick is very desirous of keeping for his own use and the use of his family, and he asks as a favor that the Senate will allow him to withdraw them from the files.

Mr. GRIMES. Withdraw merely the letters?

Mr. HALE. Only the letters.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That order will be made, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed, on the 3d instant, a joint resolution (S. No. 18) in relation to the public printing.

COMMITTEE ON MANUFACTURES.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be added to the 34th rule of the Senate, providing for the appointment of the standing committees, the following, namely: A Committee on Manufactures, to consist of five members.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This resolution will lie over one day, under the rule.

Mr. ANTHONY. If there is no objection, I will ask its present consideration.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 31.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider this resolution at the present time.

Mr. WILSON. Let it lie over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, it will lie over under the rule.

TREATY WITH SANDWICH ISLANDS.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to communicate to the Senate any recent correspondence at the Department of State relating to a proposed reciprocity treaty between the United States and the Sandwich Islands.

SALE OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. HOWE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell, at public auction, all books and documents in his custody and control, as reported to the Senate on the 25th ultimo; and to report by bill or otherwise.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, there are two vacancies upon the Committee on Private Land Claims, one created by the resignation of Mr. Bayard, and the other by the declension of service of Mr. McDougall. I move that the Vice President appoint Senators to fill those vacancies.

The motion was agreed to, there being no objection.

Subsequently the Vice President announced the appointment of Mr. RIDDLE and Mr. HARDING on the Committee on Private Land Claims, and Mr. JOHNSON on the Committee on the Judiciary in the place of Mr. Bayard.

PAY OF COLORED TROOPS.

Mr. WILSON. If there is no further morning business, I move now to take up the joint resolution to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. No. 23) to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As these soldiers enlisted to serve for a given sum, I wish simply to inquire what propriety there is in our going back and paying them this increase for services already rendered. So far as putting these men on the same footing with other soldiers is concerned, I have always been in favor of it, and shall favor it now; but I think we ought to be a little careful in our expenditures. We must not consider that the Treasury can meet everything. If there is any particular reason for going back and paying them this increase for the time they have been in the service I should like to hear it.

Mr. WILSON. I think as an act of justice that this bill should be retrospective; in fact I have no doubt about it. Many of these men were assured when they entered the service they would receive the same compensation as other soldiers. The first colored regiment in the country was raised in South Carolina under an express order that they should have the same pay as other troops, and the first pay they received was the same pay; but since that time it has been changed.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to inquire how it has been changed; whether by act of Congress or by order of the Department?

Mr. WILSON. By order of the Department, in the case of the first South Carolina regiment.

Mr. GRIMES. Oh, no; by act of Congress.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Congress fixed the pay at ten dollars per month.

Mr. WILSON. The change in the case of the South Carolina regiment to which I have referred was made by order of the Department.

The Secretary of War authorized the Governor of Massachusetts to raise regiments of colored troops. The Governor understood and made the pledge that they were to receive the same pay and stand on the same footing with other troops. He might have erred in his construction, but some of the best lawyers in the country contend that when you put a colored soldier in the Army of the United States he is entitled to the same compensation as a white soldier. They think the distinction in the act of 1862 applies to men working for the Government, not soldiers.

Now, sir, the gross injustice that has been done by the country toward these men I think ought to be corrected. I have letters on this subject from several colonels in the field, Colonel Halliwell, of the Massachusetts fifty-fourth; Colonel Hartwell, of the Massachusetts fifty-fifth; and Colonel Tilghman, of one of the United States colored regiments. Colonel Tilghman says that some of the men in his regiment enlisted with the expectation and understanding that they were to have the same compensation as other troops. The raising of the Massachusetts fifty-fourth was commenced on the 10th day of last February, and it went into the service on the 28th day of May. They have never received a dollar, and will not receive a dollar, because they were promised the same compensation as other troops, and they demand it as a right. The Legislature of the State has authorized them to be paid by the State, and they have declined to take pay from the State. They say they were promised to be put on the same footing with other troops; that they were enlisted under the act of 1861, and they do not choose to take it from the State. I have a letter from Colonel Littlefield, and I will read it for the information of the Senate:

SIR: I have the honor to transmit the following facts and suggestions in relation to the colored troops that have been engaged in the operations against the defenses of Charleston harbor during the past summer, agreeable to your request. The facts here stated are such as came under my own observation, or have been reported officially by the colonels who have been in command of them, and the suggestions are the result of nearly one year's experience as an officer among them.

The colored troops have been severely tested:

1. As fatigue men performing hazardous duties under the concentrated fire of the enemy's batteries.

2. As soldiers in action before the enemy and performing the general duties of the camp and garrison.

1. When the operations began before Charleston harbor, and when it was determined to approach Fort Wagner by a regular siege after the repulse of July 18, and to demolish Fort Sumter over the heads of the garrison of Forts Wagner and Gregg, directions were given by the major general commanding to carefully record from time to time, as they were developed, such facts and statistics as would enable us to realize the maximum amount of practical and experimental knowledge to be derived from the novel operations about to be inaugurated.

To the officers charged with working the colored troops the following questions were asked when the work began, to be answered when the work was completed:

1. Courage as indicated by their behavior under fire.

2. Skill and appreciation of their duties, referring to the quality of the work performed.

3. Industry and perseverance, with reference to the quantity of work performed.

4. If a certain work were to be accomplished in the least possible time, i. e., when enthusiasm and direct personal interest is necessary to attain the end, would whites or blacks answer best?

5. What is the difference, considering the above points, between colored troops recruited from free States and those from slave States?

To these questions six replies were received, as follows:

1. That the blacks were more timorous than the whites, but they were more obedient, hence more completely under the control of their commander and influenced by his example.

2. The statements do unanimously agree that the black will do a greater amount of work than the white soldier, because he labors more constantly. In this trial the men were without their arms or accoutrements, and worked continually for about four months with little or no rest; such were the exigencies of the service. About three fourths of this work was executed during the night time, and at least nine tenths of it under fire of artillery or sharpshooters or both. The amount of this work performed by the black as compared with the white infantry was as fifty-six to forty one. The white soldiers having had more experience, they were used for grand guard in the trenches. There was a great scarcity of officers with the colored troops, which rendered it necessary to send large details under one officer, frequently two hundred men with but a lieutenant to command them; he had to march through the camps to the place of operation, giving them good chance to shirk, a crime not frequent among them provided they were under officers whom they respected. Thus it will be seen that much depends upon their obedience to the will of their commanders.

3. The siege has been conducted through the hottest and most sickly part of the season, commencing in July and terminating in November. During this period the average amount of sickness was, with the black infantry, thirteen and nine tenths per cent., while with the white infantry it was twenty and one tenth per cent. I have found little or no difference as to sickness between the blacks recruited in the North and those recruited in the South. The command was a mixed one, composed of the fifty-fourth and fifty-fifth Massachusetts colored volunteers, the third United States colored volunteers, and the soldiers recruited from the freed slaves of North and South Carolina and Florida. My experience with both classes will not warrant the conclusion that those from the North are superior to those from the South. The efficiency of each depends upon the officers placed over them.

4. These men as soldiers have been as severely tried as they were for fatigue men. On the 6th of July the enemy made a vigorous attack upon that portion of our line held by the fifty-fourth Massachusetts and the second South Carolina volunteers, under command of Colonel Montgomery. These men received and repelled the attack with as much coolness and bravery as veteran troops. They entered into the engagement with enthusiasm rarely equaled and never excelled.

5. On the 18th of July the assaulting column on Fort Wagner was led by the fifty-fourth Massachusetts, and their decimated ranks, and the number of the dead picked up in the ditch, on the parapet, and in the fort, speak plainer than words of their bravery in that sanguinary conflict.

6. In the camp they perform their duties with alacrity and good faith. They are readily brought to the highest state of military discipline, and no white soldier can excel them in drill or proficiency. They ask no questions, but seem to obey so as to reflect the will of their commander.

The experiment whether the American negro would make a soldier has received a practical and satisfactory solution; the problem has been solved under circumstances not at all advantageous to the colored man. They have been made constantly to feel that they were regarded by the country as far inferior to other soldiers by not receiving the same benefits for the same duties performed. I have a few facts to submit showing the great injustice of the present law regulating their pay. The fifty-fourth Massachusetts volunteers entered the field on the 28th day of May last with full ranks. This regiment has lost, killed in battle or died of disease, fifty-nine, and every one of these men died actually in debt to the Government, having received no pay and their families receiving no pension or bounty. There have been wounded in this regiment one hundred and fifty-five; a great proportion have been discharged with no pay; every man who fell in the engagement on James Island, July 6, and the assault on Fort Wagner, July 18, were in debt to the Government for their clothing; they died having received no pay.

The first North Carolina enlisted also on the understanding that they were to have the same pay as white soldiers. They have been seven months in the service, and the average amount charged to each man for clothing is fifty-one dollars, leaving nineteen dollars due to each for the whole term of his enlistment—less than three dollars a month; and there are due and unpaid to the regiment about thirty thousand dollars for work done in the quartermaster's department in North Carolina before they enlisted.

The third United States colored volunteers has lost nine men killed in battle, each one of whom is charged with thirty dollars' worth of clothing and credited with half that amount as pay. Each dies in debt to the Government, leaving no bounty or pension, or provision of any kind for his family. Of the eighteen men who died from disease, the same is true; and the clothing issued to those living has absorbed more than four fifths of their pay.

The fifty-fifth Massachusetts has been in service since June, 1863. The average amount of clothing charged to each man is fifty-three dollars, and there remained due to each for seven months' service seventeen dollars. And in every regiment of colored troops now in the United States service, whether raised North or South, substantially the same state of facts exists. The officers who have been in charge of the colored troops have promised that the Government would pay them the same as other troops, and these promises were made under the sanction of the Government. And if some action be not immediately taken to increase their pay, great difficulty will be created among the colored troops first organized.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

M. S. LITTLEFIELD,

Colonel Commanding Colored Troops, Fortly Island.

Hon. HENRY WILSON,

Chairman of the Military Committee, United States Senate.

Colonel Littlefield in this letter states the case of these colored regiments clearly, and all must admit their condition to be hard indeed. He is for giving colored soldiers the same pay and making the act retrospective. General Gillmore recommends the same action, and I trust the Senate will do justice to brave men who are doing their duty to the country. We can right the errors of the past, and I hope we shall do it promptly.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Mr. President, I did not hear an additional reason suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts for this legislation which has been called to my attention. I know it is not a ruling reason, and ought not of itself to control the action of this body; but perhaps, taken in connection with the facts stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, it may afford an additional reason why this increase of pay should be retroactive. I understand that so far as regards the first South Carolina colored regiment, they were expressly enlisted under an order of the War Department which contained a promise that they were to be paid the regular pay of white troops, or a pay similar to that which was allowed to white troops volunteering or enlisting in the Army; and some of them have been so paid. Perhaps other regiments are in the same condition; but that regiment was so paid for a certain time; and after that payment went on for some period of time other orders came from the War Department counteracting the payment; and wherever there has been a payment made by any officer in the paymaster's department under these circumstances a difficulty arises in relation to the settlement of his accounts, and unless special legislation is granted in that behalf, I suppose there is not one of them who will not be ruined. That is not a controlling reason, as I said before, but it is a reason proper to be considered in our action upon this joint resolution.

I am also aware from different sources that the withholding of this pay that was promised by the Government at the time of the enlistment of these troops has occasioned great dissatisfaction not only in the minds of these troops themselves but of all their friends at home—colored men at home who helped to raise the regiments, who were engaged in recruiting them; and I know that many of them have expressed so much dissatisfaction as to declare that unless justice is done them in this particular they will have done with furnishing any further aid and assistance in the persons of their sons and their relatives to go into the Army for the purpose of rendering this service down along the southern coast.

I have not been specially interested in matters of this kind, but I can clearly see that this is a matter of justice so far as regards certain portions of the colored troops now engaged in the Army of the United States; and if such promises have been held out to them by the Department of War, perhaps it would be no more amiss in us to recognize and correct that difficulty, which has grown out of the transaction, than it has been for us in times past to recognize and correct other difficulties that have grown out of orders, perhaps given by the President of the United States himself, and by the heads of several of the Departments, where there was no special law in existence at the time authorizing their action, but which appeared to Congress to be reasonable, and proper to be recognized and ratified.

I suggest these reasons as being sufficient in my mind, in addition to those that have fallen from the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, backed up by the various letters of recommendation to which he has referred, to give my vote in favor of this joint resolution as it has been reported.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Mr. President, the first Kansas colored regiment, being the first regiment of colored troops that was raised in the United States, were raised in July and August, 1862. For the first six months of their service they have not been paid at all. The Government from some cause or other did not think it had the authority to pay them. During that time they lost a great many men in battle and by sickness. I do hope this joint resolution will be made retrospective in its operation so as at least to cover that want of payment. In raising that regiment I said, I thought I was authorized to say, that they would be put upon the same footing as other soldiers in point of pay. They rendered from four to six months' hard service, the pay for which is due to them, they not having yet received it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I simply wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this is a proposition not only to raise the pay of certain soldiers, but also to go back to the period of their enlistment, and pay them from that time the amount received by others. Mr. President, at the time the amount of ten dollars a month was fixed as the sum to be paid to colored troops, I was in favor, and so expressed myself, of putting them on a level with white soldiers. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs at that time was of a different opinion. He thought that ten dollars a month was enough, and that sum was fixed.

Now, sir, what is the ground upon which we have gone? Massachusetts has gone on under the law, which was introduced and recommended and sustained by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and enlisted two regiments of colored troops; and the Senator avers that the Governor of that State undertook to promise them that they should receive the same pay as white troops, and that the Legislature of Massachusetts has provided for the difference. I do not know but that it would be fair to make that up. On that point I am not expressing an opinion, but I wish to correct some mistakes that have been made.

The first South Carolina colored regiment was raised by General Hunter without any authority from the War Department or anybody else. He did not have the authority of the War Department; he did not pretend that he had the authority of the Department; but still he wanted to do it; and I have no doubt that if at that time he had had from the Executive authority to go on as he wished to do, he would have raised a large number of men; but he did not receive that authority. He raised the men; they were drilled and disciplined for a considerable time; but as they were not recognized by the Department or by the Government, directly or indirectly, he disbanded them. They were afterwards reorganized, and, I suppose, received their pay. There was no pledge on the part of the Government to pay them the same as other troops. The Government did not recognize them at all for a considerable time, as I am informed, and I think there is no doubt about it.

Now, sir, if the Senator will show me that the Department authorized a larger offer, an offer of more money than the law provided for—we provided by law what they should be paid ten dollars a month, on the recommendation of the Committee on Military Affairs—if the Senator will produce the orders from the War Department showing that such an authority was given, it might place the matter in a different position with regard to these troops; but allow me to suggest that it is a very loose way of legislating to come in here and merely make a statement that the Department authorized it because officers undertook to tell these colored men that they would receive it from some authority or other; for experience has shown that officers enlisting men sometimes make very strong statements which are not authorized by any orders of the Department. I should like to know whether there were any such orders given, whether the Department of War did undertake in the face of the law to say that they would pay more than the law prescribed. I undertake to say that no such order can be shown, there is none such in existence. The whole thing is mere supposition, because officers undertook to make these loose promises to soldiers when they were enlisting them.

I do not believe, and I shall not believe until somebody brings in the order here, that any such order was ever issued by the War Department. We can easily ascertain the fact by applying to the Department. In that way we may readily ascertain whether the Department directly or indirectly authorized the offer to be made, after the passage of that law, of more than ten dollars a month, which the law authorized to the colored soldiers. I do not believe it for a single instant. The Senator does not produce the order that was sent to Massachusetts, or the instructions to the Governor, or the permission given to the Governor. He says that Governor Andrew undertook to do it. Whatever he undertook to do he undoubtedly undertook to do with the highest honesty and integrity and good faith, for there is no man of whom I have a higher opinion than Governor Andrew in relation to this or any other matter. But I believe that it was an entire misapprehension on his part, and that no order whatever will be found from the War Department justifying any such departure from the law. At any rate, before we act upon that supposition, we ought to inquire and see whether the fact was so. If the Senate are to vote upon that supposition, I beg them to wait until they find out the fact; but if on the contrary the Senate are disposed to say that, notwithstanding whether there were orders or not, law or not, colored troops should be placed upon the same level from the beginning with other troops, I of course shall not object to it. I only say this, that I think it is dealing very curiously with the Treasury, when we have entered into a contract to pay a certain number of troops a certain sum of money, and they have enlisted with a knowledge that that was the amount they were to receive, for us to go back and pay them more. If they have been abused and have not received enough, it may be a very good reason for it; but I should like to have the matter definitely and distinctly understood.

I repeat what I said originally, that we ought to have placed the colored troops precisely on the same footing with other troops from the beginning. I thought so for various reasons. I gave my opinion then that if we paid them a less sum of money we should, in a degree, give an excuse to the confederates for saying, as they did say, that they were not soldiers to be regarded in the same light that other soldiers were, and I wished to take away from them even the shadow of an excuse for placing them on any other footing than white soldiers. In fact the whole thing ought to stand on this level: that all soldiers, without the slightest allusion to color in any way whatever, that all soldiers of the United States belonging to the same arm of the service should receive the same pay. No distinction should be made. These soldiers are men. They render the same service as others, and perhaps as good service. Whether as a whole class they render as good service or not I do not know, but certainly a great many of them are much better than a great many of the white soldiers, if one may judge from the experience of the country.

Now, sir, having explained my view on this subject and called attention to this departure from principle in our undertaking to deal with the Treasury in this matter as it is my duty to do, that is to say, to the fact that we are called upon to pay what the Treasury does not owe, if Senators choose to say that it is right and that we ought to do it in this particular case, I acknowledge that there are very good reasons for doing it, but I want them to understand precisely what it amounts to.

Mr. CONNESS. By way of getting a vote on this proposition distinctly, I move to amend the resolution in the ninth and tenth lines by striking out the words "during the whole time in which they shall be or shall have been in such service," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "from and after the passage of this act."

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. In January the Government of the United States accepted the first regiment of Kansas colored troops organized in July and August, who had been in the service of the United States and fighting its battles from August to January. That regiment has not yet been paid for that period. The families of the men who fell have not the advantage of the pension laws. The adoption of the amendment of the Senator from California, it seems to me, will do an act of injustice that this Government cannot afford to indulge in. With the same organization in January they accepted a regiment that had been in the service from the August previous, having lost a great many men in battle and by disease. I think the Senator from California should not attempt to perpetrate such an outrage upon that gallant regiment.

Mr. CONNESS. It is not my purpose to perpetrate any outrage upon the troops from Kansas or any other portion of the Army of the United States; and I think it may be safely said that my sympathies go as strongly as those of the Senator from Kansas with the soldiers, black and white, who are in the field and fighting the battles of the country. The amendment proposed simply meets the suggestions so clearly presented by the Senator from Maine. I agree with him that we should not go back and make this act retroactive; but we should recognize no difference hereafter in the compensation to be paid to soldiers; and that from and after the passage of this act all soldiers should be paid alike. In my opinion neither the condition of the Treasury nor the public credit can afford these "acts of justice," as they are termed. I do not think it is wise. Congress has legislated on this subject heretofore, and the law-making authority did not see fit at that time to raise the compensation of black soldiers to that of the white soldiers. I should like to know what demand there is at the present time that we should go behind that legislation simply because there are a few regiments who enlisted at an early period and have fought bravely and are entitled to all credit. I do not see any "outrage" in the case at all. I think the amendment will be a matter of exact justice.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the amendment of the Senator from California will not be adopted, not on account of any particular reference to any one regiment in the service, but because there is a manifest injustice in it. I think the Treasury of the United States can stand justice, and I do not think that we do well in legislating any injustice anywhere. If there is a manifest propriety and justice that the colored soldiers should have the same pay as the white soldiers, they should have it. I was in favor of it when the bill on the subject was before Congress a year or two ago, and, with the chairman of the Committee on Finance, I thought they should have that pay. If we neglected it then, if it did not pass then, and there is an opportunity now to retrieve that error, why not let us do it?

I can see very well why the confederates would not recognize our colored soldiers: because we did not recognize them. I can see why they would not exchange them: because we have never put them on a level with our other soldiers. We ourselves are measurably responsible for that. I think it commends itself strongly to us that we should vote this appropriation in this bill. We should give them the precise pay and place them in precisely the same position as white soldiers. Their lives are as dear to them; their services are as valuable; at any rate they are as valuable in proportion to the ability they have to render; and when a man does all he can for the Government and the country that is the measure of his ability with regard to it, and that is a reason why he should be put on—

Mr. COWAN. The Senator will allow me to ask him whether he would be willing to go back and put all the white soldiers in the Army on the same footing as to past pay, emoluments, and bounties?

Mr. POMEROY. I would have all the white soldiers on one footing. I would not make any distinction between our soldiers. If, at a particular time, they all had so much, that should be the law for the whole; and if at a particular time a part of the forces of the United States had one pay and a part another, that would be a reason why we should change it. We should apply that principle here. We have enlisted these colored soldiers. Some were enlisted under one order and some under another; some with law and some without law. Now I say there is a manifest propriety in paying them reasonably and paying them alike, and paying them from the date of their enlistment, making soldiers of them really, if we pretend to call them so. Let us respect them and then they will be respected abroad. Let us respect them and they will begin to respect themselves. But if we depress them, if we put a stigma on them, they will feel that they are not properly treated and respected.

Mr. CONNESS. Do I understand the Senator from Kansas to say that passing this increase of pay to the colored soldiers will cause the so-called confederate government to recognize them and to treat in regard to them? Do I understand him to say that, or to be of that opinion? I rather think the passage of this bill will have no effect upon that subject at all.

Mr. POMEROY. Mr. President, I think that in passing this act we shall do what we ought to have done in the beginning; we shall do what I think will recognize these men as full soldiers, not half soldiers, not two thirds soldiers, but really soldiers.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will ask my friend whether we shall not do that as fully and fairly by passing a law to give them the same pay from this time forward as by going back and giving it to them for their service heretofore? Can we act on what the confederates have done heretofore?

Mr. POMEROY. I was replying to the argument made by the Senator from California, that the Treasury of the United States could not afford to do justice; that it could not stand an act of justice to these men.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator will permit me, I did not recognize that there was any necessity for this act on the ground of justice at all; and if the Senator will permit me to say so, neither do I recognize the propriety of introducing the question of sympathy or the disparity arising from color in this discussion. I regard it as a simple proposition involving money, and nothing more. I think that, as a proposition involving money, we should pay this increase from and after the passage of this act. We have performed our contracts up to this time. If the legislation of the past was not wise, if it was not magnanimous, if it was not in accordance with the Senator's opinion of what the country could do, then, sir, that has become history. We cannot correct it now. We can vote the pay of these soldiers, it is true; but we cannot call back the act of disparity to the extent that it was such.

I am not in favor of lugging these considerations into the discussion of every proposition involving the payment of money. The mode of discussion pursued by the Senator from Kansas is calculated to raise, as it does, this entire question of the negro race. There is no difference of opinion, I apprehend, between that Senator and myself on that subject; but I submit that there is no necessity for its introduction here. This is a mere question of whether we shall pay a given amount of money to a certain number of men with whom we made a contract, and to whom we have performed our part of it. The volunteers that enlisted in the State of California have been paid five dollars a month by the State to make up to them the loss they suffer in being paid in legal-tender notes of the United States. I might as well ask that the Treasury of the United States should refund that. I do not see that strict justice demands that this back pay should be voted. I do not see that it invokes any considerations of humanity. I admit fully the rights of these colored soldiers. I agree with the Senator from Maine that there should be no difference recognized between soldiers of the United States, and we propose from and after the passage of this act that there shall be no such difference. I think that is the proper view of the question.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I should like to ask the Senator from California a question. In January, 1863, the Government accepted the first Kansas colored regiment as organized in August. They had fought, drilled, and labored from August to January. They were not paid by the Government at all for that service. Did not the Government by accepting their services in January take upon themselves the moral obligation at least to pay them for the services they had rendered between August and January?

Mr. CONNESS. I believe we have made an appropriation to pay white soldiers who enlisted in the State of Missouri, and fought the battles of the country, without the authority of the laws of the United States. I believe we have recognized their services and paid them. If the Senator from Kansas desires to pay Kansas soldiers that entered the service and fought the battles of the country before they were mustered in, let him make that proposition as a distinct one to Congress, and let it stand upon its exact merits; but if you are going to legislate in regard to this question of the equal payment of all the soldiers of the United States, let it begin now.

Mr. RAMSEY. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs what number of colored troops there are now in the service, and what charge, probably or approximately, this retrospective feature of the bill will make upon the Treasury?

Mr. WILSON. I cannot give a definite answer to the Senator. I suppose, however, taking all parts of the country, the men who are enlisted in regiments already in the field, and who are in depots to enter regiments, that we may have now about forty-five or fifty thousand colored troops. I suppose the number does not exceed fifty thousand. Most of these troops have been raised during the last six or eight months. We did very little in raising colored troops previous to the latter part of last summer.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I believe nothing can be clearer than that the Government should carry out in good faith what it has promised to soldiers in enlisting in the Army. If the Government has in good faith made a promise to soldiers who have enlisted in any particular regiment, whether in Massachusetts or any where else, that promise ought to be kept. I agree that justice demands that. We ought not to make a promise by which soldiers are induced to go into a regiment and then deceive them when they go into that regiment. That certainly is not just. At the same time there are some considerations in relation to this retrospective legislation that should be considered. In my judgment, if we go into it we shall involve ourselves in very great difficulties. We shall not be able to go through with that kind of legislation and do justice to white and black soldiers in the Army. There are a great many soldiers who have been in the Army almost three years without any bounty whatever; who have served simply for the common monthly wages; who have borne the heat and burden of the day, and have gone through these terrible battles. We have subsequently given large bounties to new recruits and to those that are reenlisted. If we undertake to deal justly from the beginning, if we adopt this principle, we shall be called upon by a power that Congress will not be able to resist, it seems to me, which will demand for those old veteran soldiers the same bounties that are given to other recruits.

Again, sir, there is, I think, some difficulty growing out of this very question of wages—

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I wish to reply to the question that has been asked by the Senator from Minnesota as to how much this provision will amount to. If I figure it right, considering that we have fifty thousand of these soldiers, and that they have been in the service six months, on an average, it will amount to $900,000; and then the bounty will be $500,000 more. This retrospective provision will take out of the Treasury about a million and a half at the lowest calculation.

Mr. ANTHONY. The bounty is not involved in this.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I thought it was. Then it will be about a million dollars, supposing six months to be the average time.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understood the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to say that the average time was about four months. Nearly all of them have enlisted within the last six months. Many of them are not a month in the service.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Many of them are in the service a year.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In some of the States colored troops enlisting into our armies are precisely in a similar condition to the white troops; but I can very readily conceive in that section of the country where it is probable we shall enlist more colored men in our armies than anywhere else, that they are not altogether situated the same as white soldiers that are enlisting into our armies, and for this reason: I understand, practically, that as our armies advance into the country thickly settled with a colored population, they advance, men, women, and children, to our lines. The able-bodied man with his wife and children comes within our lines. He is put into the Army, and the women and children in a great many instances remain on our lands and are now receiving rations, as I understand, at the hands of the Government. Now, is it doing exact and equal justice between the two kinds of soldiers for us to put the colored soldier into our Army and give him precisely the same pay as the white soldier, while at the same time we are feeding his wife and his children with rations issued from the quartermaster's Department, and our white soldiers must support their families, and support them out of their wages?

This is a consideration that does not apply, I agree, to all the States where these men may enlist; but it does apply to certain localities and districts. It would seem as if some kind of legislation ought to be made to reach that case. If we are to pay them the same wages as white troops and the Government is at the same time supporting their wives and children, there ought to be some account kept and some deduction made of a portion of their wages. I know in my own State, practically, this system is adopted to a very great extent in our regiments. The white soldiers are permitted to set apart a certain portion of their wages to be sent home to their families, and when the paymasters call upon our soldiers to pay them, that amount which is agreed upon is set apart for the benefit of their families, and is sent home to the treasurer of our State for distribution among their families. I suggest to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs whether there ought not to be some such legislation for the peculiar localities and States where this system most prevails.

My attention has been called to this subject for this reason: I am more particularly connected with Indian affairs. A large number of refugee Indians, on account of the war in the Indian territory, fled into the State of Kansas. They fled there in a most destitute condition. Out of these refugee Indians, who at one time numbered nearly twelve thousand, as I was informed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, some three or four regiments of Indians have been raised and put into our service, and at the same time we are feeding their wives and children as refugees on our hands to this day in the territory of Kansas. Is it possible that we shall be called upon to pay the same amount of wages to these Indians serving as soldiers as we pay our white troops, and at the same time that we shall feed their wives and children as refugees?

I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts in the principle with which he sets out, and that is to do justice between all the soldiers in the service. My opinion is, he will do the best justice which is attainable by us by providing that wherever the faith of the Government has been given to those enlisted under the authority of the Department they shall receive what the Government has promised. That legislation should have reference to the future. It seems to me there ought to be some provision in the bill requiring some kind of an account to be kept, if, at the same time that we place the able-bodied colored men in the Army, their wives and children are receiving rations from the quartermaster's department. I do not know precisely the shape in which it ought to be placed; but it may be a very material item; for I understand that the feeding of these refugee Indians on our hands in Kansas costs now more than a thousand dollars a day, and has done so for a long time. I do not know whether any one is prepared to state how many there are of the persons denominated "contrabands," women and children, in the camps, who have clustered around our armies and are fed on Government rations. I have no doubt their number is very great, and that the drain on that department is very great. I simply call the attention of my honorable friend from Massachusetts to this question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will inquire whether the morning hour has not expired.

Mr. WILSON. Let us finish this resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to make a remark before this question is disposed of.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We cannot get through with it this morning.

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator will indulge me a minute I wish to say a few words.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will yield if the Senator will renew the motion.

Mr. SUMNER. It seems to me the Senator from Wisconsin made an allusion which, if practically carried out, will perhaps be the solution of the present question; for I cannot but think that the difference of opinion here comes from Senators not bearing in mind that there are different classes of cases. It is well known that there are two different statutes under which enlistments have been made. The first is the original statute of 1861, and the second is the statute passed in July, 1862, which the Senate will remember provides especially for the employment of persons of African descent as laborers or as soldiers, and it proceeds to assign them ten dollars per month as pay. It is obvious that any enlistment made under the statute of 1862 can entitle the party to nothing more than the pay of ten dollars per month; but if the enlistment has been bona fide made under the previous statute of 1861, which contains no limitation on the pay, and especially if at the time of the enlistment there was an understanding on the part of those who enlisted that they were to have the full pay allowed to soldiers in the Army of the United States, it seems to me the faith of the Government is bound accordingly.

I have gone into this distinction in order to remark that there are obviously persons who have enlisted under these two different statutes. I suppose that the larger part of the enlistments in Tennessee and in the Southwest have been under the second statute; and therefore none of those persons can be entitled to more than the ten dollars. But it cannot be doubted that there are enlistments which, whether rightfully or not, were made under the statute of 1861.

Since this debate has commenced I have received a letter—it came with the mail which has been put on our desks just now—from a sergeant in the Massachusetts fifty-fourth regiment actually on Morris island. The letter is dated in his camp, and among other things it contains a copy of the paper which these soldiers signed at the time of their enlistment, which, with the indulgence of the Senate, I will read. It is brief:

"We, the undersigned, by our signatures hereto annexed, do severally agree to serve for a period of three years from the date of being mustered into the United States service, unless sooner discharged, as volunteers from Massachusetts in the force authorized by an act of Congress of the United States, approved on the 23d day of July, 1861, entitled 'An act to authorize the employment of volunteers to aid in enforcing the laws and protecting public property,' and we severally agree to serve in such companies as the Governor and commander-in-chief may designate."

It seems to me that all who have signed that paper, and in pursuance of it took the risks of a soldier of the United States—and we know how gallantly they performed them under the lead of that brave and ever-to-be-lamented officer who fell on the parapet of Fort Wagner—have the faith of this Government pledged to them that they shall receive the pay of a soldier, under the statute of 1861, before there had been any limitation on that pay or any special provision with reference to persons of African descent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There had been.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator says there had been at that time. He is right as to the existence of the statute; but, in point of fact, the contract was entered into under the statute of 1861.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It was a simple mistake of the Governor.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator says it was a simple mistake of the Governor. Granted that it was a mistake, the Governor of Massachusetts has had the idea—and I must say I share it with him—that under the statute of 1861 any person of African descent might be enlisted and be entitled to the same pay as a white soldier. There was no limitation in the statute. There was no color there. There was nothing against the enlistment of colored men under that statute except a blind prejudice which we ought to forget. Governor Andrew thought he was entitled to enlist them under that statute. He did so, and as the representative of the Government of the United States he pledged its faith to pay them the full pay of a soldier under the statute of 1861.

I know the impatience now, and that other business waits; but I cannot take my seat without making the suggestion that it seems to me a line may be run between these two different classes of cases, first, those to whom the faith of the Government is pledged directly or indirectly, and even through mistake, if the Senator from Maine pleases, and that other larger class to which this faith is not pledged. It seems to me if the bill shall be amended in conformity with that distinction, we can all vote for it, and, indeed, there will be no difference of opinion.

I wish to see our colored troops treated like white troops in every respect. But I would not press this first principle by any retroactive proposition, unless where the faith of the Government is committed, and there I would not hesitate. The Treasury can bear any additional burden better than the country can bear to do an injustice.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope now that the tax bill will be suffered to be taken up. It is obvious that this resolution is not in a state that the Senate can agree upon it, and it will lead to much longer debate, and there is a necessity for passing the tax bill to-day. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the revenue bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) It is moved by the Senator from Maine that the further consideration of the joint resolution now before the Senate be postponed until tomorrow, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 122) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, accordingly resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 122) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of the Committee on Finance to insert after the word "gallon," in line eleven of section one, the following words:

And upon all liquors that may be distilled after the passage of this act, and sold or removed for consumption or sale on and after the 1st day of July next, and previous to the 1st day of January next, seventy cents on each and every gallon; and on all liquors that may be distilled after the passage of this act, and sold or removed for consumption or sale on and after the 1st day of January next, eighty cents on each and every gallon.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I offer the following amendment—

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK.) Is it an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is an amendment to the text.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not in order unless it is an amendment to the amendment now pending. It will be in order after going through with the amendments of the committee.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The amendment that I propose is not inconsistent with the amendments of the committee, but ought to be considered, I think, before the amendments proposed by the committee. My amendment proposes to reduce the tax from sixty to forty cents on the gallon, which ought to be considered first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will allow the Chair to suggest that when the amendment comes up in regard to the amount of tax that may be in order as an amendment to that amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose the Senator's object is to move to reduce the sixty cents in the eleventh line to forty cents.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is my proposition.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And if he succeeds in that he would reduce the others, I suppose, to fifty and sixty cents respectively.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not know that I would agree to that proposition.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I would suggest to him that if he has no objection to this clause as it stands, and would not attempt to alter it, he may as well let us act upon it, as that is the ordinary course; but if he desires to reduce the sixty cent duty to forty cents, and the others to fifty and sixty cents respectively, his mode would be to move to amend the amendment proposed by the committee which is now under consideration by striking out the seventy cents and inserting fifty, and by striking out the eighty cents and inserting sixty, and he can move afterwards to reduce the sixty in the eleventh line to forty; but if this amendment is once adopted it will not be amendable, I suppose. Therefore, if he proposes to amend this, he can do it now, and he can amend the sixty after we have gone through with the amendments of the committee.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am not choice about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Chair decides that an amendment to the text is not now in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I move to strike out the word "seventy," where it occurs in the amendment of the committee, and the word "eighty," where it occurs, and to insert instead thereof "forty," in each case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator proposes to amend the amendment of the committee in the manner suggested by him.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator of course can vote against the whole amendment after it has been amended; but he will excuse me for suggesting that I presume that if he intends to insert forty in the eleventh line, he ought not to propose to insert the same sum in the fifteenth line.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will state to the Senator that—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Indiana state his amendment to the amendment again, and let it be repeated from the desk. The Senate will then understand it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. My amendment is to strike out "seventy" and "eighty," where they occur in the committee's amendment, and insert in lieu thereof in each place "forty" cents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be reported.

The Secretary read the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I have a very few suggestions to make to the Senate upon this question. The bill, as it came to the Senate from the House of Representatives, was not satisfactory to me as a representative of a northwestern interest. I am free to say that the amendments proposed by the Committee on Finance of this body have made the bill more acceptable. Clearly, the proposition to impose an additional tax upon liquors already in the market, and which have already borne their tax, was so unjust, so unwise, in my judgment, as that it could not receive the favorable consideration of so enlightened a committee or of the Senate; and the proposition to strike out that feature of the bill I will certainly support with great cordiality.

But, sir, the entire measure is one that I cannot support. This bill proposes to tax an article of northwestern production, while it does not propose to change the rate of taxation upon the other productions of the country. This is not an amendment of the act of 1862. I admit that very properly, by way of amendment, an old law may be amended in one of its sections; but this is an original bill proposing "to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes."

What was, Mr. President, the plain duty of Congress in undertaking to increase the revenue? First, it seems to me that it was proper that we should consider how much additional revenue the condition of the country required. We have not been informed by the chairman of the committee who made his exposition of this bill yesterday how much revenue the Government now requires in addition to that which is raised by the present law. We certainly ought to be informed upon that subject. I presume that the committee have come to a conclusion upon that question; and if so, the Senate ought to be advised of it. Does the committee propose that there shall be an increase of the revenue by internal taxation to the extent of one hundred or two hundred millions? We ought to come to a conclusion that it is necessary to increase the revenue to a certain amount, and then that increase ought to be apportioned among the several interests of the country fairly, equitably, and justly.

The act of 1862 did not impose a tax upon one single interest of the country. It imposed a tax upon almost all the interests of the country. It was a revenue measure. It taxed liquors; it taxed other western interests; it taxed eastern interests, making an entire system. It has been in operation now nearly two years; and of course if the Committee on Finance in this body find that that measure is defective in some particular that defect might be removed by legislation; but it is not stated by the committee, this bill is not based upon the proposition, that the original measure in its adjustment of the burdens of Government upon the several interests of the country has been found to be defective. That is not the position of the committee, nor is that the proposition of this present measure; but the present bill proposes to increase the tax upon an article of western production two hundred per cent. without informing the Senate what additional burdens are to be borne by other interests of the country. If, instead of bringing in such a bill as this, we had had an entire change or an increase of the tax upon the different interests of the country, we could then tell whether it was equitable, just, and fair to the different sections; but the committee has not brought in any such measure, and therefore I say it is unjust toward the Northwest.

I know there is a sentiment that liquor will bear a high tax. It was not alluded to by the chairman of the committee yesterday, in explaining this bill, that liquor should be taxed with a view to decrease its use in the country. This measure is a revenue measure, and is not based upon that idea. This measure rests upon the proposition that liquor will be produced and used, and that from its production we can realize a revenue; and the simple question, then, as a revenue measure, without reference to the encouragement or discouragement of the production of liquors, is, how can this measure be considered with reference to its fairness, its equality in adjusting the burdens upon the several interests of the country?

The chairman did not state to us why it was right to impose upon a production of the Northwest an increased tax of two hundred per cent. The law of 1862 was considered to have imposed a very great burden upon this production. Liquor in the Northwest at the time of the passage of that law was perhaps worth from twelve to twenty cents a gallon, and then a tax was imposed of more than one hundred per cent. upon the production; and it was considered a very high tax, when other interests of the country were taxed three per cent. upon their productions. Now this interest is selected out for an increase of two hundred per cent. upon the tax of 1862. I am not able to see that that is just. Indiana, according to the census of 1860, produces eight million gallons; Ohio and Illinois each about fifteen million gallons. The State of New York, the largest producing State of this article, produces about twenty million gallons. The largest production is in the State of New York; yet the liquor manufactured in the State of New York is produced from western corn almost entirely; and this tax, whatever it is upon liquor, is a tax in fact upon a northwestern production, and in the end must fall on the corn producer upon our rich lands. I know that just now, under the stimulated condition of the currency, liquor will bear a very high tax; but this I suppose is intended by the committee to be a permanent law, which is not to cease to be enforced at the end of one year or two years, and in considering it it is proper that we should look forward three or four years to a period when our currency shall have been greatly reduced, when it shall have approached a specie standard. Then I ask the chairman of the committee whether whisky will bear such a tax as this? While everything is increased in price in the country, and while men are willing to pay almost any price for any article they desire, perhaps liquor will bear a much increased tax over that which it now bears; but after three or four years shall have passed, when the war shall have come to a close, when the currency shall have been greatly reduced, when men will not be willing if they are able, and when perhaps they will not be able to pay the present extraordinary prices, I ask the chairman if then he believes that liquor will bear such a burden as he proposes to impose upon it?

My amendment proposes that we shall double the tax on this production. Is not that quite enough? Are the interests of the other sections of the country willing that their taxes shall be doubled? Whether or no we cannot say, because the increase upon the other productions does not accompany the proposed increase in this bill. It is first proposed that this article of northwestern production shall be burdened with this extraordinary tax, and that afterwards the revenue shall be adjusted according to the pleasure of the majority upon the other interests of the country. If so, this is not a fair mode of legislation. If the system is to be changed by an increase of the taxes generally, we ought to have it in one measure, so that we can tell whether a northwestern interest is unequally taxed in comparison with the tax that the measure proposes on the other interests of the country.

I do not intend, sir, to discuss this matter further. I desired simply to express my dissatisfaction at an extraordinary tax upon a production of great importance to the Northwest. Corn, sir, is an article that will not bear expensive transportation to market. It is bulky; it is weighty; it is cheap; and therefore we cannot carry it to market when the transportation costs so very much; but when we can put fifteen or sixteen bushels of corn into one barrel, and increase its value very much, we have an article then which we can carry to market either over the rivers running toward the South or over the railroads running to the great commercial metropolis, the city of New York. We can then find our way to market; we can then make a profit upon our labor; but if a policy is adopted here now imposing a tax that at the end of two or three years, when hard times come upon the country, when the currency is reduced, when it is hard to meet the taxes of the Government, will destroy the production of liquor entirely, you strike very materially at the interest of the Northwest; and I desired to express the reason why I could not support such a measure.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I cannot but regard the remarks which have been made by the honorable Senator from Indiana as intended rather for the coming campaign in the Northwest than for the Senate or the bill, for I will not do a gentleman of his high intelligence the discredit to suppose that he thinks remarks of that kind are not fully understood by the Senate, and very easily answered. Does the Senator not know that the mere proposition to impose a tax upon whisky originally led to a very great increase of the quantity produced; that the whisky establishments ran night and day to increase the quantity as much as possible before the tax went into operation? Does he not know an additional fact, that the tax put upon whisky has not decreased the amount produced a gallon since it was put on? Does he not know that since it has been proposed to increase this tax two hundred per cent., as he states, the same effect has been produced as to the quantity manufactured? And does he not know also that before the original tax was put on distilling was at a very low ebb, and a losing business, and since whisky has been taxed it has become a money-making business, owing to one cause and another, and that there has been no decrease of production? Now, sir, if that is the case, the assessing a revenue upon it has produced no effect in decreasing production, and consequently we may infer that those engaged in the production have not considered themselves injured.

In answer to the Senator further, let me tell him what I think he cannot but know, that there never has been the slightest objection to a tax, and a large tax, upon this article, and that the amount put upon it and put upon certain other articles of the same description, that is, articles of luxury particularly, is not predicated at all upon the same idea with the taxes laid upon articles of necessity. And the large number of whisky distillers who were before us from the Northwest, men from the Senator's own State as well as other States of the Northwest, all admitted that this tax of sixty cents was not too high; some, perhaps, thought it might be a little lower, while the large majority said that the article would bear a still further tax, that you might go up to eighty cents without injuring the business, and perhaps to a dollar. The Senator must know that it is predicated upon different principles. When we adjust the taxes upon different articles, do we put the same amount upon each, for the reason that one is produced in one section of the country and one in another? Do you put twenty cents on a gallon of whisky, and twenty cents on a yard of cotton cloth because you put twenty cents on a gallon of whisky? Is that the system of taxation the honorable Senator would recommend as a statesman? And yet, to carry out his idea of equalizing the burdens of the country, you must put the same amount of taxation on all articles, because it will not do to say, "You must adjust them from time to time; if you increase the tax on one you must therefore increase the tax on another." Does not the honorable Senator know that in taxation you tax each article according to what it will bear?

Then again, does he not perfectly well understand, for I suppose he must, that the amount of tax is paid by the consumer and not by the producer of the article? Is all the whisky produced in the Northwest used in the Northwest? Do they drink it all? Does none of it go to the Atlantic border? Is none of it sent to the city of New York? Is none ever sent, at the proper season, or was it not before the war broke out, down the Mississippi river? And who pays the tax when it is laid on an article? Is it the man who produced it and who pays it in the first instance, or the man who uses it afterwards? What led, let me ask the honorable Senator, to the vastly forced production of whisky the moment the idea was suggested of putting a tax on it? Did the producer think he would have to pay it and lose it out of his own pocket, and therefore run his mill night and day to get as much made as he could make? Was that the idea on which he proceeded? And yet the Senator's argument is predicated on the idea that this is a tax on a northwestern production. Would it benefit the people of the Northwest who wear cotton shirts if because we put a tax on whisky we should increase the tax in the same ratio upon cotton, or if because we put a tax on one article which happens to be produced there we therefore for their benefit put a heavy tax on an article of necessity that is used but not made there? Who would suffer, let me ask the Senator, in that case, the manufacturer who put on the increased price or the purchaser in the Northwest who had to pay the increased price in order to use the article? The Senator will see that the whole of it goes upon a totally different system. Let me tell him that in England the tax on spirituous liquors is more than double what we propose to put on here, and it was for a time a constantly increasing tax; and yet the production increased with it; nobody was injured, but the Government was benefited.

This is an article of luxury in a very great degree. So far as it is not it is an article used in manufactures; and where is it used in manufactures? Is it used in the Northwest or on the Atlantic border in the States where manufactures exist—I mean in the greatest proportions? And if it is used on the Atlantic border, and the tax is put on that which is used in manufactures among us, who pays the tax in the first instance? The manufacturer who buys the article. Who pays the tax in the second instance and in the last? The consumer who uses the article, and not the producer who originally pays the tax.

So I say that I cannot possibly do the honorable Senator's intelligence the injustice to suppose that he intends the speech he has made here with reference to principles so obvious, based upon such ideas as he has advanced, for anything else than campaign use instead of applying to the bill itself. Why, sir, let me tell him that of all the gentlemen who appeared before the committee from the Northwest, the largest distillers there, representing the interests of Indiana, Illinois, and Ohio upon this very point, it was not suggested by one of them that any tax we put upon whisky was taxing a sectional interest, and that therefore we ought to tax in the same relative proportion everything else that is made in every other section of the country, and which they must buy and put upon their backs, in order to equalize the burden upon them. That is, because we tax their production in the first instance, which tax will be refunded to them by those who use the production, we must therefore burden them still more by taxing other articles, which tax they are compelled to pay in the last instance for articles of necessity.

So, then, my answer to the Senator in relation to that matter is obvious. We tax this as an article of luxury. We tax it because all experience has shown that the tax which has been put upon it has never affected the question of production in any way; and let me say to him now that all that the distillers of the Northwest requested of us was that we should not tax the article on hand. They did not allude to the fact that they would be injured or touched by a tax upon production. They asked for a tax upon production in the first place, willingly submitted to it, and the distillers who were before us two years ago said it would bear a much higher tax than the twenty cents we put upon it at that time, and experience has shown that it would. It has not been affected in the slightest possible degree; and why? Because it is very well known that men who use liquor as a beverage will not hesitate about a cent or two a glass, even if the tax came upon them; but in point of fact it is well known that if you take a gallon of whisky and divide it up into drinks it will bear twice or three times the tax it does now, and yet pay the retailer a large profit. That is perfectly well understood, and the Senator may easily calculate it for himself.

There is nothing, then, in the Senator's argument on this subject, and I say so with all respect to him. It does not apply; and more especially does not his argument apply that because you tax an article of luxury which people will have, and which it has been demonstrated by experience is not affected by any amount of tax that has been put upon it or that we propose to put upon it, therefore, for the good of his constituents, we must tax everything they wear in the same proportion, and increase the burdens of living upon them, simply because most of those articles happen to be made in another section of the country.

Sir, I deprecate all these sectional appeals, especially when they are so unfounded. Let me warn Senators that the difficulty under which we are laboring at the present time, the rebellion that is upon us, the trouble that this country is suffering under, has arisen by the constant iteration and reiteration of talk about sections, about one interest and another interest, and the endeavor to excite a sort of feeling as if one interest was working against another. I hope that my friends from the Northwest will not begin at this early day, until we have settled the other questions, or my friends from the East, where I live myself, if it ever comes from there, to raise any question with reference to the separate interests of the various parts of the country, as if one was disregarded while the other was sustained. Sir, I do not believe there is any such feeling among the people, and there never will be unless it is got up for political purposes.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I have but one or two words to say in reply to the Senator from Maine. The argument which he has presented to the Senate is an old one. At first it seems to have force that a tax imposed upon a production falls upon the consumer entirely. I admit, and I admitted so in the course of the remarks which I had the honor to submit to the Senate, that during the war, while the currency is inflated, that is the effect; but when the times are changed, when the currency is reduced, when hard times come upon the country, that is not the case. Then the producer has to share in the burden that is imposed with the consumer. It cannot be true that you can tax that which is produced from corn and yet not burden that interest. But I do not propose to discuss that point further. My proposition is, as I stated before, that the liquor produced in the Northwest and in other localities out of northwestern corn will, in the present state of the country and of the currency, admit of a heavy burden; but when the currency is reduced it will not bear this burden, and it will be hard upon the corn-growing section of the country.

Upon another subject, to which the Senator has alluded, I desire to say a word. He deprecates sectional appeals. He cannot do that more earnestly than I; but the Senator will allow me to say that words do not cause the ill-feeling between sections. That feeling is produced by measures. No Senator, by what he says in this body, can make one section of the country love another section less, or be less devoted to the union of all the States. Even if I had so bad a heart as to desire such a thing, I could not hope to be able to do that by anything I could say. But, sir, any Senator who gives a vote that will impose the burdens of Government unjustly, produces the state of things which the Senator deprecates; and because I love this Union, because I wish these States to remain together in harmony and affection, I will oppose now, and while I have the honor to hold a seat in this body, every unequal distribution of the burdens of Government. If there had been no other reason than this one now suggested I should oppose this measure. The Senator cannot expect that the Northwest will be entirely content to bear an unequal portion of the burdens of Government. I think that section of country has shown that it is ready and willing to bear its fair proportion. It has not objected to the tax that was imposed two years ago, because that tax was upon an adjustment of the burdens upon the several interests of the country; and I ask the Senator why that same course is not pursued now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I deny utterly that the tax bill had any reference to the several sections of the country. It had reference to the articles, and was imposed according as the interests of the whole country required that the taxes should be laid upon the different articles. We did not ask ourselves whether this comes from the Northwest, and this from the East, and this from the South, &c., but what tax will the article bear consistently with the interests of the whole country. It was no adjustment with reference to different sections. We did not dream of sections. That is an imagination of the Senator. He frames his whole argument upon an assumption, and not upon any facts that exist. We took it as a principle that all taxes, unless they went to an unreasonable extent, must fall upon the consumer. To be sure, it was supposed with regard to some things, not with regard to whisky, because if there is one article in the whole catalogue where the tax falls exclusively upon the consumer it is whisky, but with regard to other articles, articles of manufacture, it was doubted whether it would be so; but as to whisky nobody who knew anything about the subject had any doubt about it at all.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What I stated was because I found in the act of July 1, 1862, a law which adjusted the burdens of Government upon the several interests of the country, and I presumed that the Senator, as chairman of the Committee on Finance, had considered what was the burden that each interest of the country ought to bear. I supposed that he considered how much it—

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will allow me to ask him whether there is not a very great difference between "the several interests of the country," and "the several sections of the country?" His speech had reference to "sections." Now he has got it "interests."

Mr. HENDRICKS. I beg the Senator's pardon. I have not changed my position at all. I have spoken of the several interests of the country. I spoke of the production of liquor as being a matter of great interest to the Northwest. I said that it would bear a burden at the present time which three or four years from this time it cannot bear without great loss to the men who labor to produce corn.

Mr. GRIMES. Cannot the law be changed then?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Perhaps it can, but I am afraid it will not be. I said that two years ago the taxes were distributed upon the several interests of the country. That is what I said before, and I repeat it; and I wanted to know of the Senator why the same course was not pursued now. If it was found right two years ago that liquor should be taxed twenty cents on the gallon, and that cotton productions should be taxed three per cent., why has not the same course been adopted now? And if you increase the tax on liquor two hundred per cent., why not make a like increase of the taxes on the other productions of the country?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will answer right here. I did not think the question meant more than the others, and I did not answer it before. It is simply because some articles will bear increased taxation and other articles will not. From some articles we can raise a larger revenue; some we cannot raise a larger revenue from without laying too heavy burdens upon the country.

But with reference to this particular bill and the reason why it is urged now; I will say that it is the beginning of legislation. Unquestionably the whole law will be revised; but it was thought expedient as this was so large an interest, and speculations were going on from day to day upon the subject, and it was growing more and more difficult and more and more involved, to take it up immediately and lay the tax. It does not follow that we shall not correct the general bill if anything can be found to apply a correction to. The Committee of Ways and Means are endeavoring to find other articles upon which an increased burden can be laid, and from which additional revenue may be derived.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I thought when I read this bill that the same course ought to be now pursued that was pursued two years ago. If a production of the Northwest is to be taxed, let us know for what amount of revenue the tax is to be imposed. I asked the Senator how much additional revenue it was desired to realize by the increase of the taxes. Of course we can only know that when he brings in his entire measure; when he proposes to tax not only whisky but the other interests of the country. Then we can tell what his measure is, but until the entire measure is submitted to the Senate, we cannot judge whether the adjustment is equal to the different sections.

When I spoke of the interests of the Northwest I did not speak with a view of exciting any sectional prejudice. I have always deprecated that; I hope while I hold a seat here to continue to deprecate it; but I repeat to the Senator that if he wishes to maintain friendly relations between the two sections every burden of the Government must be imposed equally upon the different interests of the country; let the Northwest bear its burden equally with the other sections, and then she will cheerfully discharge her full duty; but if it be not equal, the Senator very well knows what is the effect. A law that is not equal cannot receive a cordial support, and efforts will be constantly made through the ballot-box and through public meetings to bring about a change of that legislation, and the interests that look to existing laws will be constantly disturbed. The Senator knows the importance of an equal adjustment of the burdens of the Government. My purpose in speaking upon this question at all was to call his attention, and to call the attention of the Senate, to the fact that this bill proposes to increase the tax upon an important production of the Northwest two hundred per cent. without informing us what additional increase we are to expect upon other articles of production. I think we should have known it, and then we could tell whether the increased burdens were equally adjusted upon the different interests of the country.

There is one other matter to which I wish to allude. The Senator has informed us that the tax in England is much higher, more than twice as high as the tax now proposed by this bill. I understand that in England liquors produced for other purposes than for drink are not taxed at all, and that liquors produced for the purpose of being drunk are taxed $2 50 per gallon. That is because of the policy of the English Government. She wishes to discourage the conversion of grain into liquor. She wishes to encourage the production of breadstuffs, while our policy has not been the same. The Senator has not said that he wishes by this bill to discourage the production of liquor; he has not placed the measure upon that ground, but he has presented it simply as a revenue measure. Then, considering it as a revenue measure, I desired to know what is equal and just toward the different interests of the country, and on that question simply I desired to be heard.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In reference to what the Senator has last stated, he will allow me to say that the time being so pressing in reference to this matter, it was considered by the committee that in regard to some one or two manufactures, especially the manufacture of patent medicines, this might operate pretty severely. What effect it will have I do not know; but there was no time to consider that matter and to devise a system. If there is any possibility by which that can be reached it will undoubtedly be done in the course of the session. I understand that in England they have a style of getting up a kind of mixed liquor of some sort or description, with which the spirits have very little to do, that may take the place in manufactures of the spirits themselves. I forget at this moment the name of it. That very subject is under consideration at the present time. But the Senator is very much mistaken if he supposes that it is predicated on the desire of the British Government, or that the tax is laid with any view to discourage the use of spirits. That is the last thing that has been thought of in their legislation; and in my judgment it is the last thing that will be thought of in ours, for we do not undertake to legislate on the question of morals for anybody in reference to these matters. I still say to the Senator, having answered the questions that he put to me—and he admits now that this article will bear the tax at present—if three or four years hence it shall be found that the thing works injuriously in consequence of a changed state of the currency, we can then change the law if it be necessary; and I repeat to him that I wish, when he tells his people that this amount laid upon liquor has increased the sum that they have to pay for each glass, and consequently affects their drinking so much, he will tell them at the same time that his remedy was to double the price of the shirts they wore, and they would be very much better off!

Mr. POMEROY. Mr. President, I submit that this is no question affecting the Northwest or the Northeast or any other section. I am glad that the committee have reported a large increase in the tax upon whisky. I am only sorry that we did not lay an increased tax two years ago. I believe I proposed then to increase the tax to a dollar a gallon. There never was a greater fallacy than to suppose that the producer is burdened by this tax. It would be just as appropriate for a Senator from New York or Boston to undertake to say that because the duties on imports are principally paid in the first instance at the custom-houses in those cities therefore New York and Boston pay all the tariff duties. At the various custom-houses in the country the duties are paid in the first instance; but the amount of them is immediately put upon the articles themselves, and the consumers in the West and in the Northwest and all over the country pay them.

Precisely so with this tax upon whisky. The producer in the first instance pays the tax. I know that when we put on twenty cents a gallon two years ago the producer immediately put up the price of his whisky twenty-five cents higher than it was before. Twenty cents he put on because it was the tax, and five cents as a kind of apology because he had to pay the tax. He felt himself justified in advancing, and the effect of it was to advance it twenty-five cents per gallon, because the tax was twenty cents. Precisely so now, this tax of sixty or eighty cents a gallon, if it has not already gone into the price, certainly will if this bill passes, and there is not a man who sells a gallon that will not be sure to add that tax to the price, and if he does not add it twice I shall be mistaken. He will certainly add it once to every gallon he sells. The consumers pay the tax on the article, I care not where they live, and I am sorry to say they do not all live in the Northwest. They live everywhere. I do not know a State where it is not consumed. Where it is consumed as a beverage its use is certainly very generally distributed in the West and the East. Where it is used for manufacturing purposes and for making patent medicines it is very generally used in the East, and they do in the first instance there pay the tax.

I merely want to say, in one word, that this tax is no burden upon any section of the country. If it is a burden anywhere it is a burden upon the man who puts the cup to his mouth. Every time he lifts the cup he pays the tax, if he pays for his drink. There is where it falls, and there it is that it ought to fall. So it is with the tariff duties collected at the custom-houses; they are put upon the articles, they follow the articles, adhere to them, and there is not a retailer in the country but has to pay them, and the consumer at the end of the route pays them. It is like the color dyed in the wool, the tariff duty never gets off until the article is consumed.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I would not say a word upon this amendment but for the fact that it is proposed as a measure of justice to the Northwest, and the fact that I happen to represent a portion of that great constituency myself, and for the other facts that I was a member of the committee which reported this bill, and cordially acquiesced in the increase of the tax proposed. I believe it is a just measure, and I was influenced by two considerations. One I am afraid was somewhat sectional in its character. I did desire by increasing this tax to do something, if we could, toward bringing about a little reciprocity in the trade between the East and the West, or the Northwest and the Northeast. I notice that all the boots and shoes the East manufactures for us, and all the cotton and all the woolen goods and all the petroleum they produce are taxed. They send them out to us and charge the tax over to us. We manufacture but very little, at least we manufacture but very few kinds of goods. Our staple happens to be whisky. That is the only article that the East buys of us; and in order to bring about some equality we had to put the whole tax on this one article, and I thought it was best to do it; and I believe we shall get as much revenue out of our eastern friends who drink our whisky as they get out of us in the West who wear their shirts and their boots and shoes. So far my judgment was influenced by sectional considerations.

I was further induced to think that we promote the national character by raising this tax. There is scarcely any necessary of life under the present exigencies of the Government that we are able to afford to anybody at any reasonable or tolerable price. You cannot get a pair of boots, you cannot get a gallon of oil, you cannot get a coat, you cannot get a shirt, you cannot get anything that is a necessity, at a reasonable price; but in spite of the tax which we imposed on liquor two years ago, whisky, distilled spirits have been furnished to the people ruinously cheap. I am told that when corn is worth a dollar a bushel whisky can be manufactured for about forty cents a gallon. If you impose a tax of eighty cents on it it can still be furnished to the people at a dollar a gallon. Now, I suppose a gallon of whisky is equal to getting four men drunk. I do not know what the exact figures are; I presume the chairman of the committee can tell us just how much it takes. [Laughter.] At least it will get four men drunk.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It may depend on the section of country they come from. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWE. It might depend something on that. We are in a state of war; we have to tax, as I said before, all the necessities of life, and it did strike me as a scandal that we should still continue to furnish these large quantities of whisky at these scandalously low rates. I thought it would be more respectable to put on a tax which would make a gallon of whisky cost a respectable price, and I think everybody who consumes it will feel a little better in his own conscience if, when he pays ten cents for a glass of whisky, he reflects that the Government gets about seven and a half cents out of that, and, as is suggested by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES,] he is very likely to get a better article; it may improve the quality. I cannot say about that. I thought it would improve, as I said before, the national character to put on this tax.

It is said that it will influence the price of a great agricultural product of the Northwest. I am utterly incredulous upon that point. If I had ever seen a man so squalid, so poor, so miserable, so impoverished, so destitute, that he could not get a glass of liquor when he wanted it, I would hesitate from the fear that we might get the price up to a point at which it would influence the consumption, and so influence the price of the material which goes into it and influence the revenue to be derived from it. I never have seen that individual. I never have seen the individual who had an appetite for drink, no matter what his circumstances might be, no matter what his ability might be to procure anything else, who could not procure enough of liquor to send him into the gutter, and who did not do it. So I am utterly incredulous that the consumption of this article is to be at all influenced by the cost of it; and until it is, it is not going to influence the price of any of the materials which enter into it. But if I am mistaken upon this point, if the time shall arrive when our currency is less inflated, or when from any cause it does influence the price of the materials which enter into this manufacture, if it does diminish the consumption, those who are engaged in the manufacture will know it; and whenever they cannot sell it to the consumer at the cost, whenever they cannot afford to pay this price, they will make it known; and that will be the time to modify the tax on every article we have taxed for the purpose of raising internal revenue. Whenever the time comes that the Northwest will not take the cotton manufactures, the woolen manufactures, and the leather manufactures, and pay the manufacturers for the tax which they pay to the Government, they will cease to manufacture, and we shall have to modify the tax on those articles. That such a time may come in reference to these last articles, I do not at all doubt. When it does come we shall hear from it, and hear from it authoritatively.

Mr. POMEROY. I should feel very well reconciled to this proposition, if the fact was that every time a man paid ten cents for a drink seven cents of that went to the Government. This tax is altogether too slight for any such computation as that. I do not think the Government will get one cent a glass. Suppose we put a tax of sixty cents on a gallon of pure spirits; that gallon by some process gets made into about five by the time it is consumed; and there ought to be among moderate men at least sixty glasses, perhaps eighty, but sixty at any rate to the gallon. If the gallon paid but sixty cents tax at the start, each glass does not pay over one third of a cent by the time it is consumed. This tax is altogether too light; persons who indulge in this kind of luxury can afford to go beyond that.

Mr. HOWE. Allow me to say to the Senator that I was not asserting that that would be the fact in regard to the liquor drunk under the rate of taxation proposed in this bill, but that it would be the case if a rate of taxation was put on which would enable the drinker to reflect that he was paying seven and a half cents to the Government every time he paid ten cents for a glass of liquor.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected, and the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to strike out the following clause in section one, from lines twenty-four to thirty:

And all whisky or any other spirit, on being rectified or mixed with any other spirit or fluid whatever, or into which any matter whatever may be infused, and to be sold as whisky, brandy, rum, gin, wine, or by any other name, and not otherwise provided for by this act, or the act to which it is amendatory, shall pay an additional tax of twenty cents per gallon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following proviso at the end of the first section:

Provided further, That all spirits on hand for sale, whether distilled prior to the date of this act or not, shall be subject to the rates of duty provided by this act from and after the 12th day of January, 1864; except that spirits which have been already taxed under the law approved July 1, 1862, shall not bear more than the additional or increased tax provided for by this act.

Mr. GRIMES. Upon this question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 30, nays 8; as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Doollittle, Grimes, Harding, Harlan, Morrill, Pomeroy, and Ramsey—8.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirty-two of section two, after the word "recovered," to insert "and applied."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the words "also that" in lines thirty-three and thirty-four of section two.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following proviso to section two:

Provided, however, That where, owing to the perishable nature of the property seized, expense of storage or other circumstances, the value whereof may be diminished by delay of sale, the owner thereof may, if he so choose, apply to the assessor of the district, who shall, if he deem it expedient that the property so seized should be sold, appraise, or have the same appraised under his direction and control, and the owner may give bond or bonds in an amount equal to the appraised value, with such sureties as the assessor shall adjudge good and sufficient, which shall be by him transmitted to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to be held and collected, or any part thereof, or surrendered in accordance with the final judgment, order, or decree of the court having jurisdiction of the case; or, if the owner shall not apply as aforesaid, the assessor, upon the application of the marshal of the said district in whose custody and control said spirits or other articles seized as aforesaid may be, shall appraise or have the same appraised under his direction and control, and shall issue and return to the marshal aforesaid an order to sell the same, and the said marshal shall thereupon advertise and sell the same, and the proceeds of sale, after deducting therefrom the costs of seizure and sale, shall be paid into the court having jurisdiction of the case, and paid out as the said court shall on final judgment order or decree.

And in lieu of it to insert:

That when the property so seized may be liable to perish or become greatly reduced in value by keeping, or when it cannot be kept without great expense, the owner thereof, or the marshal of the district, may apply to the assessor of the district to examine said property. And if, in the opinion of said assessor, it shall be necessary that the said property should be sold to prevent such waste or expense, he shall appraise the same; and the owner thereupon shall have said property returned to him upon giving bond, in such form as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and in an amount equal to the appraised value, with such sureties as the said appraiser shall deem good and sufficient, to abide the final order, decree, or judgment of the court having cognizance of the case, and to pay the amount of said appraised value to the marshal, or otherwise, as he may be ordered and directed by the court, which bond shall be filed by said appraiser with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. But if said owner shall neglect or refuse to give said bond, the appraiser shall issue to the marshal aforesaid an order to sell the same. And the said marshal shall thereupon advertise and sell the said property, at public auction, in the same manner as goods may be sold on final execution in said district. And the proceeds of the sale, after deducting the reasonable costs of the seizure and sale, shall be paid to the court aforesaid, to abide its final order, decree, or judgment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the word "to" before "be" in line fourteen of section three.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be made without a vote, being a mere verbal one.

The next amendment was to strike out the letter "s" at the end of the word "provides" in line thirty-three of section three.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That verbal amendment will be made.

The next amendment was to add to section three the words, "or which provide for an allowance or drawback on cordials and other liquors when exported;" so as to make the latter clause of the section read as follows:

But no provision of this act shall be construed to repeal existing laws which provide that distilled spirits may be removed from the place of manufacture or bonded warehouse for the purpose of being redistilled for exportation, or which provide for the manufacture for exportation of medicines, preparations, compositions, perfumery, and cosmetics, or which provide for an allowance or drawback on cordials and other liquors when exported.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following provisos at the end of the fourth section:

Provided, That on all cotton on which the duty of a half cent has been paid, the additional duty of one and a half cent shall be levied and collected: And provided further, That all provisions of law, whereby cotton in the hands of manufacturers of cotton fabrics on October 1, 1862, and prior thereto, is exempted from taxation, are hereby repealed, and the same shall be subject to the rate of taxation imposed by this bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines seven, eight, nine, and ten of section five, to strike out the words in reference to a permit to remove cotton on which the tax has been paid, "which shall be dated and contain a description, including the weight and other marks of the bales or packages, and a statement of the fact that the duty has been paid," and in lieu of them to insert:

Stating therein the amount and payment of the duty, the time and place of payment, the weight and marks upon the bales and packages, so that the same may be fully identified.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line six of section seven, after the word "countries," to insert "previous to the 1st day of July next;" so as to make the section read:

That from and after the passage of this act, in addition to the duties heretofore imposed by law, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on spirits distilled from grain or other materials, whether of American or foreign production, imported from foreign countries previous to the 1st day of July next, of first proof, a duty of forty cents on each and every gallon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "gallon," in line seven of section seven, to insert:

And on all such spirits imported from foreign countries, on and after the 1st day of July next and previous to the 1st day of January next, a duty of fifty cents on each and every gallon; and on all such spirits imported from foreign countries on and after the 1st day of January next, sixty cents on each and every gallon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following clause at the end of section seven:

And that upon all such spirits imported prior to the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid an additional tax of forty cents per gallon, to be collected under the direction and according to regulations established by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the ninth section of the bill, in the following words:

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the assessors and assistant assessors appointed as provided in the act to which this act is an amendment, to assess the additional duties levied by this act upon all spirits and cotton on which the duty prescribed in said act shall have been paid or assessed at the time when this act takes effect; and the lists thereof shall be returned to the several collectors and the collections made in the same manner as in the case of monthly returns of manufacturers. And the duties so assessed shall be a lien in favor of the United States upon all the real and personal estate of the owner of such spirits or cotton, to be enforced in the same manner as is provided in the case of the manufacturers who neglect or refuse to pay the duties provided by the act to which this is in addition: Provided, That the additional duty of one and one half cent per pound shall be levied upon cotton sold by the United States previous to the passage of this act, and on which a duty of one half of one cent per pound has been paid; and upon all cotton so sold on which no duty has been paid, a duty of two cents per pound shall be assessed and collected.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as an additional section:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the act entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports," approved March 2, 1853, now in force, shall be taken and deemed as extending to and embracing all laws for the collection of internal duties, stamp duties, licenses, or taxes which have been or may be hereafter enacted; and all persons duly authorized to assess, receive, or collect such duties or taxes under such laws are hereby declared to be, and to have been, "revenue officers" within the true intent and meaning of the said act, and entitled to all the exemptions, immunities, benefits, rights, and privileges therein enumerated and conferred.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I offer the following amendment: in lines thirteen and fourteen of section seven, to strike out "and no lower rate of duty shall be levied or collected than upon the basis of first proof, and shall be increased in proportion for any greater strength than the strength of first proof;" and to insert in lieu thereof, "and the said duty shall be levied and collected at no lower rate than the basis of first proof." The words proposed to be changed are somewhat obscure, and the amendment is intended to substitute for them a similar provision to be found on the second page of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. How shall the question be taken on the amendments agreed to as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In relation to that amendment which has reference to the tax on the liquors already on hand that have been distilled, I desire that there shall be a separate vote.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The vote was 30 to 8 in committee.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not know that it is of any use to have a separate vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be reserved if the Senator desires.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is true that the vote of the Senate seems to have determined that the amount of tax which is proposed by the House of Representatives—sixty cents a gallon—should not be imposed upon the liquors on hand. I did not know but that if the matter was called to the attention of the Senate particularly, perhaps they would agree to a tax of at least twenty or thirty cents a gallon upon the liquor on hand; and it was with a view to that that I desired to take the sense of the Senate, and therefore I ask for a separate vote upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be excepted.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask that the amendments to the first section of the bill be reserved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does any Senator desire a separate vote on any other amendment?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Upon the amendments to the first section of the bill which bear on that question I ask for a separate vote.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Only the one striking out the proviso in regard to the liquors on hand is what is reserved.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to inquire before that matter is determined, whether if a separate vote is to be taken upon that amendment it allows the proviso as it stands to be amended before the vote is taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire a separate vote on that.

Mr. POWELL. I desire a separate vote on the amendment to the first section of the bill from lines twelve to seventeen, increasing the tax to seventy and then to eighty cents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be reserved. Does any Senator desire a separate vote on any other amendment? If not, a vote will be taken together on the other amendments.

The remaining amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first amendment on which a separate vote is desired will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

In section one, line eleven, after the word "gallon" insert:

And upon all liquors that may be distilled after the passage of this act, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, on and after the 1st day of July next, and previous to the 1st day of January next, seventy cents on each and every gallon; and on all liquors that may be distilled after the passage of this act, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, on and after the 1st day of January next, eighty cents on each and every gallon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in this proposition.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask if there is anything contained in that branch of the section which would prevent the full effect of the amendment which I wish to make in the last proviso to the section, and that is that twenty cents additional tax shall be levied upon the liquors on hand.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This amendment has reference to the liquors to be distilled hereafter, after the passage of the bill.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next reserved amendment was the amendment striking out the following proviso to the first section:

Provided further, That all spirits on hand for sale, whether distilled prior to the date of this act or not, shall be subject to the rates of duty provided by this act from and after the 12th day of January, 1864; except that spirits which have been already taxed under the law approved July 1, 1862, shall not bear more than the additional or increased tax provided for by this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in this amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to amend that proviso so as to make it read:

Shall be subject to a rate of duty of twenty cents per gallon in addition to that imposed by the law of July 1, 1862.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will hardly accomplish his purpose by that. There are two classes of liquors affected by the proviso as it stands in the House bill: one class which has paid no duty at all, and another which has paid a duty of twenty cents a gallon; and the proviso is that the same rate of duty on that which has paid no tax shall be imposed as is imposed by this bill, and upon that which has already paid twenty cents, only enough to make it equal.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Perhaps I can accomplish my purpose by proposing to strike out the word "the" after the word "than," in the fortieth line, and inserting "twenty cents per gallon," and striking out the words "provided for by this act," in the forty-first line; so as to read:

Except that spirits which have been already taxed under the law approved July 1, 1862, shall not bear more than twenty cents per gallon additional or increased tax.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let me make another suggestion to the Senator. He will see that we have altered the previous provision by making a grade of duties. This proviso was drawn before that was so altered:

That all spirits on hand for sale, whether distilled prior to the date of this act or not, shall be subject to the rates of duty provided by this act from and after the 12th day of January, 1864.

Is it to be subject to all of them, to the sixty cent tax, the seventy cent tax, and the eighty cent tax, or which of them?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have not myself examined very critically the whole language of this section, I confess. This bill is being passed very rapidly through the Senate. My purpose is—

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me, I desire to suggest an amendment which perhaps will accomplish his purpose. It is to change the proviso so as to read as follows:

Provided further, That all spirits on hand for sale, whether distilled prior to the date of this act or not, shall be subject to a tax of twenty cents on each and every gallon from and after the 12th day of January, 1864, in addition to the tax already imposed under the law approved July 1, 1862.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That would cover it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then it puts a tax of twenty cents—

Mr. TRUMBULL. On that on hand.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On that on hand which was made before the passage of the first act, and forty cents on that which was made after.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Oh, no.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly. There may be an amount on hand which has paid no tax at all, and another amount on hand which has already paid twenty cents.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Twenty cents in addition to the tax imposed by the old law.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But twenty cents in addition to the tax imposed by that law—

Mr. TRUMBULL. Would make forty cents on all of it, would it not? Twenty cents was imposed by the prior law. Now if you put on twenty cents more it makes forty.

Mr. COWAN. But there is whisky that was not taxed by the prior bill, and to that the Senator from Maine alludes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But it is subject to pay, is it not?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not at all, because it was manufactured before the first law was passed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It may be that it would require a little more time in order to draw a proviso so as to put it precisely in proper shape to reach the liquor which is on hand; but the point at which I aim is to impose a tax upon the liquor on hand, which has been purchased undoubtedly with a view to the rise which would be the result of the tax about to be laid by Congress upon that article.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let me suggest that the bill may be laid aside for a few moments till the Senator can draw his proviso.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Let it go over until tomorrow.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No; I want to finish the bill to-day.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Wisconsin will allow me to suggest to him that he will find it extremely difficult to frame any amendment to this bill without a careful study of the whole subject-matter. I may state that I myself have been in favor of a moderate tax upon the spirits on hand, and a graduated tax on those to be manufactured in the future; but it is impossible to frame an amendment to this bill to carry out that idea without applying your amendment to three or four different sections of the bill. For instance, if the Senator should propose a tax upon the spirits on hand he must propose a corresponding tax on the imported liquors now in this country that have already paid a duty at the custom-house. That duty is imposed in another section of the bill which has been amended by the Senate. It will be necessary to change this bill in many important particulars, in several sections, to carry out the Senator's idea. I state to him the difficulty in the way of doing that now. If the bill is changed, if the Senate should agree to tax the liquor on hand, it would be much wiser to recommit the bill with instructions. It is impossible now in the Senate Chamber to frame the necessary amendments in carefully selected language.

I did not intend to say a word on this bill; I intended to follow the committee, and let the matter go over for future consideration upon the disagreement between the two Houses. If the House of Representatives shall insist on its proposition to tax spirits on hand, the question will again come before us in some form, and we can then propose a modified tax on the spirits on hand, if the Senate shall think it advisable. I think it would be much wiser for us to agree to the report of the Committee on Finance, and let the subject be disposed of in that way.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am not precisely prepared to allow this thing to go by default. It is true the sense of the Senate was expressed on the vote which was taken on this subject, and expressed pretty decidedly against standing on the bill as it came from the House of Representatives in this respect; but upon the question whether there should or should not be some portion of this tax put upon the liquor which is in the hands of speculators who purchased it in view of this very legislation, the Senate has not expressed its opinion. It seems to me that it would be just that some additional duty should be laid upon them. I do not care in what shape the thing is placed, whether in the shape of a motion to recommit with instructions, or a test vote on some proposition now before the Senate.

Mr. COWAN. Make your proposition in the shape of a motion to recommit.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will at the suggestion of my friend from Ohio and other Senators move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Finance, with instructions to so amend it as to provide for an additional tax of twenty cents per gallon on the liquors on hand in addition to what has already been imposed; and on that point I desire to submit a single remark to the Senate; I shall detain them but a moment. I have received a communication from a firm who I believe are the greatest distillers in the State of Wisconsin, in which they say:

"DEAR SIR: We take the liberty of addressing you on the matter of taxing distilled spirits, as the action of Congress will affect us materially. We are distillers using three hundred bushels of grain per day, and under the present law taxing spirits twenty cents per gallon we pay about two hundred and ten dollars per day.

"If under the new law now before Congress spirits on hand are not taxed, we must stop our works whenever the law goes into operation, as we shall not be able to compete with speculators who have large quantities on hand in anticipation of the increased tax.

"We are feeding about two hundred and fifty head of cattle which will not be fit for market till May next, and if we stop our works we must sell our cattle, half fattened as they are, at great loss; and if a prospective tax is laid upon all spirits manufactured after some future day, say May 1, 1864, then those who have large stocks on hand will suffer no loss.

"We think it unfair for Congress to ruin us by altering the law. The law can be changed and we left unharmed, and by the same means the revenue enhanced. If the distillers are ruined we cannot pay any more revenue, and the speculators who have the spirits stored make the profit instead of the Government."

This is a letter from gentlemen interested in this legislation, and it must go for what it is worth. It is their decided opinion, they being distillers running their distilleries, purchasing corn, making it into whisky, and selling it, and then putting the proceeds back again into the purchase of grain for manufacture again into whisky, that if the law goes into effect as it now stands before the Senate, the distillers themselves will be broken down in competition with the speculators who have large stocks of liquor on hand. I do not profess to understand this question very well. There may be, perhaps, insuperable objections to this view, but I am not quite satisfied to allow the matter to go by default without an effort at least to put something of a tax upon the liquor on hand, and therefore I make the motion as a test question of the sense of the Senate whether there shall be a tax put upon the liquor on hand.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think I can explain this matter very readily. We had a whole room-full of distillers before us from all sections of the country, and they were unanimous in the opinion that if we put the proposed tax upon the liquor on hand it would ruin them. These gentlemen write that if you do not put it on, it will ruin them. Now, what is the explanation? It is a very simple one.

A large portion of the distillers through the Northwest, in contemplation of this action of Congress, and especially the proposition to tax liquors on hand, have for the time broken down in their credit. Nobody will lend them anything. The banks will not lend to them; the commission merchants in New York will not advance to them; and they are, as they say, and as I can readily suppose, in a very uncomfortable situation about it. If they have to pay such an enormous increased tax, the inference drawn by moneyed men is that it must stop their works. But the distillers as a general rule have a considerable quantity on hand themselves that they have not been able to send forward during the winter, and they say that if you put the tax on what may be made hereafter and leave them the profits to be made on what they have on hand and on what they may make before the bill shall pass, they can get through, because that will bring up their credit.

There are, however, some few distillers in the country—and this firm in Wisconsin may be in that condition—who have disposed of all their whisky at a high profit, have got rid of it, and have none on hand. The way they will be ruined will be that in case we put a tax on the liquor on hand they will not have a dollar to pay while everybody else will, and they can undersell the market! That is the simple secret of it, because there is no way in which you can talk of their being ruined by a duty on the liquor on hand if they have not got any! How is it going to hurt them? They say because the speculators have got so much; but there are very few speculators who can sell it at any less price, and all those who have liquor to sell derive an advantage from it. That is the simple fact. Some few in the country have been fortunate enough, if it may be considered fortunate, to dispose of all they had and make their profit. Now, if you will just put the tax on all that is on hand it will not touch that which they have sent to market and disposed of, and leaving them to manufacture anew they can sell at a much less price than those who are now in the market. That is the explanation of it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think I can explain to the Senator from Maine how persons could be injured by putting this tax exclusively upon the whisky produced hereafter. There are in my State large manufactories of whisky, and to tax the whisky on hand the same amount that you do that which may be hereafter produced would operate very injuriously upon them. They live at a considerable distance from the market, and they necessarily have on hand a quantity of whisky, whether they have been manufacturing more than ordinarily or not in consequence of the expectation that an increased tax would be laid upon whisky. It takes some thirty, forty, fifty, or sixty days at this season of the year to transport their whisky from the place where it is manufactured to the markets of the East. They have, therefore, a large amount on hand; and if you tax that whisky forty cents a gallon you break them up; they cannot pay the tax; and hence I voted against placing the same tax upon whisky on hand as upon that which should be manufactured hereafter. I thought the operation of it would be unjust and unequal, although I was aware that persons have been speculating out of what they supposed might be the legislation of the country, and I was aware that the manufacturers of whisky had been running their manufactories to the greatest extent, in order to have on hand a large amount which should supply the market for a long time, and upon which they would not have to pay this additional duty. But still I can see, and I think I can explain to the Senator from Maine, how not laying any tax at all upon the whisky on hand is to operate against the manufacturers in some instances.

The manufacture of whisky is not carried on by itself. All the manufacturers of whisky feed large numbers of cattle and hogs. That is a part of the business carried on by them. They have got these cattle and hogs on hand. Now, what will be the result if you levy a tax on the future production of whisky of sixty cents a gallon and no tax on that which is now on hand, which I understand is a very large quantity? The Senator from Maine knows much better than I do how long it will supply the country, but I have been told it would supply the country for six months, and some say even longer than that. The manufacturer cannot enter into competition with those persons who have the whisky on hand, and pay sixty cents a gallon tax on it when they have paid only twenty.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will it help him any if you make him pay twenty cents on what he has got on hand himself?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Suppose he has none on hand, or if he has but a small quantity on hand, I submit to the Senator that by putting a tax upon that on hand, and making it equal with the other, he may be able to continue the running of his manufactory and go on with his business. Now, is it just to allow those persons who had more capital, the large distillers, if you please, who have been able to accumulate a large stock, and to anticipate what they supposed might be the legislation of the country, to supply the country for months and months without paying any tax at all, or only the twenty cents which they have paid, and require a man who has sold his whisky as he manufactured it to pay sixty cents on all that shall be manufactured hereafter? I know the Senator asks, will it help him to have others pay? Suppose I were to reply to that in this way: if you do not raise the tax on whisky at all what would be the condition of these whisky dealers who are complaining? They say they will be ruined. They come here and they say they will all be ruined if you impose this tax upon the whisky on hand. What would be their condition if you did not tax the future production of whisky at all? They would be exactly in the same condition that they would be in if you put the sixty cents on all of them. It is precisely the same thing. They would be ruined then. The amount of it is that they want you to tax (and that is why they are so willing to have a heavy tax put on hereafter) the future production of whisky, and they would be glad to have you tax it one dollar or five dollars a gallon. That is the reason they are ready to have a very high tax put upon the future manufacture of the article, because they have got a quantity on hand that is to make their fortune. But if you are not to raise the tax at all these men tell you they will be ruined. They may not say that, but the Senate will see the effect upon them would be precisely the same as it is if you put the additional tax of forty cents on, because then they would all stand on the same footing, all paying sixty cents a gallon, or now, as the law stands, all paying twenty cents a gallon. The only difference possible would be that it would require perhaps more capital. Having to pay an additional tax, it would require some increased capital; but it is only in that respect that I can see that their condition would be any different from what it would be if you leave them precisely where they were.

I think the fair way of doing this is to adopt the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin. I think the men who have undertaken to speculate in whisky and take advantage of the anticipated legislation of the country will make money enough if they are required to pay twenty cents additional tax, that is forty cents on the gallon altogether, and let those who manufacture whisky hereafter pay sixty cents. I think that would be as near doing justice as we can get at it. I would not tax the whisky on hand to the same extent that I would that manufactured hereafter; but I am willing to divide it and impose a tax of twenty cents upon the whisky which has already paid twenty, forty cents upon that which has paid nothing, and sixty cents, seventy cents, and eighty cents, according to the grades provided by the bill, on that which shall be manufactured hereafter.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not think there is any soundness in the argument which has been submitted by gentlemen in favor of a tax upon liquor on hand. The bill as introduced by the Committee on Finance proposes to tax all liquors distilled after the passage of the act according to certain rates. Under it the distillers can come in competition with those who now hold whisky, and can prevent them from making that vast amount of money which I anticipate they may make.

There is another reason why a duty should not be laid upon liquor on hand. Every interest in the country wants stable legislation. It is destructive to business when you have put one tax on an article to put an additional tax on the same article. It unsettles trade and is a ruinous operation. Now, I shall not say here that these speculators will not make a great deal of money in this case. Why, sir, they will make money out of any legislation that we may have which changes in any particular what we have done heretofore. For these reasons I have supported and intend to sustain the report made by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In moving to recommit this bill with instructions, I did not intend to make the instructions so definite as to raise any particular question upon the exact amount of tax to be levied. I want the principle, and it is upon that that I ask for the sense of the Senate; and I will therefore modify my motion as to the instructions, by instructing the committee to report a bill which shall levy a duty upon liquors on hand, not specifying the particular amount of duty.

Mr. POWELL. I cannot concur in the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin. I am very confident that the distillers in this country do not desire a tax to be imposed upon the whisky on hand. I do not think it is wise or politic to tax the whisky on hand, and I am not sure that it would not be an act of bad faith on the part of the Government if it were to do so. By our legislation heretofore we have imposed what was regarded as a very heavy tax on whisky. Persons throughout the country engaged in that branch of business have conducted their operations with a view to the existing law. They have paid the tax upon the larger portion of the whisky on hand; and I ask is it just, is it proper, is it keeping faith with these people to make them pay another tax upon that article upon which they have already paid the tax imposed by law? It would be just as proper to cause each and every individual in the community to pay an additional tax upon his income as to pay an additional tax upon whisky. Under the law I suppose that every gentleman in this Chamber has been called upon by the assessors in his region of country and has paid his income tax to the collector. Should we not think it bad faith if by any law now proposed we were to be reassessed and made to pay an additional tax upon that income?

But the honorable Senator from Wisconsin has read a letter from a distiller who says it will ruin his business if this tax is not imposed upon the whisky on hand but is simply imposed upon that hereafter to be made. I have had very large intercourse and correspondence with gentlemen engaged in the manufacture of whisky. My own State is very largely interested in it, and the States immediately adjoining, Indiana, Illinois, and Ohio, are very largely interested in this matter of the manufacture of whisky. I have within the last week seen some dozen or more gentlemen engaged in the business, and all the distillers with whom I have talked and with whom I have corresponded say to me that if whisky is taxed, "let that which is to be made in the future be taxed, let us know what we are about, and do not tax that which is on hand."

I held a conversation with three very intelligent gentlemen from the State of Illinois, engaged in this business, who called at my lodgings the day before yesterday. They are men of sense, men of much practical experience, who have been evidently thrifty in their business. They told me by all means resist the tax upon whisky on hand, for they said, "if you lay a tax upon that on hand you will ruin us; we shall have to stop our business;" and they assigned to me what were very conclusive reasons for their opinion. They said that in consequence of their distance from market they have a large quantity of whisky in transitu, they have a great deal on hand, and if this increased tax is imposed upon that it will destroy the profit they would otherwise make upon it; and the profit they make upon that, surrounded as they are, is the only thing that will save them from bankruptcy and from ruin. They told me that they had laid in large quantities of grain at very high figures; that the contemplated action of Congress, and the passage of this bill in the other House, had reduced the price of corn some fifteen or twenty cents a bushel in the West, and consequently they had paid twenty cents a bushel more for their corn than they could now get it for; and in consequence of having to pay such high prices for the stocks of grain they have on hand, which they are to work up, the passage of this bill would be very onerous upon them. There is scarcely a distiller in the West engaged largely in this business who has not more or less whisky on hand in his still-house and in transitu. If you do not impose a tax upon that they will derive a profit from that whisky on which the Government has already laid a tax, and on which in most instances it has collected the tax. I do not think that we should strike down these persons.

I venture to say that the case of the distiller who wrote to the Senator from Wisconsin is an exceptional case. I know that I have received no such correspondence, and I know that a large number of distillers have called upon me, knowing that my State was interested in this matter, and they say to me precisely what the Senator from Maine, the chairman of the committee, says they said to him in his committee room. In fact some of the gentlemen that have conversed with me told me they had already been before that committee.

This is an interest of very great magnitude in the western country. It will affect these people there more seriously than any other. In a word, it will affect the great corn-growing States; it will affect the State of Ohio, the State of Indiana, the State of Illinois, the State of Kentucky, and the State of Missouri more than any other States in the Union. The very fact of Congress indicating an intention to make them pay such a heavy tax on whisky has already, so these gentlemen from Illinois told me, thrown down the price of corn about twenty cents on the bushel. So you not only strike the whisky-maker but you strike every small farmer who raises a bushel of corn to sell, and I am very happy to say that in the matter of raising that cereal there are very few people in the States I have mentioned that have not more than one bushel of corn to sell. They produced heavily of that article for sale.

So far, then, as the report of the committee indicates a desire not to tax the whisky on hand, I heartily and fully concur with them. I have no doubt that they have acted wisely, circumspectly, and prudently in that matter. It is the only thing that will save the distiller. Take one of those heavy establishments now that has a good deal of whisky on hand, lay this additional tax upon it, and require them to work up their very large stocks of grain, when that grain, they having purchased it some time back, was worth twenty cents a bushel more than it is now, and all the stock in their pens will have to be turned out unfattened. That will be the result, and it will work very serious injury to the great grain-growing interests of the country. The growers of rye, the growers of corn, and of every other grain that is distilled into whisky will be the sufferers. I hope the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin will not prevail, and that the Senate will adhere to the position of the Committee on Finance on this question.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, to recommit this bill now with instructions to levy a tax upon liquors on hand is to change totally and entirely the principle which is involved in the original law to which this is an amendment, as well as the amendment itself.

There are two kinds of taxation. The first is taxation upon property already in possession, in enjoyment. I suppose there is no principle better settled than that if a Government resorts to that kind of taxation the taxation must be equal; it must be uniform; and it must be upon the property of all citizens. When did a Government single out a certain class of its citizens and tax their property while the property of other citizens was exempt? Let us suppose, for instance, that one man has a thousand barrels of whisky and another man has a thousand barrels of flour; both in possession; both bought and paid for; both being to them the same as any other property. The Government proposes to tax the man owning the whisky $5,000 if you please, or in this case it would be a great deal more, almost asking him to pay for it over again. Has he not a right to inquire, "Did you tax my neighbor's flour?" "Oh, no." "Why?" "Because yours is whisky." "Well," he replies, "suppose it is. Is it not a lawful article of commerce? Is there anything to forbid me from buying it and selling it? If there is I should like to know it. Otherwise, I should like to know why I am singled out to bear the burdens of the Government and my neighbor to escape them."

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator will allow me—

Mr. COWAN. One moment, if the Senator pleases. I shall be through directly.

The principle involved in this bill is a different one. It is what has been called in the books indirect taxation; that is, it proposes to tax nothing that anybody has now on hand, but something they are going to get hereafter; and therefore they have the option, if they do not want to pay the tax they need not get the article. We propose to tax liquor which is hereafter to be made. The man who does not like to pay the tax need not make whisky. As it is admitted pretty generally that the tax falls on the consumer, if the consumer does not like to pay the tax he need not drink the whisky. That is the principle which pervades this bill all through, I think, with perhaps a single exception in the article of cotton. The cotton on hand is taxed, and I think improperly. However, I have no quarrel to make about that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That has been stricken out.

Mr. COWAN. I have no quarrel to make upon that.

Mr. President, in my opinion, to levy a tax upon the whisky on hand in this country would be totally impracticable, utterly impossible. It would require you to quadruple the number of your officers, and it would require you to make domiciliary visits into a thousand houses where you only enter one now; and let me say further, into a thousand of the most dangerous houses in the country for the peace of the country. Is the United States officer to visit the grog-shop where there is a barrel upon the tap and say to the owner, "You must pay for this over again?" The owner may say, "I cannot; it is all the capital I have. Everything I have in the world is in that barrel, and out of that barrel I expect to make my living." Are you to go to the cross-roads in the same way? Are you to follow this commodity everywhere wherever it is to be found for sale, even in the smallest quantities? because that is what is contemplated if this bill should be recommended.

I think the Senate is not prepared to do that. I do not think the country is prepared to do it. Certainly the dominant party in the country ought not to be prepared to do it, because its effect in a political point of view cannot now be estimated; and I am not so very certain that it was not introduced in the first place in the other House with a view to that effect.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand the honorable member from Wisconsin to desire the vote to be taken on the proposition he submits to be a test vote. I propose, therefore, very briefly to state why it is that I shall vote against the instructions which he proposes.

I am in favor of the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance as far as this particular question is concerned; and in what I am about to say I shall not stop to inquire (because in the view in which it presents itself to my mind I deem it immaterial) what effect upon individual interest the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance will have. My vote is governed entirely by what I believe to be a sound principle. I do not question the constitutional power to levy this tax; I mean to levy a tax on the quantity on hand. My objection is founded entirely on what I believe to be a principle of sound and enlightened policy; and so thinking, my impression is that every departure from it must be more or less dangerous.

The original tax itself, as has been stated by the honorable member from Pennsylvania, is an excise. It is not a tax upon anything on hand. It is a tax upon what is hereafter to be manufactured. It is therefore in the nature of a license which Congress have provided shall be paid for by him who thinks proper to manufacture whisky. You have levied, therefore, in your antecedent legislation a tax of twenty cents upon the gallon, not upon the whisky that was on hand at the time you levied the tax, but upon the whisky that should thereafter be manufactured. In other words, you say to the distiller or whoever thinks proper to engage in distilling, "You are at liberty to distill and to sell what you distill if you will pay to us twenty cents upon each gallon you make and sell." You do not tax him for the making. In order to render your tax effectual you require that there shall be a sale as well as a manufacture. You tell him, therefore, that if he makes and sells he shall pay, not for the privilege of making, but for the privilege of selling, twenty cents.

Now, it will readily be perceived, as I think, unless I am very grossly mistaken, that this is holding out an inducement to every one in the country who thinks proper to embark in that particular enterprise to engage in it. He engages in it, therefore, on the faith of that promise, that if he does make and does sell, he shall be at liberty to sell if he will pay you twenty cents. He makes all his arrangements accordingly. He abandons any antecedent business in which he may have been engaged and engages in this, supposing that it will be more advantageous to him. He enters into all the engagements which are necessary to enable him to carry on advantageously this new business in which, at your instance, he is about to embark. He buys property; he borrows money. He makes, in a word, all his business transactions to suit the business in which he is about to engage; and now you say that after he has thus manufactured in this business his million gallons of whisky, having done it upon your faith that he should be at liberty to sell it, for twenty cents per gallon, he shall not be at liberty to sell unless he pays you forty cents.

I think everybody will see that so far as such a tax will operate on the quantity in the hands of the original distiller it will be clearly unfair. It might be ruinous to him. You imagine, and perhaps it is true as far as the particular article is concerned, that he might be able to bear the additional twenty cents or sixty cents and still make a profit; but he might not be able to bear it. Nobody can tell whether he will be able to bear it. But whether he is able to bear it or not is not, in my judgment, a fit inquiry. If he can make a large profit out of the material which he has manufactured upon the faith of your promise he is entitled to it. He has a right to say, "I would not have engaged in the manufacture at all but for you. I saw that I would be able, or thought I would be able to make a successful matter of it upon paying you twenty cents; and now, when I have run the risk, for there is always more or less risk, of changing my business and embarking largely in this new business, you come in and say I must pay you forty cents more." As far as my reading has gone (and upon this particular question it has been by no means extensive) I do not think I can be mistaken when I say, as was said by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, that there is no instance in England in which an additional excise has been levied upon an article manufactured under an antecedent excise, and for the reason the chairman stated; and to which I have just briefly referred.

Now, it may be that these dealers into whose hands large amounts of this whisky have come, subject only to a tax of twenty cents, may make a very large profit. As I have said, they have a right to have a large profit. The United States are not the losers. It does not escape taxation, but it escapes the taxation of an additional excise. It goes into the property of the distiller, if he has on hand what he has manufactured, or it goes into the mass of the property of him who has purchased from the distiller, and is liable to general taxation. You may get at him by your income tax. Every other tax he pays except this additional tax, and he disputes not the constitutional right, but your right in principle to mulct him with an additional tax, not for manufacturing more whisky, but for the privilege of selling what he has already manufactured and paid for.

Mr. President, a case not exactly analogous except perhaps in principle has been decided by the Supreme Court. You levy a duty upon imports. The State of Maryland undertook to provide that no man should be at liberty to sell the original package in which the goods were imported without taking out a license. The importers contested the constitutionality of that act, and the Supreme Court sanctioned their objection. Upon what ground? Upon this ground: that that tax of itself was a tax which authorized the importer to dispose of the article, and over it the State had no control at all; and the principle necessarily, as I think, goes to the extent of denying to Congress the authority to increase any imposts upon that which has come in under an existing impost. That would be a violation of what is a contract as between the Government and the importer. The Government says to the importer, "Import your dry goods, or your brandies, or your wines in tierces, or in hogsheads, or in barrels, and upon your paying so much to the Government you shall be at liberty to sell them." The State steps in and says, "Over all transactions within the State, all contracts within the State, all sales made within the State, you are subject to our jurisdiction, and we say that you shall not sell them unless you will pay to us a license fee for selling; or, looking to the act of Congress alone, you are authorized to sell as against the Government upon paying the amount levied by the act of Congress." The Supreme Court said, No; the Government has the exclusive control over imposts, and the Government therefore has a right in levying its imposts to say to the importer, "If you will pay the amount charged as imposts you shall sell not only as against us, but as against every State in the Union, what you have thus imported."

What difference in principle between that case and the case before us can there be? You have told these distillers, Distill your whisky and pay us twenty cents and you may sell it. The Government says to the importer, Import your goods in the original package, or in the tierce, or in the barrel, and you shall sell it. If in the last case it became in the nature of a contract between the importer and the Government, over which the States had no control, why is it that in this case it is not quasi a contract between the United States and the distiller who has manufactured the article, that if he pays the twenty cents required to authorize him to sell he shall not be required to pay any other tax upon that article for that purpose?

The principle may be illustrated by imagining other things. Suppose the enterprising shoemakers of Massachusetts were told by an act passed last year, as they were, "You may manufacture boots and shoes and you may sell them if you will pay us so much a pair."

Mr. COLLAMER. Three per cent.

Mr. JOHNSON. Three per cent. Would it not be obviously unjust to say to them or those of them that now have large amounts of stock on hand, or to those who have purchased from them,

"You shall not sell them unless you pay six per cent. or twelve per cent. or any other amount we think proper to impose?" because, as the Senate will see, if you have the right to increase this tax to twenty cents or forty cents you have the right to increase it to any amount. The result will be, as I think, that the mercantile public, the trading public, in whose success the interest of the United States is so intimately connected, will never be able to know where they are, whether they are safe or not in engaging in any enterprise; because if it is to be subject to your right by legislation to interfere with its beneficial employment you may interfere to the extent of ruining them. Every man, therefore, will say to himself, It is better that I should cease altogether to rely upon your legislation than to engage in business on the faith of that legislation.

Mr. President, it is for these reasons, therefore, entirely, and without inquiring whether in the particular condition of the country the adoption of the amendment proposed by the committee or its rejection will benefit or injure any particular class of citizens for the time, that I cannot agree to the proposition made by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. GRIMES. The friends of the report of the Committee on Finance have finally taken refuge where I had no doubt they would when this discussion began, behind some constitutional objections which they think stand in the way. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] insisted upon it that this is class legislation that is proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin; and he wanted to know whether or not it was possible that any gentleman believed it to be constitutional to select out a particular class of citizens and impose a tax upon them. Who but the Senator from Pennsylvania could have imagined that there was any class legislation here? We do not select any class of individuals. That is not the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin; but it is to tax a species of property which we all admit it is competent for Congress to tax under certain circumstances. That property may be in the hands of different classes of individuals.

The Senator said also it would be exceedingly improper for Congress to tax this species of property unless it taxed all other kinds of property equally. Why, sir, is that the case? Are we not in the habit of taxing some particular species of property and not taxing others? Do we not require some kinds of manufacturers to pay a tax and not require it of others? Is not this also the case in the States? Do they not in some States tax some kinds of real estate and exempt others? In my State we exempt sheep from taxation, because we desire to encourage the production of sheep. No doubt they may exempt other kinds of property in other States. But here is a kind of property that we regard as a luxury, and there are some of us who propose to tax it much heavier than we are in the habit of taxing other kinds of property; and the committee's own report is based upon the very principle contained in the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

A good deal has been said here about distillers appearing before the Committee on Finance, and making representations also to individual members of the Senate. It should be borne in mind that there are two classes of distillers. There is one class of distillers who unite in themselves two characters, distillers and speculators; and there is another class who are purely distillers. The latter class have not been before Congress. The gentlemen who are speculators as well as distillers very likely have been. But let me inform the Senate what has been my information on this subject from a State that is one of the corn-producing States, and has a great many distillers. I have never yet received the first communication from any man who was at all connected with the whisky trade who has expressed the slightest indisposition to the imposition of some tax on the amount of whisky on hand, but I have received divers and sundry letters from distillers who were in favor of it.

Mr. President, I suppose the real purpose we should seek to attain is the interest of the Government; what will pay the largest amount of taxation with the least amount of injury to the business of the country. I think the chairman of the Committee on Finance in his statement to us yesterday did not tell us how much he supposed would be derived from the tax on whisky during the next six months if his ideas and the ideas of the committee were carried out on this subject. If he did, I wish he would repeat the statement.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not. Of course I did not know. The Senator will recollect, however, that all the whisky on hand except that manufactured before the passage of the act pays twenty cents. How much there is of it I do not know.

Mr. GRIMES. I understand from those who profess to be pretty thoroughly acquainted with the subject, and who are not at all interested, although the distillers and the speculators in liquors about here will tell a different story doubtless, that there is a vast amount of this article on hand; that in anticipation of the imposition of this tax by Congress all the distilleries have been run to their highest possible capacity, and that there is hardly a vacant storeroom in Cincinnati, or St. Louis, or Chicago, or in any of the smaller classes of towns throughout the Northwest that is not chock-full of whisky, most of it having passed actually out of the hands of the distillers and now being held by speculators. If that be so and we do not put any tax at all upon the amount already distilled I suppose we shall be in about the condition we were in when we passed our last tax upon whisky. I recollect that the results did not correspond with the statement that had been furnished to the Committee on Finance by the Treasury Department by several millions; I do not remember how much.

If we want to get money into the Treasury, if that is what we are about, it seems to me we should impose some tax on the whisky on hand. I do not pretend to say how much it should be. I am willing to trust the Committee on Finance to investigate the subject and report how much they think the interests of the country require it should be taxed; but I think that a tax can be imposed on this article without any violation of the Constitution, with great advantage to the Government, and without the sacrifice of any private interests.

The Senator from Pennsylvania told us that he did not think the dominant party ought to be in favor of this proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin. I am not going to allow my conduct here to be influenced by any such appeals as that; but if I were influenced by any such thing, one of the last votes I would give would be against the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin; for I believe the vast majority of the people will imagine, whatever may be the fact, that we may have possibly been influenced in our votes in behalf of the speculators rather than in behalf of the men who raise the corn and who manufacture it into whisky at home. But, sir, I am not to be affected by any such appeal as that from the Senator from Pennsylvania. I am going to vote for the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin because I believe that the best interests of the Treasury will be conserved by it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator from Kentucky, in speaking of the distillers in his neighborhood, I have no doubt spoke of the situation of distillers who have large quantities of whisky on hand. The statement made by the Senator from Iowa has correctly shown the distinction between distillers who are simply distillers, who purchase the grain and manufacture it into whisky and put it upon the market for sale as a regular business, and those who buy up large quantities of liquor for purposes of speculation. I agree also with the Senator from Kentucky that stability in legislation is necessary so far as it is attainable; but we know very well that stability in our legislation on the subject of taxation during this great war is an impossibility. Our legislation of necessity is unstable. The purpose which it seems to me we should have in view is to make that very instability which the necessities of the times force upon us weigh with as little injustice as possible upon the various interests of the country.

Now, my first proposition is this: that a tax, if it be practicable to be laid, which reaches every gallon of whisky now in existence, is the most just and equal tax that can be imposed upon it; because it raises the price of the article in the hands of the distiller, or in the hands of the purchaser. Whoever has the whisky on hand is benefited by the legislation, so far as the raising of the price of the article on hand is concerned.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Unless he bought it before the price was raised on account of the tax, he is out of pocket.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. How is he injured?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am not speaking about that. You say he is benefited.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. When we undertake to benefit the Government by our legislation, and that is our purpose, we should undertake to benefit the Government with as little injury as possible to the individual. I do not say we are to legislate for the purpose of benefiting either the manufacturer or the holder of the spirits on hand; but we should injure neither if we can but shape our legislation so as to accomplish that purpose.

Now, sir, what are the facts? A very intelligent gentleman conversing with me on this subject estimated the annual consumption of spirits at eighty million gallons. There are now about forty million on hand. There is six months' consumption of the country on hand now in the hands of these distillers and speculators who have manufactured it for the purpose of holding it, or in the hands of those who purchased it for the purpose of holding it for speculation. What is a tax of twenty cents a gallon on four million gallons? It is $8,000,000. You put that into the Treasury substantially if you tax the liquor on hand. If you do not tax the liquor on hand you do not get the $8,000,000. It does not injure the distillers, because the very tax we put on the liquor raises the price of liquor usually more than the amount of the tax. Why, sir, you cannot go into a drug store to buy anything that contains alcohol but they put on it more than three times the amount of the additional tax on any article which they offer for sale.

But my honorable friend from Maryland says that there is a principle involved which would be violated by this kind of legislation. I do not so understand it. I understand that we can put a tax on sales as well as a tax on manufactures, and this bill can be so framed that this additional tax shall be levied on the sales of the whisky which is now on hand. If our legislation in times like these was stable or likely to be stable there would be perhaps great force in an appeal that might be made in behalf of the bona fide purchaser; but, sir, it does not apply with any force here, because it has been known with just as much certainty as anything which has not occurred can be known, that upon this article of liquor an additional tax was to be levied, and these distillers have manufactured and hold up this article on hand for the purpose of defrauding the Government, for it amounts to that. I use it in the sense in which a person may be said to do an act in fraud of the law or in fraud of the Government, as we say of a monopoly; for I have been informed there have been large companies formed to monopolize the liquor on hand. Knowing, as they did, to a moral certainty that this very legislation must take place, that there must be an additional tax laid on liquor, it seems to me they cannot appeal to us that we are inflicting a wrong and an injustice on them when by our legislation we propose to levy an equal tax on all the liquor on hand, which will raise the price of all the liquors in the hands of speculators as well as in the hands of the manufacturers and everybody else, and put them on a footing of equality. If you allow the six months' supply of liquor which is now on hand of forty million gallons to escape from taxation, you will get no revenue to the Government for six months to come, and these men will take the whole of this revenue to themselves.

I do not know any reason why we cannot tax this species of property as well as we can tax horses. I suppose there is no doubt that we might levy a tax on all the horses of the country, whoever owns them at the present time, or that we could levy a tax on the sale of horses. We must make it uniform, apply it to everybody and all sections of the country. So we can put a tax on the sale of liquor, and not violate any constitutional provision, nor, as it seems to me, violate any vested rights or any good faith on our part. We tax carriages. Everybody who has a carriage worth more than two hundred dollars has to pay a certain tax under the laws as they now exist. I do not see the injustice of the imposition of this tax which is expressed by my friend from Maryland. It seems to me to be the fairer way to tax this property in the hands of all alike.

Mr. HOWE. The question which is now under discussion before the Senate is one perhaps that I have had as much difficulty about as any one, arising on this bill. If I could discover any way of collecting a large revenue by taxation without injuring anybody I should certainly adopt that method.

Mr. COLLAMER. And get a patent for it.

Mr. HOWE. If I was the discoverer I certainly should apply for a patent. I have not made any such discovery as yet. It is very certain that whether you do or do not tax the stock of whiskies now in the possession of different parties throughout the United States, you will do somebody an injury and a wrong.

It is assumed here in the argument, as I understand it, that the class who are to be injured by omitting to tax the stock on hand is the distillers. I think that is a mistake. Undoubtedly a portion of the distillers will be injured by that omission; but if we can trust to the distillers themselves, so far as their testimony has been adduced before the committee, we ought to believe that as a class the distillers are going to be injured by imposing the tax upon the stock on hand; for I believe every member of the committee will bear witness to the truth of what I say, that the great bulk of the testimony, the weight of the testimony, so far as it comes from the distillers, is, that they are to be injured. I know very well it is going to be an injury to the individual distiller who has no liquors on hand but proposes to manufacture hereafter, that the purchasers who now hold the liquors he has made in the last six months shall be allowed to sell them in the same markets to which he must apply hereafter without the imposition of this tax, whereas every gallon he manufactures hereafter must go into the same market and compete with them subject to this tax of forty cents additional. It is an injury to that individual.

But there are two or three other considerations that must be taken into account, one of which is that almost every distiller, and every western distiller, must have a quantity of liquor on hand. It takes them about thirty or forty days to send the product of their distilleries from Illinois and Indiana to the eastern markets and dispose of it. They have therefore about thirty or forty days' product necessarily on hand. So far they are interested in having the tax kept off.

But almost every manufacturer in the country is using other capital than his own. Distillers are no exception to this remark. The great bulk of them, if I may judge of the character of their business by what they say of it themselves, are enabled to go on with their business mainly through the facilities furnished them by commission merchants. When they are unable to draw on their commission merchants or their consignees they are unable to go on with their manufactures. Whatever blow you strike, therefore, which cripples the consignees of this article and disables them from furnishing these facilities to the distillers, is a direct injury to the distillers. Take away from them these facilities and they can no longer manufacture. How much this consideration influences the great body of these manufacturers I am unable to say. That it has great weight with them is certainly very evident to every one who has conversed with them. If we were to pass upon this measure with sole reference to the interests of the distillers, unless we have been deceived by their testimony I should be inclined to think that their interests required us to withhold the tax from the stock on hand and not to impose it.

But they are not the only class. What is the influence of this tax upon the commission merchant himself, or upon that class of our community—as legitimate a class as any other, and as much entitled to protection; at all events, as much entitled to be exempt from direct wrong and injury? What do you say of them? They do not own any liquors. They have been receiving liquors from the distillers, and advancing them money. The market in anticipation of this legislation has been steadily advancing, and they have been increasing their advances to the distillers in view of the imposition of this tax. Before there was any talk about the imposition of this tax, and when liquors were worth sixty-five cents in New York, they would perhaps advance sixty cents. When they came up to seventy-five cents they would probably advance seventy cents. Now the commission merchants have large stocks of liquor on their hands on which they have advanced to the distillers a large portion of the tax that you now propose to impose. What do you say? Make them pay over again to the Government? How are they to be reimbursed?

The market to-day is ruled by the fact that you are about to put on this tax, and they have advanced this tax to their consignors. Since this legislation has been talked of whisky has been sold in New York for ninety-five cents. It will not be worth over a dollar or a dollar and five cents when this law has passed. Is it just to make them pay this over again? They may have a remedy against their consignors, but not one in ten of the consignors will be able to meet it.

But there is another class. There is a class of manufacturers, of chemists, and mechanics, who are using these spirits in their business for various chemical and mechanical purposes. They have to buy from week to week, and every one of them has got more or less on hand. They have bought in the market when prices were established by this very legislation that you propose. They bought sixty days ago for sixty-five cents. They have bought within three weeks at ninety-five cents, bought for their business, not to sell but to use.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, the bill proposes to tax only that which is to be sold. "On hand for sale" is the language of the bill.

Mr. HOWE. The proposition is to recommit the bill to the Committee on Finance for the purpose of imposing a tax upon the liquors on hand.

Mr. TRUMBULL. For sale.

Mr. HOWE. No; I do not understand such to be the instructions; and under a provision to impose a tax only on that which is sold as liquor you will find it very difficult practically to distinguish between the liquor which is to be sold as liquor and that which is to be sold for mechanical or other purposes, after it has entered into combination with other articles and has been used for other purposes.

It is, as I said before, very difficult, and I think I may say it is impossible to enact a measure of this kind without injuring somebody. Now what is the benefit to be derived from it? My colleague has assumed that there are now on hand forty million gallons. We have heard a great many estimates on that point. The result to which my own mind has been driven by all these statements is, that I do not know how much liquor there is on hand. That is as near as I can come to the thing. I have no doubt there is a good deal; and I am willing to compromise on that proposition, that there is a good deal of liquor on hand. I am rather incredulous about the quantity coming up quite as high as my colleague states; and I am altogether incredulous as to your being able to realize $8,000,000 by imposing a tax of twenty cents a gallon on that stock provided it does reach forty millions, for the reason that it is an article that may be put out of the reach of the assessor so readily; and for these very reasons that I have stated it seems to me injudicious. It will not be put out of the way by the honest man who is willing to pay taxes rather than smuggle or to lie. It will be put out of the reach of the assessor by the dishonest man who would rather lie or smuggle than pay taxes; and we know remarkably well that there are men of that class in all communities.

What is to be the result of this? The legislature decrees a specific tax upon a specific article of property, irrespective of the locality where it is, the market in which it is, or what it is worth where it is, and decrees the collection of it. Honest men come forward and pay it, and can only sell at a loss or by imposing that additional tax upon the article. Dishonest men do not pay the tax, and bring their whisky upon the market at a cost of from forty to sixty cents, as the case may be, less than the honest man is able to sell his at. I do not believe, when the community sees such an operation of any law, that they will be entirely satisfied with it. I think we must all concede that great dissatisfaction will grow out of it.

Then again, the expense should be considered. You must have special machinery to reach this article and collect this tax, and the expense of it would be very considerable. I will not stop to estimate the amount in figures. Great expense would have to be incurred; and I do not think it is worth the while of this legislature to establish a precedent which seems to me objectionable in itself, to impose a tax which is in violation of every principle which has heretofore guided us in the imposition of taxes for the chance of getting an inconsiderable revenue at a very extravagant cost and to the dissatisfaction of a great portion of the community. I think we had better forego the experiment; and so I vote to strike out that clause of the bill as it came from the House; and for these reasons I shall vote against the proposition of my colleague.

Mr. HARLAN. I differ with those who maintain that this bill proposes a license for the sale of whisky. If it were a license to the seller that license ought to be paid every time the commodity is sold. No man under this law is required to pay a per cent. for the sale. If so, each man who sells it ought to pay the per cent. If a tax has been paid on the commodity once it may be sold five hundred times afterwards without any additional charge. It is therefore manifest to my mind that it is a tax levied on the thing itself.

If this be true it seems to me to be an absurdity to argue that the Government has not the right to levy a second tax; or, in other words, that there is an implied contract between the Government and the party who has paid a tax once that it shall not be taxed a second time. I have not in my limited reading ever read of such a principle in constitutional law, that if an article shall have once been taxed by a Government it may not be taxed a second time. That this clearly was not contemplated by those who framed the original law to which this is proposed as an amendment I think will be manifest by examining it in detail.

I observe a tax levied on carriages kept for use. Is it a tax levied on the use of the carriage, or a tax levied on the thing itself? If it be a tax levied on the use of the carriage, and there is an implied contract that if this tax shall be once paid and the license taken out it cannot be changed without violating the plighted faith of the Government, then you never can change the rate of tax on carriages that have once been taxed.

If, then, it be a tax levied on the thing itself there can be no violation of principle in taxing the whisky that is now held by those who may have once paid a light tax; and since it is manifest from the argument we have heard here to-day that the difference between the cost of the commodity under the present tax when bought of the distiller, and the cost of the commodity under the tax that is here proposed will go into the pocket of those who now hold the article or into the Treasury of the United States, it seems to me it is a very plain proposition for the Finance Committee to decide the direction in which this money shall go.

A tax is now levied of twenty cents on a gallon of spirits. The chairman of the Committee on Finance tells us that that is a tax to be paid by the consumer on the liquor. A distiller distills a gallon of liquor the next day after this amendment to the revenue law shall have become a law, and then you levy a tax of sixty cents. The party who has paid the twenty cents has an advantage of forty cents in the original cost of the commodity. If the price should go up so as to enable the distiller to sell his liquor distilled the next day, then the holder of that bought previously will clear forty cents a gallon unless you tax the liquor in his hands. I therefore see no violation of principle in levying this tax. It is a mere question as to who shall receive the additional forty cents, the Government of the United States or those who are now holding distilled spirits. I therefore can have no difficulty in voting for the resolution to recommit the bill with instructions to report an amendment to levy a tax of twenty cents, which is one half of the proposed increase on liquor heretofore to be distilled, on liquor now on hand.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am sure that the Senator from Iowa would not do any injustice to any interest in the country; but the view which he takes I think would produce that result. He discusses this question as if the rise in the price of liquor had all taken place since it has been in the hands of the present holders. That is not the case. Liquor had a price last summer and fall; and when it came to be understood in the trading circles that there was to be an additional tax probably imposed by this Congress it commenced to rise. It went up in the hands of one man one or two cents. He sold. It then went up in the hands of that holder two or three cents, and he sold, until finally it came to be in the hands of the present holder at a rate of near ninety-five cents a gallon. Perhaps the advance in his hands has not been more than one or two or three cents. Now the proposition of the Senator is that he, for the benefit of the Government, shall lose the entire forty cents.

Mr. HARLAN. I will inquire of the Senator if the price of spirits has not been going down in the same way since this bill has been pending in the House, after it became known that probably a tax would be levied on the spirits on hand?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The market price has gone down, but there have been no sales.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe that is the case; that it has somewhat fallen since the action of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HARLAN. I will inquire, then, if the loss is not being distributed in precisely the same way as the increase of price was distributed?

Mr. HENDRICKS. But it has fallen into the hands of men who gave much above the present price for it; for instance, the man who purchased liquor at ninety or ninety-three cents, and then Congress proposed to tax that article which had already paid its tax, and it fell in his hands. Is that an argument why the tax should be imposed? If the statement of the Senator was exactly correct there would be much force in his argument. If the question were really whether the holder should make a profit of twenty cents or the Government should make a revenue of twenty cents a gallon there would be much force in his statement; but the question is whether the Government shall refrain from taxing when by taxing they make the holder lose from fifteen to twenty cents on each gallon. Certainly the sense of right on the part of the Senator will not sustain that.

The Senator from Wisconsin, who has made the present proposition, read to the Senate a letter from a distiller in his State, and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] stated that he has several letters from distillers in the State of Iowa, all urging that the tax shall be imposed upon the article now in market. Those two Senators represent a liquor interest of less than one million gallons. The State of Indiana produces annually about eight million gallons; the State of Ohio about fifteen millions, and the State of Illinois about fifteen millions. In those three States nearly forty million gallons are produced. I have seen representatives of the distilling interest of those three States since this question has been before the Senate, and I have not known one of them to be in favor of imposing this tax.

I cannot see how it is that such large interests in those three States should all be opposed to the tax on the article now on hand and the distillers in the two States of Iowa and Wisconsin should be in favor of it. I choose to be governed by the wishes of the largest class. I think I know that interest, and the gentlemen with whom I have conversed are not of the class described by the Senator from Iowa. They are not speculators. They are gentlemen engaged in good faith in the business, and upon whose word I would rely as soon as I would upon the word of any other business men in the community. I know that this large interest in Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois is opposed to the tax proposed upon the article now in market.

It is not necessary to discuss the principle further. That has been so clearly stated by the Senator from Maryland, it seems to me, that it cannot be answered. I listened with much interest for an answer to that argument, but I have not heard it. This article now in market has paid its tax. The men who produced it paid for the right to produce it and sell it, and whether it be in their hands or in the hands of purchasers from them it matters not. They have the faith of the Government, as I think, that it shall not be taxed further.

There is another interest largely involved in this. Of course the distillers of Indiana, Illinois, and Ohio are not able to keep on hand large quantities for a great length of time, and the course of business is that they ship their whisky to New York or some other important commercial point to some consignee. That consignee advances as largely as it is safe for him to advance on the shipment being made, and the money is received by the distiller to go on with his operations. In the mean time the whisky is finding its way over the railroads and canals and lakes to the important commercial points. Within the last month large advances have been made upon the price that has been given to whisky by the proposed tax upon that which was hereafter to be produced. The consignees have made the advances upon the late rates. If we tax that which is now approaching market or that which is now on hand we strike down the interest of the consignee unless he can get his money back again from the persons who have made the shipments. Certainly we do not wish to disturb trade in this way. The interests of the Government do not require it. I think the present and the future interest of this Government require that we should promote stability and security in trade.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope not. This is the last question on this bill, and it is very important to get through with it.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. It is not at all likely that we can get through with the bill to-night.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, it is. This is the last question to be considered, and it will not probably be debated any further. Gentlemen have discussed it very fully.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] to recommit the bill with instructions to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POWELL. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. DAVIS] is absent from the Senate in consequence of indisposition.

The question being taken, resulted—yeas 14, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Doolittle, Foster, Grimes, Harding, Harlan, Howard, Morrill, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, and Trumbull—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Fessenden, Hale, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Hicks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, and Wilson—29.

So the motion to recommit was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on concurring in the Senate with the amendment made in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to say to the Senate that I will ask them to go into executive session for the simple purpose of entering a privileged motion.

Mr. CONNESS. I have just such a purpose also, and I hope the Senate will go into executive session.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a question before the Senate. The Senator from Wisconsin moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Several SENATORS. Put the other question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair puts the questions in the order in which they are moved. The second question is not in order until the first is withdrawn or acted upon.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have no objection to withdraw my motion for the purpose of allowing the other motion to be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion for an executive session is withdrawn.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Now I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has business of much importance that should be acted upon. If that is not so, he can state it to the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. I think we ought to meet to-morrow. We have measures enough to occupy our attention. The Senator from Virginia [Mr.

CARLILE] is entitled to the floor to speak on an important question, and I think we had better meet to-morrow. At any rate I should like to take up and pass the joint resolution in regard to the pay of colored troops, and get it out of the way.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We want information about that before we pass it.

Mr. WILSON. I hope we shall meet to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to adjourn over.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. On that motion I will ask for the yeas and nays. ["Oh, no."] I will withdraw the call.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—yeas twenty-five, noes not counted.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Now I move that we go into executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in the consideration of executive business, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 4, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ESTABLISHMENT OF ARSENALS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, introduced a bill in addition to an act for the establishment of certain arsenals; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications and other works of defense for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, ordered to be printed, and made the special order for the 11th proximo, and from day to day until disposed of.

GRADE OF NAVAL OFFICERS.

Mr. SCHENCK introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to the House of Representatives the report of the advisory board appointed under the act of July 16, 1862, "to establish and equalize the grades of line officers of the United States Navy," together with the instructions given to said board, and also all documentary and other testimony submitted to or examined by the board, and all memorials, protests, or other papers from officers of the Navy not recommended for promotion, or from others in their behalf, relating to or in any way connected with the proceedings or report of said board.

WASHINGTON JUSTICES' COURTS.

Mr. STEELE, of New York, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill to establish justices' courts in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the same committee.

PENITENTIARY IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. STEELE, of New York, from the same committee, also reported back House bill No. 169, authorizing the construction of a penitentiary, jail, and house of correction in and for the District of Columbia; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the same committee.

UNITED STATES REGISTER.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I ask unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be authorized and required to purchase one thousand copies of the United States Register for 1864, as published by J. D. Durnell, at a price not to exceed fifty cents a copy, and charge the same to the contingent fund, being for the use of the members and officers of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

FRANCIS CHARLES WEEKLY.

Mr. THOMAS introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a pension to Francis Charles Weekly, who gallantly joined the twelfth regiment of Massachusetts, before the fight at Gettysburg, and was twice wounded in that battle.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. THOMAS also introduced a bill to incorporate the District of Columbia Railroad Company; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

PREEMPTION CLAIMS.

Mr. BENNET introduced a bill amendatory of the act of June 2, 1862, in regard to preemption claims in Colorado; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

RELIEF OF DENVER CITY.

Mr. BENNET also introduced a bill for the relief of the citizens of Denver City, in the Territory of Colorado; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PRESERVATION OF BUFFALO.

Mr. BENNET also introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Territories be instructed to inquire into the propriety of enacting a law to restrain the wanton destruction of buffalo upon the great western plains by the white emigrants during the spring and summer months, and report by bill or otherwise.

REBELLION LOSSES.

Mr. HALE, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee of Claims a bill to provide for ascertaining and adjusting claims against the Government for injuries to and destruction of property by the Army of the United States, or by military authority, during the present rebellion; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

BOUNTY LANDS TO SOLDIERS.

Mr. NOBLE, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be directed to inquire into the propriety of granting bounty lands to all soldiers of the United States in the existing war who have been or may be honorably discharged; and also all soldiers who served in the war with the Indians in Oregon, and who have been honorably discharged; and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

CAPTURED COTTON.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill relating to the capture of cotton and the disposition thereof by the military forces of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

COMMUTATION MONEY.

Mr. ELDRIDGE asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be required, and he is hereby required, to furnish to this House information as to the amount of moneys received up to this time for commutation by drafted men; also, what disposition has been made of said moneys; if substitutes have been purchased for drafted men, how many, where, and who have been procured as such substitutes. What sum has been paid for each, and whether for white or black, and how much for each.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, objected.

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That ten thousand additional copies of the papers on the subject of foreign affairs, which accompanied the President's annual message, be printed for the use of the State Department.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I am willing to vote for all the additional copies necessary, but it seems to me that ten thousand copies is a greater number than there is any necessity for printing. I hope the gentleman will permit the resolution to be amended so as to make the number five thousand.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. If I can be indulged for an instant, I would say that the number of ten thousand copies is requested by the Secretary of State; and he expressed to me his very earnest desire that that number should be allowed, assigning this reason for it: that the diplomatic correspondence of the Government is the only mode that the Government has of stating its case authentically and fully to the nations of Europe. If it is not allowed to state it in that form it will be driven to the very questionable if not disreputable method of buying up the public press of Europe, as the rebels are in the habit of doing continually, for the purpose of manufacturing public opinion. The Secretary thought it better to have an authentic declaration of the opinions of the Government spread before the nations of Europe, official in form, for which we are responsible, and carrying with it the weight of official declarations. He said the first thousand copies did not at all approach supplying the necessities of the case, but that at least the number he asks could be usefully disposed of.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I simply desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Printing to incorporate into that resolution the printing of ten thousand copies of McClellan's report. We are annoyed to death with applications for it not only from various individuals in the western country, but nearly every officer in the Army from my section of the country has written to me, "For God's sake send me a copy of that report."

Mr. A. W. CLARK. The Committee on Printing have reported in favor of printing that report, and it is now being printed and will soon be ready for delivery to the members of the House.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Was that in favor of an additional number, or only for the usual number?

Mr. A. W. CLARK. The usual number.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. That only gives to each member about forty copies. The demand is so great that it appears to me that the public exigencies require that we should print a greater number.

Mr. GRINNELL. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I will supply him with my portion. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I suppose the gentleman does not want his people to read the truth. That is the amount of his remark.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I simply suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Printing that he incorporate the amendment I have suggested into his resolution, and that we print ten thousand additional copies of that report.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I will state, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. J. C. ALLEN,] that that matter was referred to the Committee on Printing a day or two since. The committee have held no meeting since, but we shall meet to-morrow, when the question will come up.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I hope the committee will hold a meeting soon, and report the resolution.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Printing if he can state to the House the amount which it will cost to print the additional ten thousand copies.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. Probably quite a large amount, for it is a large book.

Mr. WILSON. I do not think we ought to pass on this resolution without knowing what the cost will be, and I suggest, therefore, that the resolution be postponed until the committee can furnish us with that information.

Mr. COX. I hope the resolution will not be postponed. Gentlemen upon the other side of the House ask for the printing of the documents issued by one of the Departments. Gentlemen upon this side of the House do not make any objection to laying before the people all that has been done in all the Departments of the Government. Let this document be printed, and let it have full circulation. Let all books be printed that are connected with the public service. We do not object upon this side of the House. We are anxious to have this diplomatic correspondence circulated: whether it will do the Secretary good or not, no matter; let it be laid before the nation.

But I do hope and trust that my friend from New York [Mr. A. W. CLARK] will report a resolution for the printing of an additional number of General McClellan's report, so that the demand for it by the people may be satisfied. And I will say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] that his own constituents have written to members upon this side of the House asking for this report of General McClellan, begging for it, and demanding to know why it has been kept back so long from the public. We can distribute three times the number already ordered. I hope my friend from New York will hurry on the resolution for the printing of additional copies.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Why did not the gentleman put in a larger number in his original resolution?

Mr. COX. I did not know that the House would be so generous. I did not know there would be such a demand for the report. I did not know that General McClellan would be so popular all through the country, almost equal to General Grant himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Not quite.

Mr. WILSON. I will state, in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. COX,] that the diplomatic correspondence has already been printed, so that the appeal which he makes to have that correspondence printed has no force whatever. The book has been printed, and is now, I understand, ready for distribution. The type has been distributed, and if we order an additional number the whole work will have to be done over again. I want to know before I vote on this resolution what it is going to cost. I suggest, therefore, to the gentleman from New York that he postpone this resolution or withdraw it, as he can report at any time, until he can give this information to the House.

Mr. POMEROY. It seems to me that this discussion is taking a wide range not germane at all to the question before the House. The question is a very simple one. Under the rule established last session there have been printed, without any order from the House, simply the number of one thousand copies of the diplomatic correspondence for the use of the State Department. That will not even supply the consulates and offices of the Government. It is the only work issuing from the Department of the Secretary of State and giving a history of the intercourse of this Government with foreign Governments.

Mr. WILSON. Can the gentleman state the entire number of copies printed by the order of the House?

Mr. POMEROY. Seven thousand for the House and one thousand for the State Department. But I am talking now only about the State Department. I say that only one thousand copies have been ordered for the State Department, and that too of the only book issued from that Department giving to the country and to the world any history at all of its business during the past year.

Now, there is no man in this country who does not know that the public interest within the past year has been more drawn to our foreign intercourse than to any other subject in our political history. Foreign intervention is the rock upon which the world at large and our enemies at home expected us to split. There is no subject upon which to-day the people of this country demand and have a right to demand light more than upon that subject.

Mr. DAWES. I would ask the gentleman if there is any objection to our knowing what this will cost?

Mr. POMEROY. I will say this, that if we are going to print any additional copies at all, the cost of setting in type and getting ready to print five thousand copies will be almost equal to that of printing ten thousand copies.

Mr. DAWES. I am aware of that, but just for the curiosity of the thing I should like to know the cost. If the gentleman has any objection to stating it I will yield my curiosity; but it strikes me that there cannot be any real objection to stating the cost.

Mr. POMEROY. If the gentleman will yield his curiosity, I prefer that he should, because it seems to me the question is here whether any additional copies of the correspondence shall be printed or not. It is not a question of one, three, five, or ten thousand copies, because if the type be set at all there should be an edition published such as will be satisfactory to the Secretary of State, and such as he says the wants of the country demand.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand that eight thousand copies of this book have been already ordered.

Mr. POMEROY. Seven thousand for this House and one thousand for the Department of State.

Mr. STEVENS. As these copies have not been distributed, I propose that we shall divert two thousand of those ordered by the House to the use of the Department of State, so as to give the Secretary a sufficient number. I am quite sure the House does not care much for such excellent reading. Let me state now that the public printing, without these accumulations, already has run up to $1,250,000 a year, and it is becoming alarming.

Mr. POMEROY. I am aware that there may be a difference of opinion among gentlemen on this floor not only as to the expediency of publishing the correspondence, but as to its value when published. That question I do not propose to discuss here. But I do say, and repeat, that the only question before the House now is whether any additional number whatever of this work shall be printed for the use of the State Department. If the House say there ought not to be any printed I will submit cheerfully to that decision.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I move the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from New York to withdraw the demand for the previous question, in order that the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania may be brought before the House. I think it is a fair proposition. I think it is but just and proper that we should give up the number of copies which belong to us to the Secretary of State. I am sorry that the gentleman from New York [Mr. POMEROY] has sought to change the issue before the House. The objection to print this very large number of extra copies is made, not from disrespect to the Secretary of State, or from want of confidence in his distinguished ability, or from any indisposition to give him the benefit of a full and fair hearing before the country and before the world. I fully recognize the value of this correspondence. But it is a question how far we are willing to go in increasing these enormous printing expenses. The cost of these ten thousand copies must be enormous. It would amount to a very large sum, and make an additional charge upon an already overburdened Treasury. This is my ground of objection.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman will withdraw the demand for the previous question, I will move the amendment which I have indicated, and take the sense of the House upon it.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. Since the question was propounded to me as to the expense of this edition, I have learned from the printer, who is here and who has made an estimate, that it will be about seventeen thousand dollars.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman will allow me to test the sense of the House on the question, I move as an amendment that two thousand copies of those already ordered by the House be transferred to the Department of State.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I decline to yield for that purpose.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. May I be allowed to make a single observation?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that common respect for the judgment of the gentleman who is considered worthy to be intrusted with the foreign correspondence of this Government ought to carry this House to the extent of allowing him to have as many copies of a document as he deems necessary for the purpose of stating our case to the nations of the world. If the House mean to higgler over the small sum of ten, fifteen, twenty, thirty, fifty, or a hundred thousand dollars, required in the pleading of our cause before the nations of Europe, let it do so. For my part I trust that the gentleman at the head of the Committee on Printing will accept no amendment, and let the House express its judgment on the worth of the diplomatic correspondence abroad.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, which was on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. SPALDING called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 118, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Atley, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Blow, Boyd, William G. Brown, Chandler, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Cox, Cresswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawson, Denning, Dennison, Donnelly, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Eliot, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Gooch, Grinnell, Hall, Harrington, Herrick, Higby, Hooper, Asa Hol W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hutchins, Jencks, William Johnson, Kallbelsch, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, King, Le Blond, Long, Longyear, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, McKimney, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Noble, Norton, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Perry, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Scott, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, John B. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Tayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Windom, Winfield, and Yeaman—118.

NAYS—Messrs. Boutwell, Brandegee, Brooks, Broomall, Davies, Driggs, Farnsworth, Grider, Holman, Julian, McDowell, Spalding, Stevens, Elihu B. Washburne, Chilton A. White, Williams, and Wilson—17.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. A. W. CLARK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill to establish a uniform system of ambulances in the Army of the United States; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

UNITED STATES REGISTER—AGAIN.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] withdraws his objection to my resolution for the purchase of one thousand copies of the United States Register for 1864, provided that it be referred to the Committee on Printing. I agree to that reference.

There was no objection; and the resolution was received and referred accordingly.

BOUNTIES.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order to be the consideration of the following resolution, submitted yesterday by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KELLOGG:]

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be requested to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for bounties to be paid to such volunteers as regularly enlisted into the regiments first called out by the President for two years, and were honorably discharged from the service with such regiments, and before the expiration of two years, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

The pending amendment, moved by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN], is to strike out the words "requested to inquire into the expediency of," and insert "directed to report a bill."

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw that amendment, and move the following as a substitute for the resolution:

That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill providing for paying to the private soldiers who enlisted for two years, and who have served for that term and been honorably discharged, the bounty of $100, and for paying to said soldiers who enlisted for three years or for the war, and who have been honorably discharged before a service of two years for disabilities incurred in the service after enlistment, (for other causes than wounds received in battle, which have been provided for,) an amount of the bounty of $100 proportionate to the time of actual service, and apply the same principle to the soldiers who enlisted for two years, and before the term of service were in like manner discharged.

Mr. KELLOGG, of New York, demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman to amend his substitute, so as to request the committee to inquire into the expediency of reporting such a bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would do so without hesitation if there were any prospect of the Committee on Military Affairs reporting on the subject. It was among the earliest matters referred to that committee, and so far there has been no report.

Mr. SCHENCK. We will report on that subject as soon as we can get the floor to report on anything. A bill has been referred to the committee embodying those things, which will be reported on.

Mr. HOLMAN. When?

Mr. SCHENCK. So soon as we can get an opportunity.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I modify my substitute so as to make it a request instead of direction.

The substitute, as modified, was then adopted.

CONFISCATED PROPERTY.

The regular order of business being called for, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 18) to amend "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, on which the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to occupy the time of the House in discussing the subject now under consideration, but as the debate has assumed proportions which I did not anticipate, and as I am a member of the committee which reported the joint resolution, it is due to myself, briefly as I may, to express the views which control my action. I shall treat the confiscation act, so far as legislation is concerned, as "res adjudicata." The various questions arising under it, upon which the best minds of the last Congress honestly differed, will doubtless, when the proper occasion arises, receive a judicial construction from the highest legal tribunal in the land.

Admitting confiscation to be the settled policy of the country, and the confiscation act to be the law of the land, I shall direct my remarks to the point as to how far the property of the rebels may be taken under it, and whether there is any constitutional objection to enforcing its provisions to the extent claimed by its friends.

Respecting the rebellious States, two extreme grounds seem to have been taken. First, that they are still in the Union, with all their former rights not impaired, but temporarily suspended by violence and wicked rebellion, and that upon its suppression all these rights again vest. Second, that they are out of the Union, having forfeited, by solemn renunciation of their obligations to the Federal Government and war upon it, all claim to the rights and privileges accorded to them by the Constitution, and hence are to be treated as alien enemies. I confess, sir, that with my present views, I am inclined as between the two to adopt the first position, with important modifications.

I am accustomed to listen to the distinguished and experienced gentleman from Pennsylvania with the greatest interest, and always distrust myself when I differ from him; but, sir, when we admit the rebellious States to be belligerents and alien enemies, the war assumes an aspect and is controlled by laws and principles which I do not propose to extend to rebels in arms. As alien enemies they are to be treated under the law of nations, and no municipal regulation or law of ours can affect their status either as to person or property; or in other words it can neither add to nor detract from their rights as established by the law of nations. When we concede them to be alien enemies, we concede the territory which they occupy to be alien territory. By force of arms we may occupy it, but by occupancy we do not divest the title to the realty except so far as it may rest in the public. Suppose we were at war with Great Britain, and marched our armies into Canada. By the law of nations we may occupy and use their lands for the convenience and comfort of our armies, or we may use or take away, subject to our own municipal regulations, whatever personality we may capture; but could we divest under the law of nations the title to the realty? I think not; and hence if we treat the rebels as alien enemies the confiscation act is unnecessary.

Are the rebels alien enemies? If the rebellious States are de jure out of the Union, they may be. If the rebellious States are within the Union, they cannot be. The position of the South, so far as the character of the war is concerned, depends, in my judgment, upon the solution of a single question. Can a State, either by an ordinance of secession or by the uprising of the people, take itself out of the Union? I do not consider it necessary to discuss this point to loyal and intelligent gentlemen. Upon the other hand, if we adopt the view that the rebellious States have not dissolved their allegiance to and connection with the Union, then a confiscation law is not only wise but may be legally enforced. Treat the rebels as rebels, and the war as a rebellion, and the confiscation act as a municipal regulation is effective, and effective upon the ground that it operates upon the property of those who have wickedly renounced and opposed by arms the Government to which they owe allegiance. Treat them as alien enemies, and the war as a contest between nations, and the element of allegiance drops out, and the law of nations alone is applicable to the conflict. The municipal regulations of neither one side or the other

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 32.

can change the status or condition of either person or property.

Now, sir, the confiscation act proceeds upon the distinct ground that the war is a rebellion, and that those engaged in it are rebels. The first section provides that every person who shall commit the crime of treason against the United States, and shall be adjudged guilty thereof, shall suffer death, and all his slaves, if any, shall be declared and made free; or, at the discretion of the court, he shall be imprisoned for not less than five years, and fined not less than ten thousand dollars, and all his slaves be declared free; and that said fine shall be levied and collected on the property, real and personal, excluding slaves, of which the person was the owner when the crime was committed.

The second section provides that if any person shall hereafter incite, set on foot, assist, or engage in any rebellion or insurrection against the authority of the United States, or the laws thereof, or shall give aid or comfort thereto, or shall engage in or give aid or comfort to any such existing rebellion or insurrection, and be convicted thereof, he shall be punished by imprisonment for a period not exceeding ten years, or by fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars, or both of said punishments.

Section five—and the objections from the other side are mainly to this section—provides that, to insure the speedy termination of the present rebellion, property may be seized by the President in certain cases without trial and conviction of the owner, and applied for the support of the Army, after condemnation as provided in the subsequent sections of the act. Thus the whole bill is based upon the fact that the war is a rebellion, and the penalties are against those engaged in it as rebels and because they are rebels.

Now, sir, let us for a moment examine the arguments used by gentlemen upon the other side of the House against the constitutionality of the law.

It is said that the law is unconstitutional because it takes the real estate of persons engaged in a war against the Government and forfeits it in fee; that the persons are de facto and de jure traitors; that their acts constitute the crime of treason as defined by law; and that by the provisions of the Constitution no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted. The answer is, there is no attainder of treason under the law. What is an attainder? There never has been such a thing in this country. In England it was the necessary incident to and consequence of conviction and judgment for treason, and carried with it corruption of blood, whereby the descendant of the felon could not inherit through the guilty ancestor, and forfeiture in fee not only of the real estate which the felon owned in perpetuity, but also that which he held in entail. The forfeiture for an attainder of treason is not involved in the confiscation law.

As a punishment for treason per se there is no forfeiture of estate, for in 1790 Congress expressly declared that there should be no corruption of blood or any forfeiture of estate.

Now, the confiscation act simply declares that whosoever shall commit the crime of treason and be adjudged guilty thereof shall suffer death and forfeit his slaves, or be imprisoned and fined not less than ten thousand dollars. It also declares that any person setting on foot any rebellion or insurrection, or who shall give aid or comfort to any person engaged in any rebellion or insurrection, shall, upon conviction, be imprisoned, fined, and forfeit his slaves.

I do not understand that it is contended that slaves, personal chattels, may not be forfeited absolutely, as it is doubtless the law, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the forfeiture of personal property for an hour is a forfeiture forever. Certainly Congress has power to declare what shall constitute treason, and what the punishment shall be. Under the law of the last Congress one portion of the punishment was, a fine of not less than ten thousand dollars, to be levied and collected upon the estate of the offender, both real and personal. As there is no provision of the Constitution which by any construction can render such punishment illegal, it necessarily follows that by indirection Congress can work an absolute forfeiture of all the real estate of the convicted offender, while as a direct measure, if the gentlemen on the other side are correct, it can only forfeit a life interest. To a practical man this is rather absurd.

The great difficulty, however, upon the other side of the House seems to rest in the fifth section. Under this section the forfeiture is not as a penalty for the crime of treason, inasmuch as the section does not provide for a conviction of treason, and without conviction there can be no punishment. It merely provides for the seizure of the estate of certain persons who, as citizens of the United States, have assumed to throw off their allegiance to the Government, and by force of arms seek to destroy it.

Is this seizure lawful? In my judgment, under all the circumstances, it is. By natural law, which is the only law by which individual rights are governed before men form themselves into organized societies, there is no such thing as the right of property in real estate. A person can only own and enjoy what he occupies, and hence he is under the protection of no law except the law of force. When, for the sake of mutual protection, men form themselves into societies and organized governments those natural rights are abandoned, and obligation to Government is assumed and protection from Government guaranteed, both as to person and property. When our Constitution was established it was not done by States as such. Its preamble is, "We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America." Now, under this Constitution and the Government based upon it, what were the rights and duties of the citizen, and what the power and duty of the Government? The duty of the citizen was allegiance, and upon the performance of that duty rested his right to protection. The duty of the Government was to extend to the citizen protection both to person and property, and that obligation was only imposed by virtue of the allegiance of the citizen. The duty of the Government and the obligation of the citizen are mutual. Whenever the citizen disregards his obligation, throws off his allegiance, and thrusts the assassin's dagger at the heart of the Government, he not only commits the highest crime, but forever absolves the Government from the duty of extending its protection either to his person or property.

The rebels in arms are in this position. They have broken the compact, and it is the right and duty of Congress to authorize the seizure of their persons and property—to restrain their persons and to appropriate their property, not as a forfeiture for treason per se, but as an exercise of a just and sovereign power over a rebellious subject; and this in accordance with paramount law. Hence, in my judgment, the confiscation act can be administered without involving the great constitutional question about which we have heard so much said, and read respecting the forfeiture in fee of real estate upon an attainder of treason. As I have before said, there is no such thing known to our law as an attainder. By the common law attainder was a necessary incident to conviction and judgment of treason. In this country Congress determines what constitutes the crime of treason, and declares what its punishment shall be. There are no attendant effects to the judgment beyond the prescribed penalty. There is neither corruption of blood nor forfeiture. Whether Congress as a punishment for treason can forfeit the real estate of the offender in fee is another question. The authority quoted from one of the articles of Mr. Madison in the Federalist, does not settle the point either way. It merely asserts that Congress is restrained in punishing treason from extending the consequences of guilt beyond the person of its author; or, in other words, that punishment for treason does not work corruption of blood, or forfeiture of interests in property, except so far as those interests pertain to the person of the offender. Mr. Justice Story—whose memory I hold in the profoundest reverence—seems to go further, and his language would naturally enough indicate that, as a punishment for treason, there can be no forfeiture of estate beyond the life of the offender. I have ever admired the juridical scholarship of Mr. Justice Story, and been accustomed to receive his opinions with the greatest respect. If, however, his reasoning upon this subject—which, to say the least, is somewhat desultory and unsatisfactory—will only bear the construction which the gentlemen upon the other side give it, I must with great humility disagree with the learned commentator.

The Constitution is to be construed in accordance with the intention of its framers, and that intention may be determined to some extent by an examination of history contemporaneous with the adoption of the Constitution. Our fathers were striking out upon a system entirely different, in most respects, from that of England. They had seen the effect of bills of attainder, and hence wisely provided that no bills of attainder or ex post facto laws should be passed by Congress. They had seen the effect of attainder of treason under the common law, whereby corruption of blood was worked and inheritable qualities destroyed. Hence they provided that upon an attainder of treason there should be no corruption of blood. They had seen interests in the realty, absolutely vested in the innocent descendant, forever taken in fee upon the attainder of the ancestor. Estates in England were held generally by virtue of feudal grants from the Crown, and each tenant held only a life estate, and hence corruption of blood was necessary, as a consequence of an attainder of treason, to destroy the entail, and revert the title in the Crown. Otherwise the heir would inherit, for in entailed estates there is an interest in esse in the remainder-man during the life of an ancestor; an interest that may be legally incumbered by way of mortgage.

In this country at the time of the Revolution and the adoption of the Constitution, entailed estates abounded, and the Constitution leaves it wholly to the several States to regulate the descent of property and to allow or prohibit entails; and they now exist, probably in large numbers, in the States, limited by law to terms of years, or the lives of persons in being when created; but still entailed estates, where one person has the life interest and another the remainder; and the Constitution undoubtedly provides against legislation which shall deprive innocent persons of their legal rights in esse for the crime of an ancestor through the doctrine of corruption of blood. But nemo est hæres viventis; and because the conviction of the tenant in tail shall not work injury to the remainder-man through corruption of blood, can it be said that treason may not be punished by depriving the convicted person of that property which belongs solely to him, to which no one else during his life has any legal claim, and that he is to be permitted before he mounts the scaffold to dispose of it for the furtherance of the very cause for engaging in which we deprive him of life? Could the fathers have gravely discussed this question of forfeiture and inserted in the Constitution the mere shadow without a particle of substance? Did they mean that for the highest crime known to the law the forfeiture should attach only long enough for the convicted felon to be transported from the prison to the scaffold? No, sir, our fathers never were cheated by shadows or grasped at straws. They meant something by the insertion of this clause. Forfeiture was to have some practical operation as a punishment for treason. If so, the forfeiture was intended to operate upon the interest of the offender in whatever estate he possessed, and upon the whole of that interest and nothing more; and wisely and humanely, contrary to the English law, it was not intended to operate upon an interest in esse—a vested interest in an innocent descendant to the property in possession of the convicted traitor by virtue of an heirship which the ancestor himself could neither divest nor affect. In other words, the forfeiture could not operate upon any title or interest not resting in the person attained; and this, in my judgment, is all that was intended by the clause "or forfeiture beyond the life of the person attained."

The tears which we have seen shed here in behalf of innocent heirs are crocodile tears; tears like those of the play-actors on the boards, got up for the occasion, for effect; always bottled and ready for use. No more like the tears which flow from the true fountain than the muddy waters of the Potomac are like the waters of the crystal brooks which leap from the mountains of my own noble State. Suppose the innocent little children do suffer in estate? Suffering is the consequence of crime. There is an authority upon this point. I hope the gentlemen upon the other side will recognize it and be comforted thereby. It is older and higher than Blackstone or Mansfield or Marshall or Story; more potent than the edict of kings or the judgment of courts. It is the authority of God himself, who says to those who rebel against His government and bow down to and serve other gods:

"I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me; and showing mercy unto thousands of them that love me, and keep my commandments."

So much, sir, in regard to forfeiture. Sir, I do not wish to be misunderstood. I have taken the ground that as the right of secession does not exist no State can take itself out of the Union, either by ordinance of secession passed in convention or by the uprising of the people in rebellion. Such, as I understand, is the position taken by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MALLORY,] who addressed the House in a labored and polished argument a few days since, upon certain joint resolutions introduced by him, and still undisposed of. While I admired the argument of the accomplished gentleman as tasteful and replete with the subtle refinements of the schools, I cannot agree with his conclusions as being either necessary or logical.

If I understood the honorable gentleman he contended that a State cannot secede. I agree with him. He then contended that inasmuch as a State cannot secede she may at any time, although she is de facto and not de jure out of the Union, come back into the family of States with her old constitution and institutions, and that Congress is bound to receive her. Upon this point I take issue with the gentleman from Kentucky. This may not be the time to discuss this question. When the proper occasion arises I may submit my views upon the subject.

Sir, there is no one upon this floor who deprecates this unhappy and unhallowed war more than I do. There is no one who desires peace more than I do; but, sir, that peace must be an honorable peace, and based upon principles consonant with the integrity, the honor, and the purposes of a free Government. Slavery caused the war, and it is to protect it that the war is continued by the rebels. When the Constitution was framed slavery existed, inherited from our mother who now in the day of our trial claims to stand with folded arms an indifferent spectator of a war upon the issue of which depends the progress of Christian civilization more intimately than upon any or all the conflicts and struggles of all the centuries. Our fathers supposed that this great evil would gradually melt away before an advancing civilization as the snows of a northern winter before the genial rays of an April sun. But the evil grew. Agencies arose which stimulated it, until it became a monster "whose tread made the continent shake." The invention of the cotton-gin gave a stimulus to the production of cotton, and the adaptation of the climate and soil of the South to the production of this leading staple of the world increased the demand for labor. "More laborers," was the cry, and whole States, Virginia, the mother of Presidents, leading the rest, gave themselves to supplying the market. "More land," was the cry; and Texas was thrown to the insatiable leech. The free North stood back agast as this crowned and unclean leper, under the claimed sanction of the Constitution, marched to its new domain. The institution which our fathers had looked upon as an evil had become divine. It occupied the bench, it controlled the Administration, it struck down Senators in the Halls of Congress, it cajoled and flattered and threatened and lied, till its all-absorbing maw swallowed Congress itself. The intelligence and moral sense of the nation were against it. The wealth of the nation was against it. The popular vote of the nation, when uncontrolled by demagogues and doughfaces, was against it. In God's good time the people, seeing that the administration of their Government was a cheat, arose in their majesty. The weak and pliant Buchanan, the pilfering Floyd, the cultured but traitorous Davis, were hurled from power, and an honest man, the noblest work of God, placed in the presidential chair. The propagandists of slavery, like their great prototypes, deeming it better to rule in hell than serve in heaven, rebelled. To them alone belongs the responsibility. To them alone attaches the consequences of their awful crime.

The gentlemen upon the other side, in words whose persuasive sweetness might almost raise mortals to the skies or bring angels down, call for peace and the restoration of the Union as it was. Sir, let them restore the crumbled walls of Sumter surmounted by our starry banners; let them call from its depths to the surface of the James, the Cumberland and her gallant crew who went down with their proud flag still flying; let them revivify the scores of thousands whose martyr forms consecrate the hundred battle-fields of this contest, and whose blood has given our land in holiest baptism to freedom henceforth forever; let them give us back our Winthrop and Lyon and Stevens and Kearney and Richardson and Reno and the comrades who with them "sleep their last sleep and have fought their last battle;" let them summon back to our Senate Halls the moldering dust that once was Baker, the noble heart and eloquent tongue now stilled forever; let them hush the grief that fills our land for the loss of those who died that our country might live—grief that proudly mourns and asks no sympathy from traitorous hearts; let them rebuke the gaunt demon of famine now stalking with his triumphal train of woes throughout the South; let them change the stars in their courses, and turn back the hands upon the dial-plate of time, and obliterate the bloody record of the past three years. Then, sir, they can have peace and the Union as it was—a peace which the North would never break. When they shall have done all this, then "may the dog return to his vomit and the sow to her wallowing in the mire." But never until then, sir, shall the crack of the slave-whip again make sweet music in their ears.

Sir, the gentlemen are the Bourbons of our country—they learn nothing and forget nothing. But,

"There's a divinity that shapes our ends, Rough-hew them how we will."

And has there not been, sir—and I quote from another—a divine purpose controlling all the political and military phases of this conflict; snatching from us victories; granting successes; forcing us at last by the gigantic proportions of this revolt, to shear it of its strength in pronouncing a doom upon its cherished institution and arming against them those of their own household; in frustrating our military campaigns that in the delay public sentiment might conform to the ever-changing condition of things, that slavery by the ravages of war might more effectually be extirpated? Can a man with clear-eyed vision, with reverence in his soul, with a belief within him in the righteousness of Jehovah, fail to read that purpose—the extinction of slavery?

Sir, I was greatly delighted with the beautiful apostrophe to our Union pronounced yesterday by the gentleman from Kentucky. It is, indeed, the palladium of our liberty, the only ark of our safety, and it will stand. Let no loyal heart be discouraged. The lines of the rebellion are already greatly circumscribed. Its means are already greatly crippled. Its hopes of foreign aid are destroyed. Let the people who love the Union and freedom still stand by the old flag, and not a single star shall be blotted out. Star after star shall be added to the constellation, until it culminates in one splendid galaxy spanning the free continent of North America.

Sir, I have been astonished at the spirit evinced by certain gentlemen upon the other side against the Administration which is so earnestly endeavoring to put down this rebellion. While they proclaim that they would prosecute the war, they seem quite indisposed to sustain the measures of the Administration or of Congress by which alone the war can be carried on. Distinguished gentlemen from Ohio—I learned from the remarks of my friend from Ohio upon this side of the House—who now prate their patriotism so loudly, are fresh from the support of Vallandigham in the recent gubernatorial controversy in that State. If so, sir, we must somewhat distrust them, for I cannot be charitable enough to believe that, like poor dog Tray, they were only caught in a very bad company. Sir, had it not been for the Vallandighams of the North, the rebellion, if inaugurated at all, would never have assumed its gigantic proportions. The traitors of the North have held up the hands of the rebels of the South, and, like poor and despised Vallandigham, by the verdict of a loyal people they will receive their reward. Vallandigham, now without a Government, without a home, friendless and alone, seeks the shelter of a foreign land; and future history will write his name among the Arnolds and Burrs of his country.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. F. Wood] a few days since delivered a most remarkable speech. Its only virtue, in my judgment, was its frankness, and hereafter loyal people will have no doubt as to where the gentleman's sympathies are. He quotes liberally from Burke and Chatham, those immortal English statesmen who always defended the people against the encroachments of the Crown, and applies the quotations to the present rebellion. Is the gentleman honest or is he blinded? Can he see no distinction between that great and manly struggle for independence involving the right of self-government and free institutions, and this rebellion which seeks to overthrow and destroy them both? Can he see no distinction between a people rising in arms who are taxed without representation, who are humiliated and oppressed by unjust decrees and ordinances and regulations, and a people rising in rebellion against the most beneficent Government on earth? Sir, I do not wonder that he is the representative of a city which required forty thousand national troops to protect it from the violence and rapine of his own constituency and the peculiar friends of the Union-loving Governor of the State of New York.

The unjust and unwarrantable assertion of the gentleman from New York respecting New England merits and meets my hearty contempt. New England needs no vindication from the aspersions of the defenders of treason, or the advocates of human bondage. Her "airy buildeth in the cedar's top, and dallies with the wind, and scorns the sun." Her soil is made sacred by the first blood of the Revolution. Liberty was first cradled upon her bosom, and the history of her sons is written upon a scroll which I apprehend the gentleman will never reach. Her's was the first martyr of this godless rebellion, and she will stand in the front ranks, with all her men and all her money, until this Government shall be restored and the old flag shall float in triumph over our entire Union, redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled from the curse of American slavery. It is impossible to foresee what effect the teachings of such gentlemen may have upon the passions of men. Before to-day, the clouds of secession have lowered over our land. Before to-day liberty-loving New England has been treated with contumely and scorn. Before to-day has the old Bay State, the mother of New England and the mother of freedom, been unjustly assailed. But there she stands as she stood more than thirty years ago when the immortal Webster, in his reply to Mr. Hayne, said, "There is her history. The world knows it by heart. The past, at least, is secure. There are Boston and Lexington and Concord and Bunker Hill, and there they will remain forever. The bones of her sons, fallen in the great struggle for independence, now lie mingled with the soil of every State from New England to Georgia, and there they will lie forever. And, sir, where American liberty raised its first voice, where its youth was nurtured and sustained, there it still lives in the strength of its manhood and full of its original spirit. If discord and disunion shall wound it; if party strife and blind ambition shall hawk at and tear it; if folly and madness, if uneasiness under necessary and salutary restraint shall succeed in separating it from that Union by which alone its existence is made sure, it will stand in the end by the side of that cradle in which its infancy was rocked, and will fall at last, if fall it must, amidst the proudest monuments of its own glory on the very spot of its origin."

Mr. YEAMAN. Mr. Speaker, there are two propositions before the House: one to repeal the joint resolution explaining and limiting the confiscation act so that under its operation only an estate for the life of the offender will pass, and the other only so modifying the explanatory resolution as to give the act such scope and effect as it may have under the Constitution.

It is mainly a legal question, both propositions involving an inquiry into the legal signification of the language used in the Constitution, and both do in some degree, and one more than the other, involve the policy and wisdom of confiscating in fee all the real estate made subject to the operation of the act, which, it must be said, embraces about all within the lines of the rebellion. While it is impossible for the act or the resolution to enlarge the Constitution, or do more than it will allow, it is competent for the resolution as it now stands to limit, not the meaning of the Constitution, (nor scarcely of the act, for that can mean nothing against the Constitution,) but to limit the extent of confiscation, or do less than might be done under the Constitution, if under it, as many think, the fee may be confiscated.

I have very much regretted to see the discussion of a great and interesting legal question soiled on both sides of the House by so much of a bitter partisan character. It were to be wished that gentlemen in discussing a question so great and so interesting would observe that decorum of argumentation and that rigid exclusion of foreign and personal matter for which they are so honorably distinguished in those tribunals so often illustrated by their forensic prowess.

"Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason, but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the life of the person attained." As was well remarked by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] these words have a legal signification or they have not. The difficulty is to determine what they do mean in the connection in which they are used. The meaning of a technical word or word of art can generally be learned, but it is the misfortune of human language, the attempt to describe things and express ideas by signs and sounds, that it is often doubtful what or how much is meant by one or more words, owing to the relation in which they stand to each other in the sentence or the manner in which they are used in treating of the subject in hand. The attempt to arrive at the meaning of this clause has been marked by much ability and ingenuity, and a singular inattention to the meaning of the words attaint and attainder.

"Attainder. The stain or corruption of the blood of a criminal capitally condemned; the immediate, inseparable consequence by the common law on the pronouncing the sentence of death." "He is called attaint, attainted, stained, or blackened. He is no longer of any credit or reputation; he cannot be a witness in any court." "This is after judgment, for there is great difference between a man convicted and attainted." "Upon judgment, therefore, of death, and not before, the attainder of a criminal commences." "The consequences of attainder are forfeiture and corruption of blood."—Toulmin.

"When sentence of death, the most terrible and highest judgment in the laws of England, is pronounced, the immediate inseparable consequence from the common law is attainder." "The doctrine of escheat upon attainder taken singly is this: that the blood of the tenant, by the commission of any felony, is corrupted and stained, and the original donation of the land is thereby determined, it is legal always granted to the vessel upon the implied condition of non haec se gesserit, upon the thorough demonstration of which guilt, by legal attainder, the mutual covenant and bond of fealty are held to be broken, the estate instantly falls back from the offender to the lord of the fee, and the inheritable quality of his blood is extinguished and blotted out forever."—Blackstone.

These are the best texts I have been able to find, and yet they are a little loose. Toulmin seems to use attainder as either cause or effect. He first puts it as the corruption of blood, which at common law was immediately and inseparably consequent upon judgment of death for felony, and next says the consequences of attainder are forfeiture and corruption of blood, thus using attainder as judgment and putting corruption and forfeiture as the consequences. This convertible use of the word occurs through all the books. Blackstone puts attainder as the consequence of judgment of death. And the expression "that the blood of the tenant, by the commission of any felony, is corrupted and stained," would seem inaccurate, unless immediately qualified by the words "upon the thorough demonstration of which guilt by legal attainder," or unless he means that upon such demonstration the consequences attach and revert back to the commission of the felony. And to say that the guilt may or must be demonstrated by attainder, is using attainder in the sense of judgment.

A previous clause prohibits bills of attainder. By bill of attainder, passed by Parliament, either during the life of the party thus attainted or after his death, he was found or declared guilty by legislative enactment, without judicial trial, his blood was corrupted, his heirs disinherited, and his estate forfeited or confiscated. It was deemed so important to exclude this engine of oppression, whose motive-power had always been passion, malice, revenge, and avarice, that it was specially prohibited, though a fair interpretation of other provisions would really attain the same thing.

Then another clause gives to Congress power to punish treason, but limits the effect of an "attainder of treason." That attainder is here used in the more comprehensive sense of judgment, judicial demonstration of guilt, is proved by the prohibition of legislative attainder, and by putting corruption and forfeiture as the things worked by attainder. The limitation is "except during the life." To what does the limitation apply? To the power to punish? or the extent of corruption and forfeiture, the time for which they may occur? or to the time during which they must be accomplished, leaving them, when accomplished, as extensive as they were at common-law? or only upon the common-law effect of attainder or judgment, leaving statutory punishment as broad as the discretion of Congress? or does it limit both the mode and the extent of corruption and forfeiture as a punishment for treason? To a legal mind these questions are as interesting as they are important.

It is a starting point to say the limitation was put there for some purpose. It is our duty, therefore, to give it a meaning that is not absurd, a meaning consistent with the language used, consistent with other parts of the same instrument, and hostile to or inconsistent with the evils to be avoided. But, for the purpose of construction, it ought always to be remembered that the object aimed to be effected by the legislator, when well known and admitted, is rather a lamp to read by than a pen to write with. When language palpably does not accomplish an object, we need not presume, we are required to conclude, that the object was not intended. This case is rendered the more complex because many clear minds have doubts of the objects as well as the language. While the object must always be gathered, if possible, from the language used, it is fair and competent to call to our assistance the light of previous history, existing evils, and contemporaneous opinions. It does not require much generosity to admit that without these aids the technical argument on the other side would have much force.

I have not omitted to observe the point of punctuation made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] and, while I would avail myself of any real assistance to get at the truth, and would not fall back on what he admits to be true, that the law does not punctuate, I must say that I have not been able to see that the clause would mean differently with or without commas from the word but to the word attainted; and the fact that different editions have it three different ways would seem to prove this rather than that either was right or that any was necessary. There are some sentences in our language where right punctuation is not only necessary, but wrong punctuation changes the whole meaning. This is not one of them. If it had said "shall not work any corruption of blood; neither shall it work forfeiture except," &c., it would have seemed to mean what he would have it mean as to forfeiture. It would be quite an era in the history of punctuation when the title to the real estate in half an empire should turn on the question of a sentence being pointed or not pointed here or there by a comma.

In attempting to fix the true meaning of the clause the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] makes an ingenious philological argument to prove that except, as there used, is synonymous with unless; that they are, or were at that day, convertible terms, and that therefore the clause means the same as if it had read "unless during the life of the person attained." If the two words are of the same import exactly, I cannot see what is gained to the argument by an exchange or substitution of one for the other, for it would still be a question, what is the limitation? The argument leaves us where we began. If unless means anything different from except, or suits a given construction better, then that difference of meaning destroys the foundation of the argument, the supposed synonymy.

It may be the most apt words have not been used for limiting the effect to a life estate, saving the fee to the heir. If it had read "for the life of," or "for the term of the life," or "for and during the life," or "an estate for the life of," all doubt would have been excluded. While it is admitted that in conveyancing a life estate may be raised or limited by the habendum to hold during a given life, yet the fact that good lawyers did not use the most apt words of the law to define a life estate, lends plausibility to the idea that they used the word during to express the time when, or during which, a thing must happen or be done, rather than the quantity of estate that should pass, or the time for which it should be held.

But would not the last-named construction involve the absurdity of gravely prohibiting the trial and condemnation of a dead man, and requiring that he shall be accused, convicted, and condemned by judgment pronounced (whereof comes attain) while he yet lives? It palpably could not be done by judicial proceedings except while he lives. Then since the words must have a meaning if possible, and a sensible and consistent meaning being always preferred, are we not driven to the conclusion that the limitation is upon the estate taken, the time for which it may be confiscated to the Government, and not upon the time during which the forfeiture may occur? The latter is in the nature of things and of the attainder here mentioned, and the Constitution could not make it more certain.

The reductio ad absurdum so much relied on, to wit, the alleged folly and impolicy of inflicting for the highest and blackest of crimes a lesser punishment than is or may be competently inflicted for lighter offenses, and of prohibiting to attainder what may be accomplished by sale of the fee under a capias pro fine, and of Government receiving and disposing of a title enduring only from the prison to the scaffold, or as was aptly said the other day, "of the length of the hangman's halter," would be more conclusive to my mind in framing an instrument than in construing it. And then it is no absurdity in a logical or legal sense; the reductio has not occurred, for if the law is so, the absurdity is not in the construction that so reads it, but in the legislation that so made it.

That forfeiture might occur under the Constitution, whether by statute or as the common-law incident of attainder, is sufficiently proved by the use of the word and the limitation "except during." But whether it must come of the statute or of the common law, and if by either then for what time, is quite a different question. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] says it could not come of the common law, because, as to the Government of the United States there is no common law in this country. Is this quite clear? It is readily admitted that there are none but statutory courts, and that jurisdiction of treason and other felonies is conferred by statute, and that the statute does enumerate various offenses and denounce the punishment. But suppose jurisdiction were conferred of treason, murder, and other felonies, without saying more, would not the common-law definition of murder, and the common-law punishment of murder attach as of course? And when the man is on trial for his life, where does the court look for those vital tests and rules by which to determine the sufficiency of the indictment and the relevancy and competency of evidence? To the statute or to the common law? Evidently to the latter. If we say there can be no attainder in this country, or no effect of judgment, as of the common law, for that under the United States there is no common law, everything depending on positive enactment, then seeing the language is used, we can give to it no other effect or sense than as a limitation of the estate to be divested by the law of Congress punishing treason. The gentleman's reasoning drives us infallibly to this conclusion, and without intending it, he has struck the heaviest blow yet dealt against the construction contended for by his friends.

I have partly discussed and must now dispose of the greatest difficulty I have felt in this matter. Congress has power to punish treason, but a limit is put upon the work or effect of an attainder of treason. In the same sentence a power is conferred and a limitation expressed upon the effect of that judicial finding by which alone the power can be executed. Does this limit the power to declare the punishment, or only the effect of the punishment when adjudged? Is it a limitation upon punitive power, upon the legislation by which punishment is declared, or only upon the judgment by which punishment is ordered to be inflicted? Would limiting one be of any effect without limiting both? Does not a limit placed upon one operate as a limit upon the other? Does it only take away from conviction and judgment of death the effect (corruption and forfeiture) resulting under the common law? If so, may not Congress declare what punishment it pleases? In some of the writers, as we have seen, attainder and judgment are used as convertible or synonymous terms, and so are the words attainted and condemned. I think the more accurate and technical use of the word is as a consequence, the tincture, the corruption of blood, its incapacity to inherit or transmit, which invariably and inseparably resulted at the common law from a judgment of death for felony. Technical attainder was not so much the judgment as the corruption worked by that judgment. The judgment did not, in terms, forfeit or corrupt, but worked or drew to itself and upon the criminal these consequences by the ancillary operation of the common law. But the two being so inseparably blended, we may easily see how even good lawyers and accurate writers would come to speak of attainder as judgment. So it seems to be used in the Constitution, else the words "no attainder shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except," &c., being rendered, would read "no corruption of blood or forfeiture shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except," &c.

Then if the term is used as a judgment of treason, is the limitation merely upon the effect of the judgment, or upon the power of Congress to punish? If the expression of one excludes the other, and if Congress is empowered to declare the punishment of treason, and if the limitation is in terms that the attainder or judgment shall not work certain things, is it not a fair conclusion that, if Congress will, the same things may be declared by enactment? May not technical yet correct and legitimate reasoning confine the limitation to the judgment, leaving the punitive power and discretion of Congress unbridled? This construction would make the Constitution mean that Congress may, by enactment, punish treason as it will; but in the absence of any such enactment, or of any penalty other than death, the judgment shall not of itself work corruption or forfeiture beyond or longer than the life of the guilty party. That it must be done, if at all, during the life is in the nature of things, for no dead man is adjudged to be hanged; and, as to judgments, they never did attain anything but warm blood. After bills of attainder were prohibited, an attainder or corruption of blood by judgment could only happen to blood coursing through the veins of a live man. And this is shown by the opinion in all the books, that if a man die or escape in the interval between conviction and judgment of execution, there was no attainder.

It would be disingenuous in me to say that this view has occasioned me no doubt or difficulty. Such a construction would at first seem technically to satisfy the language used. Whether it attains the object intended to be accomplished is quite a different question. The weight of authority, until just now, seems to be decidedly in favor of the idea that the Government can only take a life estate, an estate for the life of the party convicted; that the limitation is upon the punishment, and not merely upon the incidents of the judgment ascertaining guilt and pronouncing punishment. And this idea is in harmony with the avowed purpose of preventing the enormous abuses and the "appetizing effects" that have occurred in other countries, and the growing modern tendency to abandon confiscation, and to punish the person by death or imprisonment. What was accomplished by taking away the common-law effect of sentence, which was not merely the forfeiture of his estate, but the corruption of his blood in himself and posterity, if the same effect might be denounced as a punishment by act of Congress? The heats of civil war and the passions of majorities were things sedulously guarded against in the Constitution. The limitation is equally upon corruption of blood as upon forfeiture, and the limitation shows that corruption might occur. Then here is the fallacy of the technical construction I am combating. If "during the life of" means while he yet lives, it is no limitation upon corruption, which would then occur as fully as of old, since, by judgment, it could only occur to a living man. But if "during" meant for the term of the life the heir is saved of corruption, and the only effect upon the inheritable quality of the blood is to prevent the party from taking during his own life, or the melancholy span of it between the dungeon and the halter, leaving his heir to take his own estate, and whatever the attainted one might have taken but for the temporary disability. It would seem this construction would not prevent the transmission through his blood from his ancestor to his offspring, since the disability of the blood is removed at the death of the guilty party; and had it not been tainted during his own life it would have taken that which now passes at his death. By this construction the heir is not injured either in blood or estate. Nemo est heres viventis. Suppose descent cast by death of a guilty person's ancestor after attainder, and before final execution. Is the whole inheritance defeated, or only held in abeyance until execution, after which the heir of the convict may enter? Or will the heir of the convict take from his remote ancestor during the natural life of his immediate ancestor, upon the ground that the latter is already civilly dead? There is no legal difficulty as to what becomes of the estate. If the Government takes an estate for life and the inheritance is held in abeyance, the Government may enter and hold until the execution of judgment. The alleged folly of the Government concerning itself about receiving and disposing of so short a tenure, or making itself a trustee to support a remainder, does not quite amount to legal reasoning. It may be said that it makes corruption and forfeiture practically nugatory as punishments, and that it had been as well to prohibit them altogether. That may be. But, on the other hand, I ask to be pointed one reason in law, one fact in history, one grievance or misfortune of our ancestors, that would have induced the Convention to take away the well-known, inseparable, immediate, well-defined common-law effect of judgment or attainder of treason, and leave the Congress power to restore it. Congress might punish treason by imprisonment for life, and a forfeiture for that life, which might as easily be a quarter or half a century as a few days. The supposed absurdity involves the death penalty as a fixed fact, when it is not fixed by the Constitution. If no attainder of treason shall of itself work the things prohibited, can Congress say the attainder shall work them? And if they cannot give to the attainder this effect, can they give any such effect to their own legislation? The subject-matter treated of is the power of Congress to punish treason, and can they do by a statute that which it is declared shall not be done by judgment? How would or how could such a statute be enforced except by the judgment of a court? And when the judgment is rendered in exact pursuance of the statute, corrupting the blood for all time and forfeiting the fee, would it not be rather a nice distinction to say this was worked by the statute and not the judgment? The consequences of attainder or judgment of treason were as definitely fixed and known as anything else under the common law. When the Convention took away these consequences, did it not take them away from the punishment of treason to be declared by Congress? Would any other construction be entirely consistent with the constitutional prohibition against bills of attainder? The Constitution is clearly more jealous of the legislature than of the judiciary; it absolutely prohibits Congress from doing it directly by bill acting immediately on the person without trial. If they may accomplish the same thing, as to the living, by statutory punishment to be imposed by a court, when the Constitution says the attainder of treason shall not work this effect, then practically the only effect of the clause against bills of attainder is as to the dead. Is it not probable that the word attainder is here used in the compound or comprehensive sense of guilt, trial, punishment, judgment, and that thus the limitation is upon the punishment, the power of Congress, the consequence of crime, and not merely upon the consequences at common law of the judgment ascertaining the guilt? All will admit that Congress might competently punish treason, or declare the punishment to be fine and imprisonment without the death penalty and without either corruption or forfeiture. Query: would not that be an "attainder of treason" in the sense in which those words are used in the Constitution? If so, and I cannot now see it otherwise, my view is strengthened.

I have not omitted to notice the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts that it would be incompetent for the United States to raise and pass an estate for life by carving it out of the fee, and vest such an estate in the purchaser within those States wherein an estate for life in realty is unknown to the local law, the regulation of titles and estates being under the control of State governments. This is a nicer deference to the power of the State governments than we are in the habit of hearing from those who are urging the measure now before the House. I am quite sure such estates could be raised by deed under the common law in States that do not prohibit such conveyances, and I do not know of any such prohibitions. In any event, if they result from the operation of a "supreme law," they are competent.

Nor have I overlooked the argument of the folly of prohibiting to an attainder what, it is alleged, might be worked by a capias pro fine; of prohibiting the attainder from forfeiting the fee, and yet allowing an amercement which will exhaust the whole estate and pass the fee under execution sale, thus accomplishing indirectly what is prohibited from being directly done. There might be a doubt whether that could be done. I will not give an opinion. But the argument, if well founded, does not quite reach the case. It would be pertinent as touching the fitness of such a distinction, and when the fine goes to the Government, the reason against the "appetizing effect" would be nearly as strong in one case as in the other. But I am now discussing the legal effect of an instrumentality and not the soundness of its policy.

The language of Mr. Madison, in No. 43 of the Federalist, "the Convention have, with great judgment, opposed a barrier to this peculiar danger, by inserting a constitutional definition of the crime, fixing the proof necessary for a conviction of it, and restraining the Congress, even in punishing it, from extending the consequences of guilt beyond the person of its author," shows clearly Mr. Madison's opinion to have been that the limitation is upon the power of Congress, and not merely on the effects of the judgment. Then what was meant by confining the consequences of guilt to the person of the author? It has been urged with much zeal that taking a man's property is punishing his person in the sense here used. I think that it is correct, and think Mr. Madison so viewed it. Then the inference is drawn that taking the fee is a punishment of the person and not of the heir, since the heir has neither natural nor legal right to the estate while the ancestor lives, and therefore a forfeiture or confiscation of the fee is no violation of the Constitution. But the social right of the heir to the inheritance has come to be so universally recognized that with nearly all but legal minds it has come to be regarded as a natural right, so much so that taking away the inheritance does practically punish the heir; and Mr. Madison was addressing the people, and not a learned court, giving them the reasons why they should adopt the Constitution. He offered one they could understand, and his putting it in this unlearned form is the strongest evidence of his understanding of the Constitution. Moreover, Mr. Madison was speaking of the whole clause, and the clause treats of corruption as well as forfeiture; the limitation applies to both, and it is difficult to say that corruption of blood, though occurring in the person of the guilty party, did not injuriously and disgracefully affect posterity, until removed by statute or pardon. Therefore the pertinence of the suggestion that the Convention desired to limit the consequences of guilt to the person of the offender, which would not have been done if unlimited corruption might follow guilt either by statutory denunciation or as the technical consequence of judgment.

The action of the Congress of 1790, in enacting that "no conviction or judgment for any of the offenses aforesaid shall work corruption of blood or any forfeiture of estate," is not of very clear value or import in construing this clause. The prohibition may be held an admission by the Legislature that without the prohibition corruption and forfeiture might have occurred, and, as they had not yet been inflicted by statute, that they would have occurred under the common law as a result or consequence of judgment under the statute; and thus far that section of the act supports the idea that the limitation of the Constitution is upon the effect of a judgment and not upon the power of Congress. On the other hand this legislative judgment of the First Congress, embracing many of the members of the Convention, against all corruption and forfeiture, not allowing the Government to take even a life estate between the judgment and the scaffold, by showing the tendency of opinion would indicate a policy consistent only with the idea that the limitation is upon the power of Congress as well as upon the effect of the judgment. I am inclined to think it does not so much indicate any opinion of the meaning of the Constitution as it does a legislative judgment against the whole policy of confiscation and forfeiture.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STRIVENS] has attempted to cut the gordian knot by a stroke of argument as able as it is bold, in which I understand him to maintain that the rebellion has become a public war, and as such has invested the parties to it with belligerent rights, that the rebel States, so called, are not now a part of the Union, that the Constitution and laws of the United States are inoperative there and have no application, that they are alien enemies, and that the contest is to be governed in all things by the rules of war and international law. I have, for the sake of brevity and grouping, stated the results of his argument in my own language, rather than made extended quotations, and believe I am substantially right. His premises about the publicity of the war are correct, and his conclusion that the war must be managed under the usages of war and of international law is correct. But that his conclusions about the status of the States and people of the South and our power over them and their territory are incorrect, I must be permitted to think I have shown in my speech upon the restoration of civil authority, and will not now repeat the argument.

For the purpose of waging the war the rules of war under the law of nations do obtain; but for all dealings with the citizen and his estate for the purpose of punishing crime, or raising revenue, for anything not a necessary or legitimate war measure the Constitution and laws must obtain. It does not alter the case or help the argument on the other side to call this act a "war measure." Any bill for raising men and money in time of war is a war measure, but the authority therefor is derived, not from the being in a state of war, but from the Constitution. So with the power to punish treason. The laws of war relate to action by military forces and commanders, and not to legislation by this body. The soldier may strike according to those laws and they do not tie his arms. We enact by and under the Constitution. It seems to me that the learned gentleman, instead of gaining power by relying on the laws of war and of nations in lieu of the Constitution, loses it in this, that under our Constitution, and indeed under any Government in the world, the power of the sovereign over the person and property of a rebellious citizen or subject is greater than the power of the same sovereignty over the persons and property of alien enemies. I cannot think this will be denied, and will not argue it. Since the irruption of the Franks and Huns into southern and western Europe, and the conquest of England by the Normans, and the establishment of feudal tenures, I do not believe any war between aliens has been followed by so sweeping a change in the title to realty as has been proposed here. Whatever writers upon international law may say about the text, the practice and the judgment of civilized and Christian nations are against it.

Would it not be more harmonious to say that a war of such dimensions bestows belligerent rights and powers upon both parties for war purposes, whether offensive or defensive, during the existence of the war, and that when armed resistance is overcome and their de facto civil governments dissipated our success will have deprived them of belligerent rights, and reduced them from the status of soldiers to that of citizens and traitors? I extremely regretted the position of the gentleman for another reason. Such a declaration, coming at this time from one who is here and at the South and in other nations esteemed a leader of the dominant party, might have a political and moral effect not at all desirable.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] while disdaining going so far as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, yet says that the real question in the case is whether the unlimited confiscation now sought is a competent war measure under the laws of war, and refers to the late prize case. The court only decided what was before them, and held that the blockade was competent, and that for the purpose of captures on water we might treat persons domiciled in the limits of the rebellion as we would aliens. This does not cover the case. That capture was an act of war, and was adjudged valid for the reasons assigned. We are now treating of legislative power. There are two insurmountable objections to this theory. It would seem to render inoperative and void the constitutional definition and punishment of treason, which is levying war. If, as soon as war exists, the Constitution is suspended, and international law alone obtains, treason, in its guilty sense and punishable form, cannot exist, for under the international code, while you may shoot your enemy as an enemy, you cannot hang him as a traitor. We cannot answer to this that there might be clear cases of treason, under the ruling in Burr's case, where armed resistance in force would amount to a levying of war but would not attain the dignity of a public war. The Constitution does not draw this line. Treason is levying of war, and the argument on the other side strips the levying of much of its guilt and the nation of much of its power. Then such a distinction would be odious. According to it, resisting the tax on a few barrels of whisky would be a greater crime than an immense war to break up the Government. The other objection is, the rule is too uncertain. Under it, our power over men and estates is not derived from a known law and the personal guilt of the party, but the fact of the person and estate being within rebel lines. Then our power ebbs and flows with the successes and defeats of war. As we advance, the area of our power decreases, and as we are driven back the area of our power increases, unless the power, having attached as an incident of accidental and temporary rebel control, remains. Then half of Missouri, two thirds of Kentucky, and all of Tennessee, are to-day obnoxious to this power, even in large districts that are the most intensely loyal on this continent. And, moreover, if the power depends on the source alleged, then traitors and rebels in those parts of States not made alien by rebel possession and control are either exempt or less easily reached, no matter how guilty. It ought to occur to gentlemen that a rule so uneven and uncertain in its workings is not the true rule of the case.

Whoever sees his way clearly to the real and avowed end aimed at by the repealing resolution, which object is the most extensive and the most unmitigated confiscation and forfeiture in the world's history, has stronger convictions and clearer legal perceptions than myself. And when gentlemen denounce as traitors or as rebel sympathizers all who cannot see this matter as they would have it seen, or who, having a doubt, are slow to abandon a construction which has obtained since the foundation of the Government, they forget the amenities of life, and do a thing on this floor which they would be ashamed to do in the presence of any court where their logic has so often vanquished error, and where the graces of their courtly professional demeanor have so often robbed defeat of its ruder pains.

I prefer to leave the original resolution as it was passed on the President's recommendation. It has been my painful duty so often to differ with our amiable Chief Executive that it is now with unaffected pleasure I come to his rescue and hold up his hands; doing this from a conviction of right, and not to prove my loyalty to those who so lately held that to agree with the President in all things was the only true standard of loyalty. The time is not far distant when gentlemen will forget their passions and honor human nature by being ashamed of the day when they allowed a difference of opinion upon a legal question to be made the occasion for the imputation of improper and unworthy sentiments.

Mr. WILSON. I now withdraw the motion to recommit the resolution, and move to strike out the words "except during his life." This amendment being intended to limit the operation and effect of the said resolution and act, and the same are hereby limited, only so far as to make them conformable to section three of article three of the Constitution of the United States; and in lieu thereof to insert, "contrary to the Constitution of the United States;" so that it would read:

That the last clause of a "joint resolution, explanatory of 'An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes,'" approved July 17, 1862, be, and the same hereby is, so amended as to read: "nor shall any punishment or proceeding under said act be so construed as to work a forfeiture of the estate of the offender contrary to the Constitution of the United States: Provided, That no other public warning or proclamation under the act of July 17, 1862, chapter thirty-five, section six, is or shall be required than the proclamation of the President made and published by him on the 25th day of July, 1862, which proclamation so made shall be received and held sufficient in all cases now pending, or which may hereafter arise under said act."

I now demand the previous question on the resolution and amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. This subject will come up to-morrow if we now go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the enrollment bill, and I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. COX moved that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. CRAVENS called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 71, nays 53; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Brooks, William G. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Caffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Gilder, Hale, Hall, Harding, Hargrout, Benjamin G. Harris, Herriek, Holman, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kalfheis, Kernan, King, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Prayn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Scott, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Wadsworth, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Clifton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, and Yeaman—71.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Bailey, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Thomas P. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Hulburd, Jencks, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McLeod, McClure, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward B. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—53.

So the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

During the vote, Mr. STEELE, of New York, stated that his colleague, Mr. STEBBINS, had gone home on account of sickness.

Mr. PERRY stated that he would have voted in the affirmative if he had not paired with Mr. WILDER.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the amendment offered by Mr. WILSON was adopted.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WILSON. I move the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. COX. I demand the yeas and nays upon the passage.

Mr. CRAVENS. As this is an important vote, I move that there be a call of the House.

The motion was not agreed to.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The yeas and nays were ordered on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. WILSON. I shall not probably occupy the hour which is allotted to me in closing this discussion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts whether the gentleman from Iowa can now speak upon the passage of the bill. He certainly could upon the third reading, but the practice has not been to allow it after a bill or resolution has been read the third time. The previous question has been seconded upon the passage of the resolution.

Mr. WILSON. If such is the case I have been under a misapprehension.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state his decision to the House, and they can then dispose of it. The rule of the House allows a gentleman reporting a bill from a committee, after the previous question is sustained, and when no other gentleman has a right to speak, to close debate upon the question. That, under the practice, has always been upon the third reading. The gentleman from Iowa demanded the previous question upon the third reading, but did not avail himself of the opportunity. The joint resolution was then engrossed and read the third time, and the previous question was seconded and the main question ordered upon the passage of the resolution. The Chair decides that the gentleman has not the right to occupy the floor upon the passage of the bill, when he has declined to occupy it upon the third reading.

Mr. WILSON. If that is the rule—and I do not doubt it—I have been misled by some instances which have occurred in the House, one of which was upon an election case.

The SPEAKER. That was on a simple resolution, which is read only once.

Mr. WILSON. Another instance was when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] closed a discussion upon one of the bills of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. That was while amendments were being adopted. The Chair ruled then, in accordance with the usage, that he claimed his right too late—that it should have been exercised before the House commenced voting under the previous question on amendments; and the House gave the gentleman unanimous consent. The gentleman from Iowa has allowed the time to pass when he was entitled to close the debate, but the gentleman can proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. GANSON. I hope there will be no objection upon this side of the House, provided that my colleague, [Mr. KERNAN,] a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, may be heard also, each to be confined to half an hour.

Mr. WILSON. I think I might conclude my remarks in half an hour.

Mr. GANSON. I hope that courtesy will be extended to my colleague.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to such an arrangement? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILSON. I will yield for the present to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KERNAN.]

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. Speaker, I am very reluctant to occupy the time of the House, and it was upon no suggestion of mine that objection was made to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary closing the debate, to the end that I should say a few words. I had a desire at an earlier stage of this debate to state my views in reference to this question.

Now, sir, as I have observed this discussion, and as I understand it, those who insist that the Federal Government can forfeit the lands of the people in rebellion in fee, may properly be divided into three classes, first, those who insist that by a correct interpretation of the Constitution we can so forfeit them; secondly, those who insist that though, when we punish traitors by a trial and conviction, we cannot forfeit their lands in fee, nevertheless we may in some other mode than by trial and conviction punish them by a forfeiture in fee; and, thirdly, those who insist that the law under consideration has nothing to do with treason; that we are not dealing with traitors in the eye of the law; are not seeking to punish them for treason; but that we are dealing with them as belligerents, and, by virtue of the law of nations, may confiscate their lands forever.

Now, sir, I dissent from these propositions, and although I must express myself briefly, I desire to say a few words upon each of these points. I regard the question involved a very important one; I feel as earnestly as man can feel, that the policy of Congress in reference to this question of confiscation has very much to do with the present and future welfare of the country; and I would urge upon our political opponents that they have as deep an interest in this question as we have, their welfare is bound up in the preservation of this Government and this Union, and if we can satisfy them that this policy of confiscation is unwise, that it does not tend to the preservation of this Union and this Government, I should hope that they would vote with us on this question; and I appeal to each man—not in the hope that in a brief half hour I can argue them into my belief—but I appeal to every man who differs with me to consult his own good judgment, and then say whether we can pass this law without violating the Constitution, without running against the laws of nations, or without inaugurating a policy which will be destructive rather than preservative of this Government in which we have all so much at stake.

Now, sir, first, what is the correct interpretation of the Constitution on this subject, and to that point I shall give but a few minutes of the time accorded to me. Let it be remembered that when the Constitution was made, there were but two modes by the law of England by which a man's property could be forfeited in punishment of treason; one was by bill of attainder, by an act of Parliament which condemned a man and forfeited his estate without allowing him to be heard in a court of justice, and without any of the safeguards which, by the law of England, in the most arbitrary times, a man had, when he was brought into a court of justice and condemned through its instrumentality.

Now, sir, this mode the Constitution expressly prohibits in the language so often alluded to, that "No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed." This mode of forfeiting estates for treason, to wit, by act of Parliament, equivalent under our form of Government to doing so by act of Congress, the framers of the Constitution deemed it wise to forbid absolutely, and they did so in the first article of that instrument by the provision I have stated.

There was then left the other mode known to the law of England of forfeiting a man's estate for treason, a political offense, namely, by trial and condemnation by a court of justice. The framers of the Constitution made provisions as to this mode. In article three, section three, they define treason; they declare that no person shall be convicted of this crime unless on the testimony of two witnesses, or on his confession in open court, and that Congress shall have power to punish it, but "no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the life of the person attained."

Now, sir, mark that the framers of the Constitution were in this article dealing with the only mode known to the law of England, after the bill of attainder was abolished, by which a person could be punished by forfeiture of his estate for treason. They prescribe that "no attainder of treason" shall work forfeiture of estate except during the life of the person. What is the meaning of "attainder of treason" in legal language? It is the effect, the consequence of judgment pronounced by the court against a person who had been tried and convicted of treason. Blackstone says:

"Upon judgment of death, and not before, the attainder of a criminal commences; and therefore either upon judgment of outlawry or of death for treason or felony, a man shall be said to be attained."

Again he says:

"Forfeiture does not take effect unless an attainder be had, of which it is one of the fruits; and therefore if a traitor dies before judgment is pronounced, or is killed in open rebellion, or is hanged by martial law, it works no forfeiture of his land, for he never was attained of treason."

That is, he never was convicted and judgment pronounced against him for treason. "Attainder of treason," therefore, in its legal and constitutional sense, signifies one of the consequences, one of the effects of conviction and judgment by a court for the crime of treason. This effect, by the law of England at the time the Constitution was made, was the forfeiture of the estate of the offender. When, therefore, the framers of the Constitution, in the article which defines treason, prescribe the evidence requisite to convict, and grant the power to Congress to declare its punishment, and declare that "no attainder of treason," that is, no conviction and judgment against a person for treason, shall work a forfeiture of his estate except during his life, is it not clear that they intended to, and by the language used clearly did, limit the power of Congress in punishing by forfeiture to the taking of a life estate? Is it not clear that we are forbidden by the Constitution to forfeit the lands of those in rebellion by way of punishment for their treason against the Government, beyond their estates therein for life?

This is the construction given to this portion of the Constitution by Mr. Madison in the Federalist. Judge Story is clear and unequivocal that this is its meaning. In section twelve hundred and ninety-two of his Commentaries on the Constitution, after speaking of the grant of power to Congress to declare the punishment of treason, he says:

"Two motives probably concurred in introducing it as an express power. One was, not to leave it open to implication whether it was to be exclusively punishable with death according to the known rule of the common law, and with the barbarous accompaniments pointed out by it; but to confide the punishment to the discretion of Congress. The other was to impose some limitation upon the nature and extent of the punishment, so that it should not work corruption of blood or forfeiture beyond the life of the offender."

Now, I appeal to gentlemen whether they will at this time, in the midst of civil war, under the influence, to a greater or less degree, of the passions which civil war always excites, attempt by ingenuity to interpret the Constitution differently from the sages who framed, and the learned commentator who, in peaceful times, gave a construction to this part of it which commanded the approval of all who sought a correct interpretation of it. Unless the latter part of the clause of the Constitution under consideration limits the power of Congress in punishing treason by forfeiture, why was it inserted at all? The first part of the clause grants to Congress the power to declare the punishment of treason. If it was intended that there should be power to forfeit estates in fee the latter part is meaningless, I submit.

Again, there is another fact to which I wish to call attention. Every man interpreting the Constitution or a statute should see what the law was when it was made. What was the law of England on this subject when our Constitution was made? The framers of the Constitution were naturally acting on this subject in reference to the laws of England, whence we drew most of our laws and most of our traditions. Now, it should be remembered that as early as 1708, by the twenty-first chapter of Anne, the British Parliament abolished forfeiture for treason beyond the life of the offender. Chancellor Kent says that the humanizing and Christianizing influences of modern times and the force of public opinion had wrought to that degree in England, a land at that time often torn by treasonable factions and practices, that by that statute they changed their law; and although it may be true, as the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] stated this morning, that in England the tenures to lands are different from ours, yet this was so then; and from that time down to this the law has been that no conviction of treason produced a forfeiture of estate beyond the life of the party convicted. The founders of our Government, the framers of a Constitution for a country which from its institutions would naturally have political excitements, factions, and treasonable practices perchance, think you that they meant to leave to the majority the right to do, in reference to forfeiting lands in punishment of treason, that which had been abolished in England for more than fifty years at the time this Constitution was made?

I therefore submit to gentlemen, to lawyers, to statesmen, to the constructors of constitutions and statutes, whether they will stand for a moment on the interpretation that, by a fair reading of the Constitution, we have power to take away as punishment for treason anything but the life estate of the offender.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. My respect for the gentleman's opinion as a lawyer moves me to ask him to indulge me in putting to him a single question on which I wish to have his opinion.

Mr. KERNAN. I will hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Does the gentleman suppose that the prohibition in the Constitution applies to personal property as well as to real estate?

Mr. KERNAN. Well, sir, I myself would so suppose on reading the Constitution, and I cannot see why it ought not to be so. And yet, although I have thought on that subject, the gentleman from Maryland will pardon me for not wishing to discuss it now, because "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." This legislation is with reference to taking the lands of the people of the South and confiscating them forever. It is our power to do this which I wish now to discuss. I fear it will be one of the most disastrous lines of policy on which we can enter, hoping and desiring as I do that we shall bring the mass of the inheritors of these lands and their fathers to live with us and our children in peace in the old Union and under a common Government.

Gentlemen see what the law in England was at the time our Constitution was adopted. There was no forfeiture of lands in England beyond the life estate for treason. Gentlemen see that one mode of forfeiting estates, by bill of attainder, was prohibited in express language by the Constitution.

They see what evidence was required by our Constitution for a conviction of treason; and that it was declared that no attainder of treason (that is, a conviction and judgment on a trial in a court) should take away lands beyond the life estate. Gentlemen see what have been the opinions of commentators on the subject from that time to this. I appeal to every lawyer here and throughout the land whether he ever dreamed that Judge Story was not right when he said that the intention of the framers of the Constitution was to limit the punishment by forfeiture for treason so that it would not extend beyond the life estate of the offender.

Shall we not then adhere to this construction of the Constitution, and legislate in accordance with it? Let us not yield to this new interpretation, which has been put forth elsewhere, and which has been contended for here, and by which the clause in question is made to mean only that the proceeding against a party for treason or the attainder of treason must be during the lifetime of the traitor. When bills of attainder were abolished I am not aware of any mode known to our or the English law by which a dead man could be tried or attainted for treason.

Secondly, it is true, as argued by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] and others, that although the meaning of the Constitution is what we claim on this side of the House, which he conceded, and that where a person is tried, convicted, and sentenced, his life estate only can be forfeited, nevertheless that his lands may be forfeited forever by act of Congress or in some other mode, provided we do not try or convict him at all, provided we take his lands by a proceeding wherein he has not the opportunity to prove he is innocent of treason if this be true, and wherein it is not required to confront him with "two witnesses to the same overt act" to establish his guilt? I submit that this position is not tenable; regarding the act of Congress under consideration as one to forfeit a man's property for treason without trial, it is equivalent to a "bill of attainder," which is expressly prohibited by the Constitution, and is therefore a void act.

But again, the wise men who framed the Constitution, when they declared in that instrument that you could only forfeit a man's life estate where you gave him a fair trial in court and convicted him of treason did not intend to be and were not so careless in reference to the principles of justice and of freedom, or so inconsistent as to give power to the majority of a legislative body, likely to be often moved by political excitement and by partisan feelings, to forfeit forever the lands of a party for a political offense without his having the benefit of a trial. No, sir, they were men who knew too well the dangers of such proceedings; the history of proceedings in England by bills of attainder was familiar to them; they were too loyal to liberty and those principles by which alone free Governments are sustained and perpetuated to be guilty of such folly.

The gentleman says that by this act of Congress we are dealing with men in armed rebellion against the Government; that we are not proposing to try them for treason. What is armed rebellion against the Government but treason? Can you punish by legal proceedings armed rebellion differently by calling it by some other name than treason? It is treason, and nothing else. Does the gentleman mean to contend that while we cannot by trying and convicting the offender of treason in a court of justice forfeit his land beyond his life estate we can under and by virtue of an act of Congress forfeit his land forever without trial, without the evidence required by the court to convict him, and without his having an opportunity to be heard in his defense?

But I must pass from this point. Gentlemen say that this is a proceeding in rem, and that the right of trial by jury is got rid of because it is a trial in a court of admiralty. I will not argue that question. With great deference to others, I ask any lawyer in the House where he ever heard of a proceeding in rem in a court of admiralty against real estate; where he ever heard of setting a court in motion under our Constitution to proceed and condemn lands because the owners had violated the laws, and that, too, without their being entitled to a trial before a jury?

It is not disputed that in cases falling within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction the courts of the United States may condemn property without trial by jury. But I am not aware that lands can be thus adjudicated and condemned, or that the court can, according to the Constitution, be vested with any such jurisdiction over real estate. In common-law cases, as distinguished from those of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, a party in the courts of the United States is entitled to a trial by jury. The Constitution, article three, section two, provides that "the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury." Article seven of the Amendments declares, "in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved." Again, the Constitution declares, "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." In view of these provisions of the Constitution, I submit to the House that so far as this law purports to authorize the courts to proceed in the manner of courts of admiralty and adjudicate upon, condemn, and sell the lands of those charged with treason, it is unconstitutional and void. I submit to the sound judgment of every member of the House whether title to property can, under our Constitution and laws, be divested or conferred by such proceedings.

Mr. Speaker, I pass from this question to the proposition which was put forth with so much boldness and ability by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] He insists that the law under consideration has nothing to do with treason; that it is not a law to punish treason or traitors; that the people within the insurrectionary States are at war with the United States, and by this law we are dealing with them, not as rebels against the rightful authority of the United States, but as "alien enemies;" that the insurgents are not subjects of the United States Government, but of foreign States at war with the United States; that the territory of the so-called confederate States is foreign territory; that by the acts of secession and war against the authority of the Constitution and laws of the Union they have abrogated them, and are to be treated, during the war and after resistance is suppressed, as foreign people, and their territory as foreign territory acquired by conquest. And he insists that by the law of nations we are authorized, regarding them as foreign enemies, to confiscate their lands in fee, absolutely and forever.

I understand him to derive the authority to confiscate the lands of those in rebellion not from the Constitution, but from the law of nations. That I may not misstate his position, I extract the following from his remarks as reported in the Globe:

"Here is no attainder for treason, here is no confiscation of property under any provision of the Constitution. Then the law goes on to state how you are to seize and condemn property. It is to be seized and proceeded against in rem, according to the law for that purpose, and condemned. As what? As the property of traitors? No such thing. Condemned as 'enemies' property.' Does not that show that the Constitution has nothing to do with it on the question of treason? Here are a body of men in arms against the United States. This act of Congress, so far as it refers to seizures of property in fee, refers to them as seizures of the property of alien enemies, to be treated as such."

"Others hold that, having committed treason, renounced their allegiance to the Union, discarded its Constitution and laws, organized a distinct and hostile government, and by force of arms having arisen from the condition of insurgents to the position of an independent Power de facto, and having been acknowledged as a belligerent both by foreign nations and our own Government, the Constitution and laws of the Union are abrogated so far as they are concerned, and that, as between the two belligerents, they are under the laws of war and the laws of nations alone, and that whichever Power conquers may treat the vanquished as conquered provinces, and may impose upon them such conditions and laws as it may deem best."

"In order rightly to determine this question we must inquire whether the 'confederate States' are to be considered as a hostile people, entitled to no other protection or privileges than are due to foreign nations at war with each other. Is the present contest to be regarded as a public war, and to be governed by the rules of civilized warfare, or only as a domestic insurrection, to be suppressed by criminal prosecutions before the courts of the country? If the latter, then the insurgents when proceeded against have a right to invoke the protection of the Constitution and municipal laws. If the former, then they are subject to the laws of war alone."

"It is not a question of punishing under the Constitution but outside of it. These men are enemies, and we are treating them as enemies; and I have no doubt that as States they are at war with us."

"We do not so treat them until we have conquered the country held by the confederate States. Covered by the confederate flag it is foreign country. When we do conquer it, it is a conquered country. Any other principle would render all our conduct inconsistent and anomalous."

"From all this the legitimate conclusion is, that all the people and all the territory within the limits of the organized States which, by a legitimate majority of their citizens renounced the Constitution, took their States out of the Union, and made war upon the Government, are, so far as they are concerned, subject to the laws of the State; and, so far as the United States Government is concerned, subject to the laws of war and of nations, both while the war continues and when it shall be ended."

"By the laws of war the conqueror may seize and convert to his own use everything that belongs to the enemy. This may be done while the war is relating to weaken the enemy, and when it is ended the things seized may be retained to pay the expenses of the war and the damages caused by it. Towns, cities, and provinces may be held as a punishment for an unjust war, and as security against future aggressions. The property thus taken is not confiscated under the Constitution after conviction for treason, but is held by virtue of the laws of war. No individual crime need be proved against the owners. The fact of being a belligerent enemy carries the forfeiture with it. Here was the error of the President when he vetoed the confiscation bill passed by Congress. In the confusion of business he overlooked the distinction between a traitor and a belligerent enemy."

In answer to these positions I submit, and I put this to every member of the House, is not the act under consideration a law to punish treason—to punish men who have been or shall be engaged in rebellion against the rightful authority of the Government of the United States; who have in violation of their duty and allegiance attempted and are now endeavoring to overthrow the Government of the United States, which Government it is our right and duty to defend, and the authority of the Constitution and laws of which we have a right to compel them to submit to? If we abandon this position—if it is true, that by this act we are legislating in reference to public enemies in the legal sense, and not in reference to domestic traitors—I cannot believe that any considerable number of the members of the House would vote for the bill. Does one sovereign Power, while at war with another, enact laws confiscating the lands owned by individuals of and which lands are situated within the enemy's territory? I submit it is an unheard-of proceeding.

This law is one designed to punish treason, not to apply to public enemies engaged in a public war; and it must not be in violation of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. A public war is that waged by one people by its sovereign or Government against another which carries it on through its sovereign or Government. This is not such a war. The United States wage it to suppress armed resistance by individuals owing obedience to its laws; to retain its rightful jurisdiction and authority over a portion of its territory. We are not waging war against a foreign nation to redress a wrong or to vindicate a right, but we are employing armed force to suppress rebellion within our own territory against the authority of our Constitution and laws over it.

It appears to me that if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is correct, then secession is an accomplished fact. By the void and illegal ordinances of secession, and the armed rebellion against the authority of the United States Government in support of them, those in rebellion have taken the southern States out of the Union. This I deny. They have not abrogated the Constitution and laws of the Union as to the territory or the people who inhabit it. By illegal violence they have and do prevent the enforcement thereof of the Constitution and laws; we have the right to and are engaged in restoring their authority by suppressing the rebellion. In doing this we have certain belligerent rights, but when this is accomplished the southern States are a part of the Union, not by virtue of reconstruction or readmission, not as conquered territory, but because they were never out of the Union. The exercise of the jurisdiction of the Federal Government was obstructed and suspended by armed insurrection within the territory of these States. When this is subdued the States are constituent members of the Union, and the people within them are amenable to the Constitution and laws of the United States, to be protected by them in their rights, and to be punished as prescribed by them for their crimes. If the views of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] are correct, then we should recognize the so-called confederate authorities; then they are rightfully entitled to treat with the Government of the United States for and on behalf of the people of the States in which the rebellion exists. This I deny. These leaders, in my view, are usurpers, having no rightful authority to negotiate with the Government of the United States on behalf of the southern people. The States have not rebelled; it is individuals or combinations of individuals within those States who have rebelled. The States are not to be punished or disfranchised on account of the rebellion; the individuals who have violated the laws by organizing armed resistance are liable to be punished according to law when we have overcome the insurrection so that the law can be enforced.

But, if it be conceded that this is a public war against a foreign enemy or government, and that the southern people are to be regarded as alien enemies, and their territory when the rebellion is suppressed is to be deemed territory acquired by conquest, rather than our own territory in which the authority of the Constitution and laws has been vindicated against rebels, we have no right by the law of nations to confiscate lands owned by private persons. What is the law of nations? I understand it to be that usage which prevails and is sanctioned by civilized and Christian nations. The law of nations governing war and the rights of belligerents and conquerors is this usage among nations which has come to have the authority of law, and the violation of which would subject the offending Government to the condemnation of the civilized and Christian world. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] contends that this law authorizes us to confiscate in fee the lands of the inhabitants of the southern States, and he derives our right to do so from this law of nations and not from the Constitution; that we do not forfeit their lands in punishment of them for treason, but as a right over them which we have by the law of nations, treating them as persons who never owed allegiance to our Government, whom we had conquered.

I submit that the law of nations as understood and practiced in modern times gives no such right; and that all modern publicists and authorities are against the position contended for.

Whenton, in his Elements of International Law, page 420, says:

"But by the modern usage of nations, which has now acquired the force of law, private property on land is also exempt from confiscation with the exception of such as may become booty in special cases when taken from enemies in the field, or in besieged towns, and of military contributions levied upon the inhabitants of the hostile territory. This exemption in extends even to the case of an absolute and unequal conquest of the enemy's country. In ancient times both the movable and immovable property of the vanquished passed to the conqueror. Such was the Roman law of war, often asserted with unrelenting severity; and such was the fate of the Roman provinces subdued by the northern barbarians on the decline and fall of the western empire. A large portion, from one third to two thirds of the lands belonging to the vanquished provincials, was confiscated and partitioned among the conquerors. The last example in Europe of such a conquest was that of England by William of Normandy. Since that period, among the civilized nations of Christendom, conquest, even when confirmed by a treaty of peace, has been followed by no general or partial transmutation of landed property. The property belonging to the Government of the vanquished nation passes to the victorious State, which also takes the place of the former sovereign in respect to the eminent domain. In other respects private rights are unaffected by conquest."

Vattel lays down in substance the same law. Mr. Adams in 1816, in a letter to Lord Castlereagh, said:

"But as by the same usage of civilized nations private property is not the subject of lawful capture in war upon the land, it is perfectly clear that in every stipulation private property shall be respected, or that upon the restoration of places during the war it shall not be carried away."—American State Papers, 116, &c.

Chief Justice Marshall says, in 7 Peters, pages 86, 87:

"It may not be unworthy of remark that it is very unusual, even in cases of conquest, for the conqueror to do more than to displace the sovereign and assume dominion over the country. The modern usage of nations, which has become law, would be violated, that sense of justice and of right which is acknowledged and felt by the whole civilized world would be outraged, if private property should be generally confiscated and private rights annulled. The people change their allegiance; their relation to their ancient sovereign is dissolved; but their relations to each other and their rights of property remain undisturbed. If this be the modern rule even in cases of conquest, who can doubt its application in the case of an amicable cession of territory?"

Another gentleman who has addressed the House stated that the law of nations authorized the party successful in war to do what he pleased with the subjugated people. Vattel, who wrote over one hundred years ago, and when the law of nations was harsher than it can be successfully claimed to be at this day, says in Book III, page 388:

"But if the entire State be conquered, if the nation be subdued, in what manner can the victor treat it without transgressing the bounds of justice? What are his rights over the conquered country? Some have dared to advance this monstrous principle, that the conqueror is absolute master of his conquest, that he may dispose of it as his property, that he may treat it as he pleases, according to the common expression of treating a State as a conquered country; and hence they derive one of the sources of despotic government."

Now, I submit whether there is a member of this House who desires or is willing to have this great nation of ours, great and powerful as I believe it to be, able to vindicate itself in any just cause, violate the usage of Christian and civilized nations; disregard those rules and maxims which in the language of Chief Justice Marshall have become law; and whatever Government violates them, particularly if it be powerful and its opponent weak, subjects itself to the scorn and condemnation of the civilized world. Are we prepared to say that we are willing to enter upon a system of confiscation, in virtue of our right as conquerors which the civilized world denounces, which Wheaton says has never been exercised in Christian Europe since the time of William the Norman, and which, he says, the code of civilized and Christian countries forbids under the ban of being barbarous, and of going back to the times when force alone, untempered by mercy or Christianity or civilization, rode destructively over all that came in its way? For the sake of the character of our country, for the sake of our reputation, claiming to be a great civilized and Christian people, for the sake of keeping that standing before the civilized world which we are entitled to in this war, I protest against the idea that we are to enter upon a system of confiscation which has been ignored by civilized nations at war during the last five or six hundred years. Why, sir, it seems to me that nothing could be more fatal to us. While we stand before the world prosecuting this war to defend and maintain the Union, to subdue those who are endeavoring to destroy it, who are in arms to overturn this beneficent Government, we will have the respect and sympathy of foreign nations. Let us not forfeit this position. Let us take no step, inaugurate no policy which will authorize it to be said that we, over twenty million people, are waging a war against eight million with the purpose of making it a war of conquest to strip them of their property, and to distribute it among camp-followers and speculators, among the men who are not of the Army when battles are to be fought, but follow in its wake to share in the plunder when with safety it can be reached. Why, Story says, in substance, that one of the reasons for prohibiting confiscation for treason beyond the life estate was to cut off that swarm of greedy and insatiate plunderers who are ever, under the cry of loyalty and the public good, pushing those in power on to vindictive measures, with no higher or more patriotic motive than a desire to share in the plunder which they call for in the name of patriotism.

Why, sir, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is right we ought to recognize these confederate authorities. Then they are the leaders of the people waging war with us, rightfully their leaders. Now, I have been opposed to recognizing them, opposed to negotiating with them. I consider them, in the language of a resolution for which I voted, usurpers and traitors, having no right or authority over the people of the South and no right to bind them; and therefore I have been for overthrowing them, for scattering their armies, for delivering from their rule the mass of the people of the South who owe allegiance to this Government, and whom the Administration should desire to bring back under the Constitution and laws of the Union, that we may go on hereafter peacefully and happily as we have hitherto in a career of individual and national prosperity.

But again, if we had the constitutional and legal right to forfeit forever the lands of the mass of the people who have taken part in this rebellion, to turn them and their children from them, and sell them to others, do gentlemen believe it would be a wise policy to do so? Would this tend to the speedy suppression of resistance or to that state of things among the people of the southern States which all, when they divest themselves of the irritation produced by this civil war, must hope and desire to see after it is successfully ended? I consider that our main object is to bring the mass of these people back to form a part of and strengthen our Government. Do gentlemen believe that such legislation as this under consideration will aid in this matter? Will it not strengthen those leaders in the South? Will they not be able to point to it and say to their people, "You have nothing to hope for but victory or death; you see it declared by the legislative assembly of the United States that we are alien enemies, and that they have the right to forfeit all our lands, and are disposed to do it?" Will it not be worth everything to them in these despairing times of their rebellion? Will it not enable the leaders to stimulate and intensify the southern people by pointing to the Congress of the United States as being engaged in making laws the policy and effect of which will be to take from the mass of the people of the South and their children all their property? Let us rather unite our people and exert all our power in overthrowing armed resistance, showing at the same time that when that is overthrown the mass of the people in these States are not to be treated as a conquered or subjugated people, but dealt with according to the Constitution and laws of the Union; that as to the mass there will be amnesty on liberal terms, to the end that they may be contented citizens of this Republic; that they may again be devoted to the Union; that they may return feeling how much they were wronged by the leaders who led them into this rebellion, and how much they profited by its overthrow and the restoration of the authority of the Constitution over them.

Mr. WILSON. Mr Speaker, in closing the discussion on this joint resolution, it is not my purpose to follow the general course of argument in which gentlemen opposed to it have indulged. The discussion has taken a wide range, embraced a great variety of topics, and treated of almost every question connected with the subject of confiscation except the one presented by the resolution. This course having been adopted by the other side of the House, rendered it proper for the friends of the policy of confiscation to reply to the arguments advanced in opposition thereto. This has been done, successfully done; and I shall not waste the time of the House by adding anything to the lengthy discussion which has taken place concerning questions not presented by the measure now before us for our consideration.

That confiscation should be a part of our public policy with regard to persons engaged in this wicked rebellion was settled by the Thirty-Seventh Congress after most careful consideration of the subject and elaborate discussion. That policy is now embodied in the living law of the land, and is not before us for reconsideration; and all that has been said upon it by the opponents of this resolution has resulted in a waste of time. Whether the policy established by the confiscation act of 1862 is wise or unwise, constitutional or unconstitutional, unjust or merciful, creditable to the civilization of the high noon of the century, or a relapse into barbarism, are not questions upon which we are now called to pass judgment. When some gentleman opposed to the policy established by that act can so far defy the loyal people of this nation as to introduce a bill to repeal the act, these questions can be with propriety discussed. But they are demanding no attention at our hands now. The measure before us excludes them all from the bounds of legitimate discussion. We are dealing with another question, as I shall endeavor to show before I conclude my remarks.

The main object with gentlemen on the other side of the House has been to avoid the question presented by the joint resolution by talking about something else, taking in their range almost every subject from a bloody-handed traitor to an unborn babe. The effort to avoid the issue upon which we are to pass has been studiously and persistently pursued. But, sir, I do not intend to let this system of opposition succeed because gentlemen have raised a cloud of dust, composed of particles of almost every foreign subject, under cover of which to escape. The fact shall appear patent to the whole country that they stand here objecting to an application of the penalties which the Constitution has provided for the punishment of traitors to the Government to those wicked men who have filled this whole land with sorrow and mourning, and dotted our broad dominion with the graves of liberty's martyrs. A pretended respect for the teachings of our advanced civilization, an assumed reverence for the great humanitarian principles of the age, an arrogated love for the divine attribute of mercy cannot shield them from that just condemnation which is due to all who stand between this imperiled nation and the just exercise of its admitted powers in the great trial to which the old-time allies of the opposers of this resolution have subjected it. I would not be harsh beyond the just measure of the hour; but my patience has been exhausted by this prolonged effort to shield rebels from the infliction of the merited punishment which their unparalleled crimes invoke, and which the opposers of this measure admit may be inflicted without breach of our national Constitution, which admission shall stand in proof against them before I conclude; and, sir, this admission shall perform the additional office of lodging against the Constitution every denunciation and blow which has been aimed at the joint resolution. The other side of the House shall stand as the party assailing the Constitution, not this side. This shall be the attitude of the case, or the gentlemen who sit over the way must admit that their denunciations of the joint resolution are void of sincerity, and wholly without justification; and I care not which position they assume, for both are bad enough, and either is discomfiture and defeat to them.

The positions assumed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] are substantially those of every other member who has spoken in opposition to this joint resolution. His premises have been adopted by all the rest; and by them all may be tested. They are all sailing in the same leaky and dilapidated boat. The treacherous craft was constructed and launched by him, and his crew has headed her on the shoals since her first sailing. Rudder and compass she has had none, and she belongs to the confederate navy.

The gentleman from Ohio told us that the Constitution of the United States does not authorize the forfeiture of real estate in fee simple, that the words, "no attainer of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted," absolutely prohibit the forfeiture of realty in fee simple, and based his argument on the limitation contained in the words "except during the life of the person attainted." This he solemnly affirmed as his belief. How sincerely he believes it, and how sincerely those believe it who have since reiterated it, I will endeavor to show as I progress with my remarks.

I would not do the gentleman injustice; and that I may not misstate his position, I quote from his speech as follows:

"It seems to have been adopted by the dominant party in this House that this confiscation system shall, if possible, be carried out in the South. They cannot do it and make it effective under the Constitution. They must do it over that instrument and in spite of its limitations. All the forfeiture which they can obtain under the Constitution is simply the life estate of those who are convicted of treason; and, as that life estate is no longer than the halter with which a man is hung, the results would not be worth the pains."

Early in his speech the gentleman assured us that this was his understanding of the Constitution. Doubtless he gave utterance to the conviction which directed his judgment at the moment; but the conviction gave way and his judgment stood reversed before he had progressed far with his remarks. In no other way can I account for his subsequent attacks on the joint resolution under consideration, unless I should charge him with want of sincerity in stating his construction of the Constitution. The latter would be uncharitable, perhaps unparliamentary, but most likely true.

When the gentleman came to speak of the joint resolution, he told us:

"This bill reaches beyond the guilty traitor, and involves by a posthumous punishment the innocent and good, ay, even the unborn innocents. It inflicts on the children of the guilty the punishment due to the parents; and the gentleman from Indiana, who seems from his speech and countenance to be benevolent, shows that in fact he partakes of the ferocious humanity of the hour by arguing in favor of a bill to punish the inoffensive offspring of the traitors."

Further on the gentleman renews his attack in these words:

"I am shocked that in this age and in this country and in this House I am required to stand up before the American people, and, as a matter of pure philanthropy and common decency, protest against the cruel and remorseless character of bills of this kind, and to defend the rights of those who have committed no crime, but upon whom it is proposed to visit, after the death of the parent, the crimes of the ancestors."

Sir, the "common decency" which "required" the gentleman to make these attacks on the joint resolution, in view of his own construction of the Constitution, was enough to shock any man, and I do not wonder that he felt "shocked." But I am inclined to the opinion that it was the conflict between his own positions which "shocked" him, and not the character of the resolution; for the conflict was certainly as great as the "decency" of the attack was "common."

The joint resolution was printed; he had it before him; he had read it; and found in it this language:

"Nor shall any punishment or proceeding under said act be so construed as to work a forfeiture of the estate of the offender, except during his life."

This is the constitutional limitation repeated. The joint resolution follows the Constitution; and yet the gentleman would have us believe him sincere when he tells us that certain words used in the Constitution forbid the forfeiture of real estate in fee simple, but that the same words, when used in a joint resolution of Congress, authorize the forfeiture of real estate absolutely and forever, and call upon him "as a matter of pure philanthropy and common decency to protest" against the great outrage of overriding the Constitution of the United States with a congressional joint resolution, thus placing, by his peculiar system of reasoning, a joint resolution of Congress above and beyond the Constitution. Did ever man invent a more absurd proposition? Can it be a matter of surprise that the gentleman was "shocked," "shocked" by the unsurpassed absurdity of his own proposition?

Sir, the gentleman need not be alarmed. His associates may repose in perfect tranquillity and undisturbed security. We propose to give them "the Constitution as it is"—nothing more, nothing less. It may be that this is just the thing they do not want. I think most likely this is the case; for their opposition to the proposed use of the language of the Constitution evidences the existence of a fear in their minds that the Constitution is against them. Indeed, sir, I will go further, and say that this fear has quickened into a conviction and ripened into the fruit of an unqualified admission that the Constitution is against them and receives on its firm breast all of the malignant shafts which have been hurled at the joint resolution. It is the Constitution which these gentlemen have denounced, not the joint resolution. May we not soon expect the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox,] in response to the requirement of "common decency," to rise in his place and "protest against the cruel and remorseless character" of the Constitution? The long line of generations of "unborn innocents," whose guardian he seems to be, stands in danger from the free exercise of the powers of the Constitution, soon to be unfettered by the passage of this resolution. And as the gentleman cannot climb over the Constitution nor push it out of its firm and faithful track, it would be well for him to cast himself before it and let it pass over him, that he may die a martyr to the doctrine that leniency toward rebels is of more importance to this nation than that stern justice which demands that the full measure of punishment shall be meted out to the traitors who have written three years of this country's history in the best blood of the Republic.

It may be that some gentlemen on the other side of the House do not believe that the Constitution will permit the forfeiture of real estate in fee simple. Of course this remark does not apply to the gentlemen over there who have spoken upon the joint resolution; for they have all denounced the "cruel and remorseless" terms of the Constitution which are copied into the resolution because they do authorize such forfeiture. But all of those who have not spoken may not concur in this opinion of their political associates, and therefore it may be proper for me to further remind them that the resolution is not the monster it has been represented to be. It is not a legislative Procrustes, insisting that all things must conform to its inexorable measure of length; stretching constitutions and cutting off the legs of political confessions of faith so as to fit all to its unyielding bed. It neither affirms nor denies any proposition which has been advanced on either side of the House. It does not attempt to construe the Constitution, nor does it require any one to surrender his opinions concerning that instrument. Those persons only who are opposed to the Constitution have any reason to declaim against this resolution. You have all had it before you. You have all read it, and know that its office is declared in these plain words:

"This amendment being intended to limit the operation and effect of the said resolution and act, and the same are hereby limited, only so far as to make them conformable to section three of article three of the Constitution of the United States."

This does not read like an attempt to give a legislative construction to the Constitution, or a demand upon sensitive gentlemen to surrender their convictions as to the true intent and meaning of that instrument. There could be no plainer declaration of an intention to conform the law to the Constitution than this. But this is the "cruel and remorseless" proposition which so sadly "shocked" the sensitive organization of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox,] and produced such painful effects on the minds of those of his associates who, like him, believe in "the Constitution as it is." I am sorry for them, and deeply regret that they have so poor an opinion of the Constitution they profess to adore.

Sir, the supporters of this joint resolution do not claim that their construction of the Constitution shall be embodied in the law, nor do they insist upon excluding that which is entertained by others. The proposition has all the time been to place the language of the Constitution in the law, and then submit the whole to the courts for interpretation. And I am surprised, almost "shocked," to find gentlemen who have so persistently insisted on the infallibility of the courts now shrinking from an application of their long-cherished doctrine. Why fear the Constitution? Why shrink from the courts? Is it because old friends are in danger from both? Is it because those who "wait and watch over the border" of this rebellion are more anxious to preserve the friendship of the men whose treason has carried sorrow to almost every loyal hearthstone than they are to do their duty to their country in this its sorest trial? Are these the causes which "shock" gentlemen on the other side, and cause them to regard the Constitution as a "cruel and remorseless" instrument? Are these the things which make them tremble before the courts? If not, why do they refuse to support this joint resolution?

We have been told that a forfeiture of real estate in fee simple is unconstitutional. We allege that it is not. Here is an issue joined, a grave constitutional issue. Who shall decide it? The joint resolution now before the House says, "the courts." The supporters of the resolution say, "the courts." Gentlemen on the other side of the House have been accustomed to give the same answer in regard to every question arising under the Constitution. Why not give the same answer now? Why get "shocked" just at this particular time, and by this single proposition? No loyal man is to be hurt. The Constitution is not to be injured, for it is to be placed in the hands of those whose duty it is to interpret it, whenever such questions as the one now before us arise. Why resist this purely constitutional method of disposing of an exciting question? If the blow should fall heavily it will only crush the men who have enveloped this nation in the red flame of war. Broken allegiance to the best, the mildest of human Governments, alone will sever the cord which suspends the dead weight of constitutional forfeiture, and cause it to descend upon the heads of those whose criminal hands are engaged in the dread work of an unparalleled treason. Traitors have assumed all of the risks connected with their stupendous crime. Why should gentlemen in this House voluntarily step forward and become their underwriters? Gentlemen may christen their strange conduct "philanthropy," "humanity," or by any other kind name they please, but history will draw black lines around this baptismal ceremony, and expunge it from the page of truth.

The vital part of the joint resolution as reported by the Committee on the Judiciary is that which substitutes the language of the Constitution for that used in the joint resolution of July 17, 1862. No argument can force the resolution into any other shape than the strictly constitutional form in which it was molded by the committee. There it stands as inflexible as the Constitution itself. The Constitution and the courts against rebels and their property form the sole question on which we are to pass. From this question gentlemen recoil. They fear the courts which heretofore have received their adoration, and are "shocked" by the "cruel and remorseless character" of the Constitution. Why? Because both are against traitors. Let him give a better answer who can.

Sir, I want no stronger evidence of the utter want of faith on the part of the gentlemen who stand opposed to me in the position they have assumed in relation to the extent of constitutional forfeiture than that which their opposition to this resolution affords. I ask not for a more complete admission from them of the perfect harmony of this resolution with the Constitution and of its ability to render more swift and sure the punishment due to treason. I am content with their denunciation of this joint resolution, for it only exhibits their hatred of that stern justice of the Constitution with which the fathers clothed it for the purpose of arming it against the infernal assaults to which it is now subjected by the armed traitors who seek to destroy it. I love to read the motives of men, and in my reading I never spurn the indexes furnished by those whose secret springs of action I would understand. I trust I am not at fault in my reading now, although it may force me to the conclusion that those who oppose this joint resolution are more intent upon the hope of future power than they are concerning that justice which the present demands. Justice to rebels is mercy to loyal men, and I regret that this rule is not recognized by those who are constantly telling us that they are anxious to vote for every constitutional measure to put down this rebellion, and who now stand in solid array against one which is the Constitution itself. Men who intend to strike rebels do not waste their time in warding off blows which other men aim in the same direction. Professions do not amount to much when confronted by a hostile fact. Words are as feathers in the scale when acts bring down the other end of the beam.

Mr. Speaker, my mind has never entertained a doubt of the power of Congress to provide for the forfeiture, absolutely and forever, of the interest a rebel may have in property of every kind, character, and description; real, personal, and mixed; quadruped and biped. All may be reached, and it is a mere question of policy for Congress to determine how far the power shall be exercised. He who raises his traitorous hand to destroy the Constitution and Government is entitled to but little protection from either. Both were made for the protection of the loyal, but neither was created to shield men who turn from loyalty to treason, from being peaceful citizens to bloody-handed rebels. Such rights as the laws of war accord to a public enemy, an active belligerent, are those which the rebels of this country can claim, and none other. The constitutional guarantees concerning life, liberty, and property, are the just and rightful possessions of the loyal people; but the traitor who would destroy all has no right to set up these great securities to save himself from the righteous inflictions which an outraged and imperiled Government may see proper to impose upon him. The Constitution was established to organize, protect, and perpetuate the Republic, not to strengthen the hands of those who would destroy it. Traitors have invoked the laws of war, and to them must they look for their rights and protection. They understand this as well as we ought to. The rebels do not claim the protection of the Constitution. They boldly, resolutely, defiantly spurn the Constitution, and reject the theories which are advanced in this House in their behalf. They fully comprehend their position as belligerents. It is their own creation, and they are content with it. I will not enter upon an argument to sustain these views, for, as I have heretofore remarked, they have nothing to do with the subject before us. Congress has already expressed its opinion upon these questions by the passage of the confiscation act, so called, of 1862, which is now the law of the land, its policy approved by the people, and its constitutionality sustained by the courts.

It has been said that it is inexpedient to pass this joint resolution; that we should not do anything which would tend to the enlargement of the forfeiture now provided by law; that we must conciliate, not punish, traitors; that kindness should be our weapon instead of the stern powers which the Constitution has provided for the punishment and subjugation of rebels; that we must win back our "erring brethren" by manifestations of forgiveness, charity, and love. Sir, what kind of advice is this, in view of the fact that we are now engaged in the organization of a new army of five hundred thousand men to complete the overthrow of the military power of the rebellion? The recruiting officers are in every county in the loyal States, and the nation is resorting to every means it can command in preparing for the grand campaigns of the coming spring. Treason is forcing into its army every man and boy between fifteen and sixty years of age. The war cloud settles densely upon the nation. The heavy tread of armies is heard in every part of the land. Is this the time for gentlemen in the Congress of the United States to talk of forgiveness, charity, love, peace? Our "erring brethren" are in arms, and not on their knees asking for mercy. They intend to fight us. Their rebellion is a great military fact which must be crushed out by the exercise of power; and cannot be subdued by an exhibition of olive-branches, or soothed by honeyed words, even though they drop from the lips of members of the American Congress.

While gentlemen in this body have been talking about "conciliation," "charity," "love," "olive-branches," "peace," and a thousand other ill-timed subjects for the benefit of our "erring brethren," and "wayward sisters," those interesting relatives have been employing their time very differently as regards their present and future action toward us. On the 23d day of last month the rebel senate, as if responding to the "peace and conciliation" utterances of gentlemen in this House, passed the following resolutions by a unanimous vote:

"Resolved, That the thanks of congress are hereby tendered to all the brigades and other troops in service who have taken the patriotic and gallant resolution to reenlist for the war.

"Resolved, That the manifestation of such a spirit in our armies is a happy omen of the ultimate triumph of our struggle for independence, indicative, as it is, of the fixed determination of our people never to lay down their arms while our soil is exposed to the hostile tread and barbarous ravages of our malignant enemies."

This is the emphatic answer which comes back from Richmond to the peace resolutions of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] the kind words of his colleague, [Mr. KERNAN,] the imploring tones of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. COX,] and to the fine-spun arguments in behalf of the "constitutional" rights of bloody-handed rebels submitted by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS,] the gentlemen from Ohio, [Messrs. FINCK and BLISS,] and others, who have labored to argue away the powers upon which the Government must depend for its safety and its life. When these marvelously kind-hearted gentlemen can stay the fury of a tornado by singing to it a lullaby they may expect to put down a rebellion such as is now oppressing this nation by the course they are pursuing in this House. Their chances of success would be just about equal in either case.

Sir, until we can disperse the armies of the rebellion, crush out its military power, and thus destroy the hopes of its leaders, it is idle to talk of abstaining from the use of any proper means which will aid us in the accomplishment of the great work we have in hand. We have enough to do now without wasting any of our precious time in trying to administer soothing sirups to men whose bloody hands are feeling for the throat of the Republic. So long as the banner of armed revolt is thrust in the face of the nation we must use power and exercise justice. Mercy will have its proper work to perform in due season. When justice has subdued these armed rebels it may introduce all of them but the leaders to mercy. But the time for this ceremony has not yet arrived, nor will it ever come for the leaders of this rebellion.

Mr. Speaker, has it never occurred to the minds of the gentlemen who object to the passage of this joint resolution that it will have no effect on the great mass of the people of the southern States? The property in those States is owned by comparatively a few persons. Property is not distributed among the people there as it is in the northern States. A sale and division of the large landed estates in the South would be of incalculable benefit to the mass of the people after the rebellion passes into history. The people can then become landholders, and no longer be subject to the despotism with which a privileged class has heretofore ruled that whole country. Thus we see that the anguish which some gentlemen have experienced has all resulted from the danger in which the leaders of the rebellion are placed. The great mass of the people will not be affected by the passage of this joint resolution otherwise than favorably. The leaders, the great lordly landholders who have almost crushed humanity out of the poor people who are squatted on their princely estates, are the men who are to be injuriously affected by the passage of the resolution.

I am amazed at the position which these gentlemen have elected to occupy. Why they should join hands with an aristocratic class which has used the immense slave and land power in its hands for the purpose of crushing and grinding the common people into an intellectual darkness almost as dense as barbarism itself is something which requires an explanation different from any we have yet received. With their strange position unexplained, and, I may say, unexplainable, they stand before the country as the defenders of the leaders of the rebellion, and not as the advocates of the crushed and bruised and misguided mass of the southern people; for they stand here objecting to the passage of a law admitted by themselves to be constitutional, which, if passed and properly executed, will open up a future to the poor non-landholders of the southern States as bright as the sunbeams which tint the roses of that sunny land. This is their love for the people. This is their idea of mercy. With the lordly few they stand opposed to the poor, the oppressed, the betrayed mass of the southern people. They seem to regard the aristocratic few who ruled their present defenders and the people of the South with a rod of iron which pierced and seared every subject conscience before the rebellion, and now rule it, as embracing all of the human family to be found in the southern States worthy of our consideration and mercy. While such views are sustained by gentlemen, who can wonder at the bitterness they have manifested toward this joint resolution? They are hoping for the return of power through the hands of leading rebels now dripping with loyal blood. They are hoping for the establishment of the old order of things when despotism ruled the Republic; when the public conscience was imprisoned in a slave pen; when plantation manners were practiced in this Hall, and slavery was regarded as the most perfect result springing from the revelation of divine will to man. They well know that any legislation which will convert the mass of the southern people into landholders will place the blight of eternity on these hopes. Hence they oppose this resolution, and denounce the doctrine of the Constitution as "cruel and remorseless." It is this sympathy with the slaveholding and land-possessed aristocracy which leads the rebellion, and the hopes which the passage of this resolution would blight, which caused the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] to tell us that we must treat for peace, and that we cannot conquer the armed powers of the rebellion—a declaration worthy of a man who discards the term "loyalty," but unworthy of one who holds a seat in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, the friends of this joint resolution look beyond the limits of this rebellion. They do not expect an extermination of the people of the southern States. They look for that submission which has always followed the overthrow of military power—the submission of the defeated people to the authority of the stronger side in the contest. We have full faith in the strength and perpetuity of the Republic. We have faith in the principles of our Constitution, and look with full confidence for the coming of the time when the people shall enter upon the perfect enjoyment of the rights, privileges, and liberties which the Constitution was ordained to establish and perpetuate. We expect to meet, in the onward and triumphant march of this Republic, a "redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled" South. We expect to join hands with it, and march forward in the accomplishment of the grand mission of this Republic. We expect to see the power of the southern States taken from the hands of a "cruel and remorseless" aristocracy and restored to the rightful possession of a whole people. We expect to labor for the elevation of that people, and knowing that the first step toward that elevation is the destruction of that aristocratic and semi-feudal system which has heretofore existed in the South, we favor the pending resolution, favor it for the masses against the despotic and traitorous few, favor it for democracy against aristocracy. We would make the mass landholders by breaking up the land monopoly of the rebel slaveholders of the South and placing land within the reach of the poor, and thus add to the dignity and assert the individuality of every man. We are working out the problem which the fathers bequeathed to us, the establishment of a pure Republic. By the reduction of the great land power of the leaders of the rebellion, through the operation of our system of sales of land delinquent under the law for direct taxation, and the enforcement of the constitutional power of forfeiture, we expect to reach the grand result of a general distribution of the land of the South among the people. An accomplishment of this expected result works the death of that aristocratic power which is compassing the destruction of the Republic.

Sir, we are looking to the ultimate elevation of the "common people" of the southern States. We expect to make them a power in opposition to that which has heretofore crushed their spirit and made them political slaves. We expect our policy to result in the establishment of those great industrial, economical, and educational principles which have made the free States supreme in this great contest between despotism and liberty. We expect to realize as the fully ripened fruit of our policy the perfect establishment of a republicanism which has ever lived in theory but never enthroned itself on the continent of America except where the sway of freedom was perfect and no slave appealed to the God of justice. We look forward to the time when the school-house, the academy, the college, and the church shall in the South measure numerical strength with the same great guardians of republicanism and morals in the divinely-favored land of the North. We look forward to the time when the child of the "poor white" of the South shall possess the same educational advantages which the free spirit of the North has accorded to the offspring of the rich and the poor in common. We are looking to the advantages of a whole people, and not merely to the privileges of a caste, as seems to be the case with gentlemen who oppose this joint resolution. We keep pace with the measured step of the civilization of the nineteenth century, and urge those who are behind us to advance to our position. Whatever of good we possess, we desire to extend to others—not as cowards to those whom they fear, but as a magnanimous people to those whom they can conquer and forgive.

I will consume no more of the time of the House with this subject. The case is made up and fully understood. Those who approve the passage of the joint resolution must stand before the country as opposed to the Constitution, opposed to the true interest of the country, opposed to the elevation of the poor whites of the South, and in favor of shielding the leaders of the rebellion from the punishment which their enormous crime deserves. They have made their own issue, and all the speeches they have delivered—filled with hollow pretensions of devotion to the Constitution, love of the Union, regard for the rights of the people, and reverence for the teachings of our civilization—will not enable them to disguise the true character of the issue. Fine words will not mislead the people. Talking for the Union, and acting and voting for a disunion rebellion, is a mask too thin to conceal the complexion of the face which it covers. Protestations of loyalty to the Government, coming from lips which, in regard to our armed defense of the nation, ask "When shall this hellish crusade of blood and famine cease?" are no more sincere than was the kiss of Judas. The latter was an act of betrayal, and the former are intended to accomplish no nobler end.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot close without calling the attention of the House and of the country to one significant fact. For some two weeks we have been listening to speeches made by gentlemen who approve this joint resolution, filled with the bitterest denunciations of the Administration, of congressional action, of every act resorted to by the Government for the suppression of the rebellion and the restoration of the authority of the Republic throughout its entire dominion, but in no one of these speeches can be found a sentiment which would excite the ire or even wound the feelings of Jefferson Davis and those who are holding up his hands in Richmond. Sir, this is not the result of accident. The speeches are too numerous and the practice too uniform to admit of any such explanation. Sympathy with rebels and traitors alone could produce such a shameful and extraordinary result. I leave this fact with the country, feeling assured that the people will fully understand it, and properly dispose of its author.

During the course of the above speech,

Mr. COX said: I ask the gentleman to give way to me for a moment.

Mr. WILSON. I cannot; I have not time.

Mr. COX. He dare not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is out of order, and will take his seat. The gentleman from Iowa is entitled to the floor without interruption.

Mr. COX. I beg pardon of the Chair.

Mr. WILSON's time having expired before he had concluded his remarks, he asked unanimous consent of the House to print the residue of his speech.

Mr. COX objected.

Mr. PRUYN. I was not in the House this morning when this subject was taken up. I had expected to make some remarks upon it, and being precluded from doing so I ask leave to print them.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I object.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I object inasmuch as objection was made upon the other side of the House to the gentleman from Iowa having the same privilege.

Mr. PRUYN. I hope objection will be withdrawn on both sides of the House.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I will withdraw mine if the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] is permitted to print the balance of his speech.

Mr. COX. I object to that because the gentleman did not show proper courtesy to this side of the House when he was speaking by our courtesy.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. Then I object to any printing by gentlemen on that side of the House.

Mr. COX. I will withdraw my objection if there can be general consent for members all round the House to print their speeches.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Oh, no; I object to that.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. I have sought the floor for two weeks past to address the House upon this question, in which I feel much interest, but have been unable to obtain it. I should like to do so now.

Several MEMBERS objected.

The SPEAKER. The main question having been ordered on the passage of the bill, no further debate is in order.

Mr. PENDLETON. Is it too late to move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. PENDLETON. Then I move to reconsider that vote, so that gentlemen upon both sides of the House may have an opportunity for further discussion.

Mr. WILSON. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. PENDLETON demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 81, nays 79; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Daves, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburt, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoo, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Scheuch, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—81.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Francis P. Blair, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chanler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Demison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Fink, Ganson, Grider, Hale, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kalfbeisch, Korman, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Malloy, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, McKimney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Smith, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Tracy, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Williams, Winfield, and Yeaman—79.

So the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

Mr. VOORHEES moved that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PENDLETON demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. VOORHEES. With the consent of the House, I would like to make a statement.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object.

Mr. VOORHEES. Then call the roll.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 16, nays 89; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, James S. Brown, Chanler, Clay, Demison, Edgerton, Grider, Harding, Kalfbeisch, Noble, Pruyn, and William G. Steele—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Bailly, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Daves, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburt, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Lazear, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoo, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Ross, Scheuch, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Williams, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—89.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. CRAVENS moved that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. PENDLETON demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILSON called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Wilson and PENDLETON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported thirty-seven in the affirmative.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 4, nays 82; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ganson, Holman, Lazear, and James S. Rollins—4.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Driggs, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Pike, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—82.

No quorum voting.

Mr. WILSON. I ask that the House be counted, in order that the Speaker may ascertain whether there is a quorum present.

The SPEAKER counted the House, and announced that a quorum of the House was present; one hundred and thirty-four members being in their seats.

Mr. STILES, (at twenty minutes to four o'clock, p. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn. Mr. PENDLETON. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILSON called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. VOORHEES and SLOAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty-five.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 4, nays 88; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bliss, Grider, Lazenar, and Whaley—4. NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Deming, Driggs, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, William B. Washburn, Webster, Williams, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—88.

The SPEAKER voted in the negative, making a quorum.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The vote having been announced as above recorded, the question recurred on the motion that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next, on which the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yea 1, nays 90; as follows:

YEA—Mr. Holman—1.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Williams, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—90.

The SPEAKER voted in the negative, making a quorum.

So the House refused to adjourn over.

During the roll-call,

Mr. NORTON stated that his colleague, Mr. ARNOLD, being called away by pressing business, had paired off with Mr. W. J. ALLEN.

The vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs, "Shall the resolution pass?"

Mr. HOLMAN moved that it do lie upon the table.

Mr. VOORHEES called for the yeas and nays. Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, and HOLMAN, were appointed.

The yeas and nays were ordered; the tellers having reported—ayes thirty-three, more than one fifth of those present.

Mr. PENDLETON moved that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next; and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. FARNSWORTH called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. FARNSWORTH and NOBLE were appointed.

The yeas and nays were ordered; the tellers having reported—ayes forty, more than one fifth of those present.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask that I may be excused from voting on the pending motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair declines to entertain the gentleman's motion, and for this reason: a motion to adjourn and a motion to adjourn over are privileged over all other questions. If members were allowed to ask votes on being excused on them, the House might be unable to adjourn or adjourn over. Therefore no Speaker has entertained a motion to be excused from voting on either motion.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. From that decision I take an appeal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, for the same reason, must respectfully decline to entertain the appeal.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think that this thing can be accommodated if gentlemen will hear me.

Mr. BEAMAN. I object.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope objection will be withdrawn.

Mr. BEAMAN. I insist on my objection.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 4, nays 88; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Grider, Holman, Perry, and Shannon—4.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Ashley, Bailly, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Webster, Williams, Wilson, and Woodbridge—88.

So the House refused to adjourn over.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, if gentlemen on the other side of the House are inclined to keep up this sort of tactics, of course we can do nothing by remaining here, and in order that they may begin fresh in the morning I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and then (at half past four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 5, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SIGNAL LIGHTS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be, and they are hereby, requested to examine into the existing legislation relative to the subject of signals and signal lights upon sailing vessels in Long Island Sound and the waters adjacent, with a view to the adoption of some more effective system for the protection of life and property against collision from steamers and other vessels in the night season; and that said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

CONFISCATED PROPERTY.

Mr. CLAY. I ask unanimous consent to submit a report from the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the regular order of business?

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of House resolution No. 18, to amend a joint resolution explanatory of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary. The pending motion is that the resolution and amendment be laid upon the table; on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask by unanimous consent, it not having been done on Friday last, that this morning be devoted to receiving reports from committees of a private nature, for reference only.

Mr. ORTH. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. This subject cannot be now interrupted, the main question having been ordered.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN moved that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

On a division, there were—ayes 58, noes 55.

Mr. SCHENCK demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 65, nays 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Francis P. Blair, Bliss, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chanler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Herriek, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Long, Malloy, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Pike, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, William G. Steele, Strouse, Stuart, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Williams, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—65.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, John B. Steele, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Wilson, and Windom—78.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CLAY. I now ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana demanded the regular order of business.

Mr. CLAY. I understood that the gentleman withdrew that demand.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so understand.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKY, their Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the House (No. 122) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, with amendments; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

CONFISCATED PROPERTY—AGAIN.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion that the joint resolution of the House (No. 18) be laid on the table; upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 72, nays 80; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Francis P. Blair, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chanler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Herriek, Holman, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Knapp, Law, Lazenar, Le Blond, Long, Malloy, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Strouse, Stuart, Thomas, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—72.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—59.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

THE SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the passage of the resolution.

MR. ASHLEY. By unanimous consent I desire to make a suggestion. I propose that the House, by unanimous consent, permit the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAIR] to make his speech, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] to reply, after which the vote shall be taken without any further debate, or the entertaining of dilatory motions.

MR. PENDLETON. Another gentleman upon this side [Mr. PRYNN] desires to speak. I hope the gentleman will include him in his proposition, and it will be satisfactory to this side of the House.

MR. SCHENCK. I suggest an amendment to the proposition, without which I shall be compelled to object. It is that the subject shall then be laid over until some day fixed upon in the next week.

MR. COX. That will be more satisfactory upon this side. Will the gentleman name the day?

MR. ASHLEY. If there is no objection upon the part of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, that will be agreeable to me, with the understanding that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAIR] shall first occupy the floor, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] shall reply, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRYNN] shall follow, and the debate be closed by some gentleman upon this side, and that after that the vote shall be taken without further debate or dilatory motions.

MR. STEVENS. In my judgment the right time for action has arrived, and I will make a proposition; that is, that a vote of a majority of this House shall rule, and I consent to nothing else.

MR. VOORHEES. We accept that. The rules of this House shall govern, and we will avail ourselves of them.

THE SPEAKER. Objection being made, the question recurs on the passage of the joint resolution.

MR. PENDLETON. I move that the House adjourn, and upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

MR. FARNSWORTH called for tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ORTH, and Mr. STEELE of New Jersey, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes forty-three; a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

MR. SMITH. I ask permission of the House to make a single statement.

MR. SPALDING. I object.

MR. COX. I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

MR. PENDLETON. Upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

MR. FARNSWORTH. I call for tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. THAYER and Mr. PENDLETON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-nine; not a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn over until Monday; and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion that the House adjourn, upon which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 53, nays 85; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Bliss, James S. Brown, Chandler, Coffroth, Cox, Dawson, Deunison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin C. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kalbfisch, Knapp, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marey, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Strouse, Voorhees, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—53.

NAYS—Messrs. Ailey, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Bailey, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Clay, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Daves, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Jenckes, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—79.

Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Williams, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—85.

So the House refused to adjourn.

MR. J. C. ALLEN: Is it now in order to move to lay the joint resolution on the table?

THE SPEAKER. It is not. That motion has been rejected at this stage of the bill, and cannot be renewed under the rule.

MR. J. C. ALLEN. Then I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

MR. RICE, of Maine, called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. J. C. ALLEN, and KELLOGG of New York, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported fifty-one in the affirmative.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 51, nays 79; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Broomall, William G. Brown, Chandler, Coffroth, Cox, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Herrick, Holman, William Johnson, Kalbfisch, Kason, King, Law, Le Blond, Mallory, Marey, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Prun, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Scott, William G. Steele, Strouse, Voorhees, Webster, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—51.

NAYS—Messrs. Ailey, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Clay, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Daves, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Jenckes, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—79.

So the House refused to adjourn over.

MR. ASHLEY. I ask unanimous consent of the House to submit a proposition. [Cries of "Go on!"]

MR. SPALDING. I object.

MR. GRIDER. I hope I will be allowed to make a suggestion to the House.

MR. SPALDING. I object.

MR. J. C. ALLEN. I move that the House do now adjourn; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

MR. FRANK called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. FRANK and J. C. ALLEN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported thirty-nine in the affirmative.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

MR. WILSON. I desire with the consent of the House to submit a proposition. [Cries of "Go on!" and "No objection!"] My proposition is that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAIR] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] be allowed to make their speeches, and that immediately thereafter the vote be taken on the passage of the joint resolution.

MR. VOORHEES. We will accept no proposition of the kind unless it includes the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRYNN.] It is an insult to this side of the House to make such a proposition.

MR. J. C. ALLEN. Will the gentleman from Iowa permit me to make a suggestion?

MR. WILSON. Certainly.

MR. J. C. ALLEN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PRYNN] desires to have an opportunity of speaking, and if he be allowed to make his speech we will consent that a gentleman on the other side may reply, and then there will be no objection on this side to have the vote taken on the joint resolution at any time that may be suggested.

MR. WILSON. I do not ask for this side of the House any privilege of that kind, and for this reason: this side of the House maintained the call for the previous question on the resolution. My desire is in submitting this proposition to advance the business of the House, and I think we can close up action on this resolution sooner under the proposition that I have submitted than we can by permitting these dilatory motions to go on.

MR. COX. The gentleman from New York informs me that he only wants half an hour to speak. If the gentleman from Iowa will include that time in his agreement, there will be no objection to his proposition.

MR. WILSON. I have no objection to letting the gentleman from New York have half an hour.

MR. J. C. ALLEN. Then we will consent to that.

MR. WILSON. And immediately thereafter the vote is to be taken on the resolution without further debate or dilatory motions.

MR. J. C. ALLEN, (and several other members on the Democratic side.) Yes, that is the understanding.

MR. ANCONA. I wish to understand when the vote is to be taken.

MEMBERS on both sides. To-day, to-day.

THE SPEAKER. Is there any objection to that arrangement? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAIR] has the floor. The Chair understands the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw his motion to adjourn, as a dilatory motion.

MR. J. C. ALLEN. Yes, sir, I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

MR. BLAIR, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, there is abundant evidence that the end of this wicked rebellion is near at hand, and that peace on a firm and enduring basis will soon return to our afflicted land. The triumphs of our arms, the depression and outspoken discontent among the rebels themselves, the respectful bearing of the great Powers of Europe, and the all-pervading confidence of our own people, are the harbingers of the approaching peace which will make us a reunited nation. The great body of our people have from the beginning looked with unshaken confidence to this result. Neither the disasters which have at times fallen upon our armies, nor the exultations of foreign rivals and domestic traitors, nor the gloomy forebodings of faint-hearted friends, nor the ill-judged policy which has sometimes prevailed, have for one single moment shaken the faith of the nation in its great destiny to rule supreme on this continent.

What remains to be done is to fill up the ranks of our armies to encounter the expiring efforts of the desperate and despairing traitors, and to fix the terms upon which the States which have been in insurrection may resume their allegiance to the Government. The first duty is pressing and peremptory; and I rejoice to see that all parties, with very rare exceptions, are prompt and zealous in its performance. The second duty presents many and great difficulties, and calls upon all for the exercise of the utmost forbearance and moderation. It is of paramount importance to the permanent peace of the country that these difficulties should be met and solved in a statesmanlike manner, and that we should not approach a question of such vast moment in a vindictive or acrimonious spirit. I deem it most fortunate that the people of the country—the same brave and magnanimous people who have borne with such fortitude the sore trials through which the nation has passed—must be consulted on the terms of this settlement of our difficulties, and that their voice will finally decide upon the various schemes which have been or may be proposed. I think it fortunate, also, that the moment is near at hand when these different schemes must be submitted to the popular arbitrament in the approaching presidential election; because I believe in the aphorism of Senator Benton, that "our troubles come from the uneasy politicians and our safety from the tranquil masses." My hope for wisdom and moderation in the decision of these great issues is from the salutary influence which responsibility to the people exerts over all who exercise their power.

Already it seems to me that this salutary influence has made itself felt and is gradually and almost imperceptibly working out a satisfactory solution of our troubles. The resolve which our people of all political parties have evinced to maintain their Government and preserve the integrity of its territory, at any cost and at whatever sacrifice it may require, has not only had its effect upon our enemies in the field, in the destruction and rout of their armies and the occupation of their territories, but it has wrought a greater victory if possible, in that revolution of sentiment which is preparing for us a lasting peace upon the ruins of that institution which was the cause of our disquietude. The determination of the people to maintain their Government by the sacrifice of everything which threatened its existence, has with unerring instinct marked for destruction the system of slavery as the cause of all our woe. Thousands who in former years did not believe in the dangerous tendencies of the system have been convinced by the deplorable events of the last few years, and no human power can now reverse the decree rendered by a public sentiment which is almost universal.

There is some discussion as to the authority of the President under the Constitution to make certain proclamations, giving effect to public sentiment upon this subject. I shall not pause to debate this question. I have heard enough and seen enough to convince me that if any other sanction or guarantee is required it will not be withheld. If a constitutional prohibition of slavery in all the States and Territories of the Union is considered essential, it will be conceded by the consent of the southern States themselves; and if I am not greatly mistaken such an amendment will be supported by the Democratic party of the northern States as soon as it is seen that it is desired by the Union men of the South. The President, in my judgment, expressed more clearly the sense of the entire nation in his proclamations than was supposed by either those who most applauded or those who denounced the act. The pledge which he gave to use all his efforts to compensate the loyal owners of slaves, which was ignored by one class and distrusted by the other, was, in my opinion, the pledge of the nation, and will be redeemed. It was an act too grand and noble to be stained by any leaven of injustice or dishonesty.

If the judgment of the nation in condemning slavery as the cause of the rebellion is correct, and I am not mistaken in the belief that it is irrevocably doomed to destruction, then it is safe to assume that the great obstacle to the restoration of the Union has been substantially removed, and that as our victorious armies advance, driving back into narrower limits the organized armies of the rebels, the States will resume their places in the Union which has rescued them from usurpation, purged by their own consent of that element which alone supplied a motive for disunion.

I am well aware that many do not assent to this mode of settlement for our difficulties and for the restoration of the Union; but I believe that this is the plan which the people have resolved upon, and which is now working itself out in spite of opposition from men of ability and influence who take a different view of the question. The President has unquestionably marked out this policy, and in so doing has the sanction and support of a vast majority of the loyal people of the country.

The discussion upon the pending resolution has brought out very distinctly the grounds of opposition to this policy, and disclosed the quarter from which that opposition comes. The proposition is simply to repeal the joint resolution of the last Congress by which the confiscation of landed estates of persons in rebellion was limited to the life of the offender; but it makes a distinct issue with the President upon one point of the policy he has adopted for his guidance, and which he has made known in the most solemn and authentic manner; and the debate upon it has disclosed a determination upon the part of leading men of his own party to make an issue with him upon all points of his policy, and either compel him to yield or to divide the party which has hitherto supported him.

To the President is confided the whole military power of the country to save its Government from overthrow by rebellion. Those who wage war to accomplish that overthrow commit treason. The punishment for that crime on conviction is expressly declared in the Constitution shall be prescribed by Congress; but it is provided that "no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the life of the person attained." Capital punishment, the death penalty, in this as in other countries, has been in all time applied to treason. The head that plots and attempts the destruction of the Government is always forfeited to the society that looks to its Government for preservation. In England and other monarchies condemnation for treason not only forfeits the head but the landed as well as personal estate of the offender.

This visited the sin of the traitor upon his innocent heirs, and was the device of monarchs to hedge around their life and crown by superadding to the terror in conspirators the fear of sacrificing the dignities, influence, and wealth of their posterity by the loss of inheritance, imputing it to corruption of blood to degrade a race and name. The motives of monarchs prompting such unjust and cruel inflictions upon blameless and helpless heirs of one condemned to expiate by death the offense imputed to him do not belong to our Republic. It does not, like the crowned head, apprehend that the stroke of an assassin may terminate, with one life, the safety and peace of a people. Nor has it favorites to pamper with the estates of victims whom they may conspire to sacrifice as traitors to quiet the fears of a dynasty into whose ear they whisper. Multitudes of illustrious public men have perished and their families been ruined under the Governments from which our laws have been mainly derived, upon constructive, unfounded, or ill-proved charges of treason, originating in the desire of the reigning favorites of the court to destroy those whom they have supplanted, and to create support for themselves and their followers by the confiscation of the estates of rivals whom their intrigues brought to the block.

It was these horrid tragedies of the English history of treasons that induced the authors of our Constitution to insert so precise a definition of treason; and in providing for its punishment to declare "it should not work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the life of the person attained." The first act of Congress passed in virtue of this article prescribed the punishment of death for treason, and added the exception in the words of the Constitution in superabundant caution to exclude by legislative enactment the consequence of a condemnation of treason which the common law of England had drawn with it as a part of the code of our country.

The Federalist—the work of Jay, Hamilton, and Madison—a more authoritative commentary on our Constitution than Blackstone's on the laws of England, had pointed to this article as a bar to such congressional interpretation as was given in the bill submitted for the President's approval at the last session. It was the security given by the Constitution to save the unoffending heirs of condemned criminals from that forfeiture of estates so apt to be voted in heated party times by parliamentary majorities, and so the sages of the Federalist say the clause meant to abate the mischief by the limitation to "the life of the person attained."

The President entertained the view of this provision sanctioned by Congress and all the jurists of the country up to the passage of the bill presented to him by the last Congress. Then he was constrained to express the opinion contained in the message in which he communicated his reasons for approving that bill, because it was coupled with the enactment of a resolution embodying the terms of the constitutional limitation. But now it is attempted to repeal the resolution which adjusted the conflicting views of the executive and legislative departments in regard to the confiscation act, and if successful in Congress, the demand is to be made of the President that he resign his constitutional convictions, and strike from the law what he deemed essential to make it compatible with the Constitution and his oath to support it. And how is this demand justified? There stands the letter and spirit of the Constitution, an insurmountable obstacle to concession on the part of the President; but the new-fangled doctrinaires seeing the hopelessness of straining the simple terms of the Constitution to justify the extension of confiscation "beyond the life of the person attained," nevertheless now urge expedients to accomplish that object. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] presents this aspect of the conscription act:

"We take up the act to which this joint resolution applies, we find that a new punishment for treason is given by the last Congress. Treason is punished with death; and it is provided that the offender's slaves, if there be any, shall be free. Here may be the pinch after all. It is in the discretion of the court whether he shall be imprisoned for not less than five years, and fined not less than ten thousand dollars, and his slaves, if any, shall be free." Let us pause to inquire what would be the result if a person should be apprehended and brought before the court for treason, and the court should under the discretion given by this enactment instead of taking the life of the offender imprison him for five years and fine him in a sum of not less than ten thousand dollars. Would not that be levied on the real estate of the offender? And if that real estate did not amount to more than ten thousand dollars would it not be taken in perpetuity to answer the fines?"

The gentleman settles his own question affirmatively, and adds:

"It seems, then, the same thing in substance to the offender found in arms against the Government to take his lands in satisfaction of the fine, and to confiscate his lands, goods, and chattels."

The gentleman from Ohio comes to this conclusion notwithstanding he concurs with Judge Story's opinion that confiscation of real estate for treason cannot extend "beyond the life of the person attained." So he would attain his object, in contravention of that of the Constitution, by altering phrases in the law, and using the words "levying a fine and selling the estate in perpetuity" instead of confiscation, which he says are in substance the same thing, and thus he defeats the purpose of the Constitution, which Jay, Hamilton, and Madison in the Federalist say was "restraining the Congress even in punishing it (treason) from extending the consequences of guilt beyond the person of its author." This is a little touch of old Polonius's craft, "by indirections to find directions out."

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] followed suit to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] in disposing of the President and the Constitution. On rising he said, "The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] has said nearly all I intended to say upon this subject." From this we may infer that he adopts the plan of making the penalty of death and levying a fine and selling in perpetuity the estate of a person attained by treason, accomplish what a parliamentary attainder did in England, and that in defiance of the Constitution.

But the gentleman from Pennsylvania is too daring and resolute to rest the sweeping measures he aims at on such narrow footing. He goes for conquest, and while giving a passing smile to the Polonius scheme of circumvention, marches on to achieve greater results than can come of mere confiscation of rebel estates. He treats with scorn the idea that the States held in duress by the rebel military power have any right to look to our laws and Constitution for protection. Yet he knows this power was installed by the Buchanan Administration, by giving the arms, the forts, and munitions of war of the nation to the Knights of the Golden Circle in the South, constituting a secret standing army to compel the unarmed citizens to submit to secession, and that thus the Federal Government surrendered to rebel usurpation States it was bound to protect. With a sneer he says:

"Some think that these States are still in the Union and entitled to the protection of the Constitution and the laws of the United States," &c.

This he scouts, and thus comes to what he holds to be the true doctrine:

"Others hold that, having committed treason, renounced their allegiance to the Union, discarded its Constitution and laws, organized a distinct and hostile government, and by force of arms having risen from the condition of insurgents to the position of an independent Power de facto, and having been acknowledged as a belligerent both by foreign nations and our own Government, the Constitution and laws of the Union are abrogated so far as they are concerned, and that, as between the two belligerents, they are under the laws of war and the laws of nations alone, and that whichever Power conquers may treat the vanquished as conquered provinces, and may impose upon them such conditions and laws as it may deem best."

Upon this theory he assumes that the Government will punish the leading traitors, seize their lands and estates, sell them in fee simple, pay the proceeds into the national Treasury, &c., and then he answers the objections to the doctrine he broaches for us, founded entirely upon that which Jeff. Davis and his confederates rely to maintain the stand they have taken, and to secure themselves from its fatal consequences in case of final defeat, in this wise:

"But it is said that this must be considered a contest with rebel individuals only, as States in the Union cannot make war. That is true so long as they remain in the Union. But they claim to be out of the Union; and the very fact that we have admitted them to be in a state of war, to be belligerents, shows that they are no longer in the Union, and that they are waging war in their corporate capacity under the corporate name of the Confederate States, and that such major corporation is composed of minor corporations called States, acting in their associated character. It is idle to say that townships and counties and parishes within such States are at peace while the States by acknowledged majorities have declared war. It is still more idle to say that individuals within the belligerent territory, because they were opposed to secession, and were loyal to the parent Government, are the State, though comprising but five per cent. of the people, and hence that the States are not at war. This is ignoring the fundamental principle of democratic republics, which is that majorities must rule, that the voice of the majority, however wicked and abandoned, is the law of the State. If the minority choose to stay within the misgoverned territory, they are its citizens and subject to its conditions. The innocence of individuals forms no protection (except in a personal point of view) to those residing in a hostile territory.

"Even the innocence of women and children does not screen them from the fate of their nation. True, in dealing with them personally, great difference is made between the innocent and the guilty. But how can it be said that the States are not at war? Individuals do not make war. Individuals may take life, but they cannot make war. They cannot be recognized as belligerents. War is made by chartered or corporate communities, by nations or States."

He bolsters these assertions by assumptions of this sort:

"When an insurrection becomes sufficiently formidable to entitle the party to belligerent rights, it places the contending Powers on precisely the same footing as foreign nations at war with each other." *

"No one acquainted with the magnitude of this contest can deny to it the character of a civil war. For nearly three years the confederate States have maintained their declaration of independence by force of arms."

Here is his conclusion:

"What, then, is the effect of this public war between these belligerent, these foreign nations? Before this war the parties were bound together by a compact, by a treaty called a 'Constitution.' They acknowledged the validity of municipal laws mutually binding on each. This war has cut asunder all these ligaments, abrogated all these obligations."

Was ever confusion more confounded than in the facts, arguments, and conclusions on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania would construct a platform of ultraisms? The main fact on which he builds is utterly untenable. The statement that the rebels "have been acknowledged as belligerents by our own Government" is untrue, as well as that on which it is predicated, "the hostile government by force of arms having risen from the condition of insurgents to the position of an independent Power de facto." At the threshold of the war the rebels were by England and France proclaimed belligerents, without waiting to hear one word from our Government. The motive was evidently to give all the encouragement they could at the start to enable them to become "an independent Power de facto," with a view to acknowledge them as such as soon as a decent respect for the opinions of the world would warrant it.

But neither England nor France, much as their rulers wish it, have ventured to recognize them. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is the first man in public station of importance, on this or the other side of the Atlantic, who has had the hardihood to do it. Our Government, so far from admitting, have remonstrated with the foreign Powers for admitting them to be belligerents; and instead of having risen by force of arms to a position of an independent Power, "the consummation so devoutly wished" by the confederating rebels, they have sunk to half their original dimensions under the compressing force of the Union. Upon what pretext, then, can the gentleman say "the confederate States have maintained their declaration of independence by force of arms?" He insists on it because "the magnitude" of the contest gives it "the character of a civil war;" and because "the effect of this public war between these belligerents, these foreign nations," is to cut asunder all the ligaments, abrogate all obligations mutually binding on each. What an entanglement of contradictions is here! In the beginning, when the rebellion included Missouri, Kentucky, Maryland, Virginia entire, Tennessee, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana, it was but an insurrection; now that it is reduced to the sparse and starving population of a portion of the Gulf States, its magnitude makes it a civil war! Then, because it is "a public war between belligerents," the civil war changes its nature and becomes a war between "foreign nations!" And out of this catalogue of inconsistencies comes the conclusion that, the war being between "foreign nations," by the laws of war the conqueror may seize and convert to his own use everything that belongs to the enemy; and on this ground he assumes the right of confiscating all the real and personal estates, not merely of the rebels, but of the entire population. This he admits "may work a hardship on loyal men opposed to the war;" but to escape the condition of enemies they must "change their domicile—leave the hostile State." "Even the innocence of women and children," he adds in another passage, "does not screen them from the fate of their nation."

The gentleman egregiously cheats himself in attempting to clutch the landed estates of the South by conquest, as sanctioned by national law, instead of by forfeiture under the law of treason. Here is the national law with regard to the right of the conqueror of a country to appropriate the real property of private proprietors, as laid down by the American jurist, the latest and ablest compiler of European authority on the subject. After discussing the exemption in certain cases of personal property falling into an enemy's hand at sea and on land, he thus treats of the exemption of lands on the permanent conquest of a country:

"This exemption extends even to the case of an absolute and unqualified conquest of the enemy's country. In ancient times, both the movable and immovable property of the vanquished passed to the conqueror. Such was the Roman law, often asserted with unrelenting severity, and such was the fate of the Roman provinces subdued by northern barbarians in the decline and fall of the Roman empire. A large proportion, from one to two thirds of the lands belonging to the vanquished provincials, was confiscated and partitioned among their conquerors. The last example in Europe of such a conquest was that of England by William of Normandy. Since that period among civilized nations of Christendom, conquest, even when confirmed by treaty of peace, has been followed by no general or partial transmutation of landed property. The property belonging to the Government of the vanquished State or nation passes to the victorious State, which also takes the place of the former sovereign in respect to eminent domain. In other respects private rights are unaffected by conquest."—Wheaton, page 420.

This principle, well established as it is by the uniform practice in modern times and among civilized nations, would preclude the gentleman from Pennsylvania from appropriating a single tenement even in South Carolina belonging to a citizen and enemy, on his assumption that it is to be considered a foreign State, and placed by conquest in subjection to the United States under the law of nations. The whole drift of his argument is to show that in such cases the conquered people are to look to the law of nations for the protection of their lives and property. When it is admitted, as it is by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] that the war is waged by the confederates as independent States against the United States, and it is a war between nations foreign to each other, how does treason attach to one more than the other? Thus the gentleman, to get rid of the constitutional restriction limiting the duration of title to estates derived from confiscation to the life of the condemned owner, and grasp at a permanent holding under the national law of conquest, like the greedy animal which leaped at the shadow of what he saw in the stream beneath, dropped the substance which he might have held.

But let us suppose now that the constitutional limitation and the inhibition of national law preventing the appropriation of the lands of private citizens by their conqueror are both overleaped and the present owners driven from their possessions. What a scene would be presented to the world in its most enlightened Christian era! The expulsion of the Jews and the deletion of the Moors by the fanaticism of Spain afford but a faint picture of the spectacle. Such a purpose avowed could only be effected by the extermination of our whole kindred race in the South. The world would expect them to shed the last drop of blood rather than submit to such a spoliation, which would leave no other alternative but to perish as paupers. But with the inclination of foreign Powers to make a foreign Power of the confederate States, and to maim and cripple the united national Republic and arrest the march of its principles, might they not accept the statement of the organ of the Treasury Department in this debate, that by force of arms the confederates had asserted their independence; were a foreign nation, and entitled to their recognition as such, and to their sympathy and support in maintaining their rights, and especially in upholding the national law to which the people of all civilized States look for security? In such case how would they meet the doctrine of spoliation broached by the gentleman, which despoils women and children of all the means of living after conquest, and assumes that the men of the country, whether in or out of the war in its defense, whether for or against the object for which it is waged, are traitors, nevertheless, to the foreign country engaged against them in the conflict? Would not the nations of Europe be justified in intervening to put down such an innovation on the national code of humanity? They would read to us the article in our own Constitution and the clause from Wheaton, our own jurist on national law, and give emphasis to both by bringing the opinion of all Europe to enforce them, to arrest the barbarities proposed in their defiance. I must do the gentleman the justice to declare that I cannot believe he means what he has said. He has a shrewd tongue, but it does not find its severity in his heart. His speech is that of a party advocate, seeking to embody selfish interests in aid of the ultraisms of frenzied philanthropy which would sacrifice our whole kindred in the South to the blacks, and ultimately the blacks themselves by violating the laws of nature in the attempt to amalgamate repugnant races in the name and by the charm of equality. It is to effect this that the gentleman would cut the States of the South from their constitutional moorings, and make a hotch-potch of all the established republican governments there by throwing them into a revolutionary caldron.

The gentleman holds that the rebel usurpation has accomplished what it designed; that it has utterly extirpated the governments which the loyal people everywhere recognized and still recognize as existing in the constitutions which have been partially suppressed only in the districts where the rebel power prevails for the moment. As ours prevails, the power of the Union being vindicated, the form of the State government, which from the beginning of the war the Constitution of the Union has held to be indestructible, again emerges. How was it in Missouri? The rebels there had foisted themselves in power by a legitimately elected Governor and Lieutenant Governor and Legislature, and they declared secession. But what did the supreme Government declare? It said a State has no right to secede. The Government of the United States is permanent here and everywhere throughout the boundaries of the Union. The nation claims that it has "eminent domain" over every inch of country within its limits, and that the duress which holds the State governments in abeyance has neither extinguished the legitimate local sovereignty within them nor the supreme sovereignty of the General Government which has sent its armies to vindicate both. The Army and Navy of the United States, surrounding the whole of the rebellion, gradually crushing the life out of the usurpation, are the national functionaries which execute the constitutional duties of the Union there, and put their veto on the assumption of the gentleman from Pennsylvania in declaring "the State governments in the rebel States to be as perfect now as before the rebellion," and that "being subsisting States, capable of corporate action, they have as States changed their allegiance from the United States to the confederate States." If we admit this doctrine there is not a loyal citizen among the confederates who is not guilty of treason against the rebel usurpation in supporting the republican form of State government under which they were born, which the Government of the United States is solemnly bound "to guaranty," and which our national forces by land and by sea at this moment in every one of the States belonging to our Union are upholding. Yet the gentleman has the hardihood to contend that "the republican States" guarantied by our Constitution are now independent, and "as perfect now as before the rebellion," and he argues:

"The idea that the loyal citizens, though few, are the State, and in State municipalities may overrule and govern the disloyal millions, I have not been able to comprehend. If ten men fit to save Sodom can elect a Governor and other State officers for and against the eleven hundred thousand Sodomites in Virginia, then the democratic doctrine that the majority shall rule is discarded and dangerously ignored. When the doctrine that the quality and not the number of voters is to decide the right to govern, then we have no longer a republic, but the worst form of despotism."

Here, then, we have the secession doctrine absolutely recognized, and with more distinctness than Calhoun ventured to urge it. He had always some pretense to justify it, namely, "monstrous oppression." But here the majority of disloyalists in a State have the right admitted to override a minority of loyal men and make them forswear their allegiance to the Union. "If the minority," he says, "choose to stay in the misgoverned territory they are its citizens and subject to its conditions."

"From all this the legitimate conclusion is, that all the people and all the territory within the limits of the organized States which, by a legitimate majority of their citizens, renounced the Constitution, took their States out of the Union, and made war upon the Government, are, so far as they are concerned, subject to the laws of the State; and, so far as the United States Government is concerned, subject to the laws of war and of nations, both while the war continues and when it shall be ended."

No man North or South ever asserted the secession cause so boldly in the forum as the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He founds the rebel government upon the will of a majority of the people; proclaims that the minority, though loyal to the General Government, which has the constitutional right to the allegiance of all the people of all the States, must abandon the States or subscribe to their authority; insists that the usurpation which heads an insurrection in the very bosom of the Government of the Union, but which it holds in the grasp of its military power, has established independent States in its midst, and endows it with all the immunities and rights of a foreign nation carrying on legitimate war. There is not a foreign Government on earth, however disaffected to our constitutional forms, that recognizes either the facts or the inferences so conceded to the confederates by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. If they were, how could the Governments of Europe withhold a recognition of their independence? England will never admit a principle which would authorize Scotland to break her covenant of union, assume the character of an independent nation, and, as a foreign Power at war, exempt her citizens engaged in it from treason; thus justifying France or any other Power in giving her aid and severing the island of Great Britain into two nations. England while at war with the French republic never recognized La Vendée, although for years in insurrection in the heart of France, as an independent people. No insurrection in a fragment of any nation has ever been recognized as independent of the national Government with which it was in juxtaposition, forming a part of that integral Government, while the great body of the nation exhibited a power and purpose sufficient to maintain itself and suppress the insurgents.

Does the Government of the Union show any sign of tottering to a fall? On the contrary, does it not stand in full vigor, while the insurrection is struggling in deathlike paroxysms? While ferocious secession exhibits an energy which it may cost more blood to quell, no sane man can see in its desperate convulsions anything but the writhings of a paricide condemned to expiate guilt in the folds of an anaconda. It is almost pressed to death, when an honorable member from Pennsylvania would invoke for it (albeit unwillingly) the support from foreign Powers by the assurance that it had "by force of arms established its independence," and that moral right was on its side, inasmuch as it was declared by a vast majority of the people to be affected by it. Never were facts so perverted to reach such a conclusion. The doctrine of secession was never countenanced by the votes of a majority of the people of all the southern States, much less by that of all the United States, the whole people of which are entitled by their interests and the authority of numbers, and still more positively by the articles of the Constitution, (the common bond,) to control all questions arising under it. The attempt to sustain the doctrine by force of arms has also failed as completely as that by argument.

In concluding the speech from which I have quoted the leading points, the gentleman from Pennsylvania says:

"At the extra session of 1861 I advanced the same suggestion, and I have repeated them on all occasions that I deemed proper since. They were not then quite acceptable to either side of the House. I am glad to find that the President, after careful examination, has come to the same conclusion. In details we may not quite agree, but his plan of reconstruction assumes the same general grounds."

The House will bear with me a little, while I examine the details by which the gentleman and the President reach the same general grounds of reconstruction.

The gentleman [Mr. STEVENS] begins by asserting that the usurpers have by force of arms become an independent power de facto. The gentleman pretends that the President has acknowledged the rebels as belligerents and entitled to the immunities of a foreign Power engaged with the United States in war.

So far from this being true, the President has manifested dissatisfaction that England and France have, by acknowledging the rebels as belligerents, favored these pirates, although at the same time they disavow the conclusion drawn from it by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that they are an independent and, as regards the United States, a foreign power.

The gentleman declares the confederates out of the Union and not subject to the Constitution and laws of the United States.

The President, on the contrary, holds that they are in the Union; that he will hold them to it, as liable to all the penalties of treason, under the form and under the restrictions prescribed in the Constitution and laws.

The gentleman insists that the heirs of rebels can claim no interest in the confiscated estates of parents condemned for treason, although the reversion is expressly reserved for them under the clause of the Constitution that the punishment under condemnation for treason shall not extend to forfeiture of estates except for the life of the person attainted.

Per contra, the President holds that the law which passed without this saving clause for the heirs violated the Constitution, and Congress inserted the provision to comply with his opinion, which was embodied in a message to the House, giving his sanction to the modified bill.

Here I stop a moment to inquire whether the President has, "after careful examination, come to the conclusion" to retract the opinion declared in this message. If not, why the attempt to repeal the constitutional saving inserted in the act by the last Congress? It looks like an attempt to play into the hand of some rival who would array a party against the President to drive him to surrender his convictions and break his oath to support the Constitution, or, by maintaining his convictions and his oath, draw on the embarrassment of an opposition, disappointed of their scheme of monopolizing inheritances at the expense of the public interests. Certainly nothing could be worse for the Government and the masses of our countrymen than that the great landed estates should fall again into the mortmain of great capitalists. By being divided up in small leaseholds among the laboring soldiers of the war, the result would be either compromises between the lease-holders and the heirs in reversion—the first giving immediate possession of a part of his holding to the heir as a price for the fee simple of what he retained—or the lease-holder during the life of the rebel owner forfeiting it would realize out of the product of his tenement means to purchase a freehold of a portion. This sort of division between industrious lease-holders and heirs would be beneficial to both. The one would be stimulated to industry and economy, the other by the increased value imparted to the property ultimately returning by subdivision among a multitude of intelligent, active, thriving, though temporary, owners, who, once having taken root in the soil, would endeavor by utmost effort to make the means of rendering their possession permanent. The presence of such a population in the rich lands of the South would surely enhance their value. The forfeiting rebel refugee would find an advantage in having a great community interested in his long life, which would result probably in arrangements meliorating his condition.

But to continue the details which, according to the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, bring him and the President to the same general grounds in closing the conflict.

The gentleman, assuming that it is a war of foreign States, adds: "By the laws of war the conqueror may seize and convert to his own use everything that belongs to the enemy;" and by the enemy he says expressly he means every man, woman, and child who now remain in the confederate States, including those who are loyal.

The President in all his proclamations touching this subject shows that he holds sacred the law of nations as expounded by Wheaton; confiscating no lands but such as are forfeited by treason; no personal property even in virtue of conquest, except slaves, who are taken from the hands of the enemy as instruments of warfare and liberated with a pledge of remuneration to loyal owners for their loss, and indemnity for injuries that they may receive from our armies.

The gentleman holds that the State governments now under the usurpation, although recognized and established as part of the Union by the Constitution and the laws made in conformity with it, are "abolished," and "we may hold them in subjection and legislate for them as a conquered people."

The President holds no such doctrine, but directly the reverse. He looks upon the Constitution of the United States, and the constitutions of all the States heretofore recognized by it, as still subsisting, all uniting to establish, as written charters and muniments of title, a right to that eminent domain and political supremacy which the national Government holds over this whole country. The President, in virtue of military power which, as the representative of the supremacy of the United States, he is called by the Constitution to exert to save it and the Government, the State constitutions and their governments, has struck down slavery in certain sections, upon the principle on which the enemies of these States and constitutions are struck down in battle-fields. What has thus perished in the war, ceases to be a part of the institutions which have existence sanctioned by any Constitution, State or national. The President's plan of reconstruction takes this ground in the instructions given to General Steele to carry it out on the petition of the people of Arkansas. In that instruction he lays it down "that it be assumed at the election," (proposed by the people,) "and thenceforward, that the constitution and laws of the State as before the rebellion are in full force, except that the constitution is so modified as to declare that there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude except in punishment for crimes whereof the party shall have been duly convicted."

The gentleman asserts that "it is mockery to say that according to any principle of popular government yet established a tithe of the resident inhabitants of an organized State can change its form and carry on government because they are more holy or more loyal than others."

The President holds that men disloyal and hostile to a Government, disabilitated by the commission of treason to exercise the rights of citizens, abdicate their place in the Government, and devolve its administration on the loyal portion; and he has ascertained from the precedents in the State governments that a population equal to one tenth of the whole number existing in any State are adequate to its administration. He therefore, when desired by them, invites elections in the several States freed from the armies of the rebellion, to ascertain whether a tithe of the loyal population remain to supersede by civil government under the republican constitutions that belong to them, the military administration imposed by the necessities of war.

The gentleman proposes to supersede popular elections by the loyal people of a State to renew the action of their republican institutions, by the Roman military law for conquered countries, "væ victis," woe to the vanquished, thus ignoring national law as ameliorated in modern times among civilized Christian nations, and abolishing the State governments which the President by his oath of office and the national Government he administers is bound to guaranty.

The President on his part resolves to respect his own and the good faith of the nation; he recognizes the existing governments held in abeyance for a time by rebel arms, the rights of loyal citizens suffering under them, opens to all such access to the blessings of the Union through a renewal of their allegiance, and tendering to the mass of those who were forced into the rebel ranks by the betrayal of false functionaries wielding the power in the State and national Governments the healing measure of an amnesty—the felon conspirators and agitators, the authors of our calamities, being excluded.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania assumes "that if you were to liberate every slave now, and then readmit them as free States, the moment they had acquired that standing they would reestablish slavery and enslave every colored man within their limits."

The President denies this; holds that the freedmen are under the protection of the arm to which they owe their liberties; has taken the precaution, with the sanction of Congress, to place them beyond State jurisdiction, and to assure them in the mean time of a safeguard under such an organization, with the national force, as will preclude all apprehension of the danger suggested.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 33.

This parallel, in my opinion, is a fair exposé, showing that the gentleman looks to reconstruction on quite a different basis from that of the President. He admits that in details they do not quite agree, but assumes that they come to the "same general grounds," that is, that "his (the President's) plan is wholly outside of and unknown to the Constitution." It is thus that he would make the President take the responsibility of the secession, abolition, absolute-conquest doctrine he [Mr. STEVENS] broaches in defiance of national and State constitutions, the law of the civilized world and of all humanity. I take my stand on the Lincoln platform.

I would say a word in reference to the remnant of slavery which does not fall under the proclamations called out by military necessity. I would implore Congress to redeem its pledge to make compensation for emancipation in the border States, by making specific appropriations to each, enabling the President to tender the remuneration which may in his opinion be requisite to accomplish a universal deliverance. I hope the States may vote it with or without compensation. If not, then it may be sought through an amendment of the Constitution in the prescribed mode, with or without compensation as the public will may demand.

The great consummation for the peace and happiness and glory of our country should be wrought out with unflinching zeal. The sooner the better will be the success. To make it a blessing to the victims of centuries of oppression, in my judgment it is necessary that they should be transplanted to some of our vacant regions, if remote colonization cannot be effected in such an emergency. The plan proposed by Senator LANE, of Kansas, of acquiring a home for the "laboring landless race" on the southern frontier of Texas seems to promise the best results. They never can enjoy freedom, equality, civil rights, or even safety of property or person unless separated from the dominant race under institutions administered by themselves.

Allow me to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the President's policy of amnesty, reconstruction of the States, and the segregation of the white and black races, bears not the slightest resemblance to the doctrine of the spoliation of an entire people, the annihilation of the States, and the disfranchisement of the people of our own race, thus putting them upon equality with the blacks. So far from being the truth that the President and the gentleman from Pennsylvania stands upon "common ground," I am apprehensive that the gentleman is anxious to saddle the President with the odium of doctrines which are known to be those of rival aspirants for the Presidency, and which have proved fatal to their aspirations. It is because the President has soared above these unconstitutional and inhuman dogmas, and has shown in his whole Administration, and more especially in his recent proclamations, that he was for amnesty and the restoration of the Union as soon as the inhabitants of the revolted States would resume their allegiance and provide against the recurrence of revolt by removing its cause, that the great body of the loyal people of the country have responded to his words of wisdom and patriotism, and have demanded his re-nomination by an almost universal acclaim, thus dissipating the hopes of those rival aspirants, built on the supposed exasperation of the people against the South and their lust for its spoils. I am not without the apprehension that the gentleman from Pennsylvania wishes also to destroy the President by attributing to him sentiments so justly obnoxious to a great and magnanimous people. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who said the other day on this floor that "we had an army of abolitionists" in the field, and who added that our soldiers and those with whom they have fought felt no animosity or personal bitterness toward each other, not only said that which was entirely true, but his words will equally apply to the whole people of our country, who have shown by their almost universal support of the President that they mean utterly to destroy slavery, and that they do not mean either to degrade or exterminate their own race in the South.

Of a piece with the ingenious but rather disingenuous assault of the gentleman from Pennsylvania upon the President is an occurrence which took place in the other end of the Capitol some days since, and which I find recorded in the Daily Globe. A Senator from my own State [Mr. BROWN] presented what purported to be a memorial from members of the Legislature of Missouri, and a protest of four Representatives from that State, against the confirmation of General Schofield as a major general. I do not mention this circumstance to comment on the extraordinary and most unbecoming declaration contained in that protest, in which these four members claim to be the only representatives of the Union men of Missouri, for there is nothing in the character or history of either of them to warrant this arrogant assumption, but for the purpose of exposing a covert assault upon the President under the pretext of defeating the confirmation of General Schofield. If it had been the object to effect the latter purpose this paper would have been presented in executive session, where nominations are considered, and not in the open session of the Senate, as it purports to have been done, when no such matter can properly come before that body. The memorial and protest contained only matters which had been previously submitted to the President by a great committee of radicals, which visited Washington for that purpose; and these statements had been examined into by the President, who, in his reply, plainly declared that he did not believe them to be true. Yet the President is arraigned upon these same stale and discredited statements before the country upon the memorial of members of the Missouri Legislature and four members of this House, under the pretense of asking that General Schofield should not be confirmed, and that, too, after an agreement was had with the President that no opposition should be made to Schofield's confirmation, but that he should be, on his own request, relieved from the command in Missouri. The President, I presume, in his desire for peace among those who professed to be loyal, was willing to make this concession; but after accepting the concession, these parties flew from their agreement, under the dictation of bolder and more open enemies of the President and his Administration, who would not permit the opportunity for assailing him to pass. To show the spirit which animated this assault upon the President by his professed friends, I will read to the House a few brief extracts from the leading radical papers of Missouri.

The Westliche Post, the most influential German paper in Missouri, says:

"It is scarcely necessary to repeat—apart from this serious and general danger with which the reelection of Lincoln threatens us—all his special sins ad nauseam. We have at present nothing to do but to declare herewith, once for all, that we, supported by honest conviction of all friends of freedom in our State, cannot support Mr. Lincoln's reelection under any circumstances whatever."

The Missourian, a radical paper printed at Springfield, snuffing the danger of Lincoln's nomination, says:

"The earnest radicals of this Union will never be bound by the proceedings of any but a radical national convention, and such convention will be called at an early day, in spite of all the obsolete republican conventions that can be gathered together."

The Missouri Democrat, a paper bought up by Fremont with public patronage and which went heartily into his scheme for a western dictatorship, whines over the recent defeat of the radicals in Missouri, and says it was accomplished by three administrations combined—"one at Washington, one at Richmond, and one at Jefferson City."

It was the spirit which animates these extracts and which broke out in fury when it was rumored in Missouri that all opposition to the confirmation of Schofield was to be withdrawn and he relieved from the command, at his request, that drove these gentlemen from their agreement and produced the extraordinary spectacle at the other end of the Capitol. I should have had more respect for those engaged in it if the assault on the President had been characterized by the same bold and open spirit as that which compelled it. I trust that the friends of Mr. Lincoln's Administration will hereafter be able to appreciate the assumptions of those who claim to be the only representatives of the Union men of Missouri, in derogation of the character of others who have sustained the policy of the Government from the beginning up to this hour.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I will say that the policy of the Administration, sanctioned and sustained by the great masses of the loyal people of the country, is silently and surely working the extinction of the rebellion and the restoration of the Union upon the firm and enduring basis of universal freedom. I have seen myself how the resistless march of our victorious armies is followed and their victories secured by a peaceful tide of population, sprung from the loins of the great North, bringing with them their industry and thrift to heal the wounds and restore the waste inflicted by the fierce conflicts of war, and even bringing a better civilization and a more healthful prosperity than ever yet reigned in the fair lands of the South. The city in which I live, and which I in part represent on this floor, has risen renewed under the influence of this life-giving tide. Washington city, which lies open before our eyes, gives signs of life never felt before, and which will soon build it up to rival the greatest and fairest cities of the North. That which all of us can see here I have seen in Nashville, Memphis, Helena, and Vicksburg, an influx of new people to supply the places of the flying rebels, and repentant and contrite rebels returning to their homes, all alike determined to eliminate that dreadful evil which brought them all their woes. New Orleans, I am told, is almost a New England city; and along the banks of the Mississippi the plantations are rapidly passing into loyal hands; and with cotton at eighty and ninety cents a pound every northern man can easily compute the time it will take to renew the number of its inhabitants, and make its rich delta produce more cotton than ever grew on its banks in any former season. I speak of that which has fallen under my own observation, where the arms of our troops give security to the citizen.

Is it likely that these vigorous men of the North who have gone to win wealth in the South will agree to see those States reduced to the condition of Territories? Is there any reason why it should be done? I doubt not that every State that is wrested from the military power of the rebels will be re-peopled by the men of the North, who, in conjunction with the loyalists of the South and those who have become sick of the rebellion, will equal in numbers those who composed the States prior to the rebellion. Why should not Louisiana—in which not even the Knights of the Golden Circle, armed with the muskets and cannon furnished by Buchanan's Administration, could coerce a majority vote for secession—come back into the Union and accept now the protection which the Constitution guaranteed to her, and which was too long delayed when first assailed by the conspirators armed by the Government itself? Let her return renewed and made vigorous with the blood of the men of the North.

Shall Tennessee be repulsed, whose devoted loyalty, bright and pure as in the soul of Jackson, still burns in the breasts of her sturdy mountaineers, and which no despotism can extinguish? In Arkansas slavery has already been abolished by a convention, and her allegiance renewed at the price of that which severed it. Shall Arkansas be excluded from the Union from which she was torn by force and fraud and against the declared will of her people? To do so would be a grosser fraud and a more intolerable crime than the act of the traitors to whom we furnished the arms with which their temporary usurpation was accomplished.

In my judgment none of these States will be excluded from their just rights in the Union. Nor will any other State when the triumph of our arms makes it possible for the loyal men of those States to assert their claim to its protection.

The first State which returns to the Union under the President's proclamation of amnesty and resumes its rights under the Constitution will inflict a heavier blow upon the cause of rebellion than a victory won by our Army.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I enter at this time upon the discussion of this question with much diffidence from the fact that there has been manifested such a disposition on the part of the House to come to a direct vote upon it. I had intended to offer an amendment to the bill under consideration which I believed of much importance, but the operation of the previous question cut me off. It was this:

Provided further, That nothing in the act aforesaid entitled "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, shall be construed to bar or prevent any bona fide original loyal holder of, and creditor of, any promissory note or account against the rebel owner whose estate may be condemned under this act.

I shall now say nothing on this subject; but, sir, in submitting the few remarks I have to offer at this late hour I hope I shall be prompted by the highest considerations of justice and truth. I present myself to-day as a Representative of a portion of the people of the United States, and in all I shall say, and in the vote I shall cast, I hope to rise higher than a partisan and look alone to the future interest of the whole country. I am not here as a Republican, as an Abolitionist, a Whig, or Democrat, but as a Union man to do my duty toward the whole country North and South.

We are now considering a proposition which, if made a law and is acted upon, will become in all probability a precedent or rule of action for generations to come. And looking not alone to the present but future of our country, when you and I, Mr. Speaker, and all of us shall have passed away, and our children and grandchildren shall control the destinies of this Republic, our desire above all things, as honest men, patriots, and philanthropists, should be in this our day of trouble and danger to so conduct ourselves and legislate as will give them little trouble, good examples, and wholesome laws. As for myself I mean this; and what I shall say to-day will be in no spirit of revenge, but a sense of duty to the innocent and proper arraignment of the guilty and criminal.

In discussing this question I shall pursue my own course and manage it in my own way, plainly, honestly, and fairly, that every man here and in the country shall fully understand me and accord to me my proper position.

The United States is one Government, and the Government of one people, with a Constitution defining its principles, its rights, and its powers; so also are the rights and powers of the several States which make up this Government clearly defined and established, as well as the rights of each individual citizen of the State and General Government. There is no conflict in the rights, powers, and privileges of either Government, State, or citizen; but, on the contrary, remarkable harmony and consistency characterizes that instrument, thereby demanding of the patriot and philanthropist the warmest support and defense. The Government in its Constitution says that a more perfect Union is formed "to establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity;" and the people pledged, after much deliberation and discussion, to accept and maintain it, not that they yielded their right or power to alter, or amend, or abolish this one when they saw proper, but that in altering, amending, or abolishing, they were to conform to the rule laid down in this. They were one people in many States; it was a more perfect Union of the people which the Constitution made. Yet prior to the adoption of the Constitution there was a Union of the sovereign people of the colonies, which I will undertake briefly to show as necessary to the conclusion I desire to arrive at in discussing the right of Congress constitutionally to pass this law.

Originally the thirteen colonies were but integral parts of the British nation, their head and fountain, the land of their fathers and home of their brethren; they belonged to and were identified with their nationality, and in all their relations, externally and to some extent internally, were subject to the authority of the King and Parliament. In leaving their homes and coming to America they brought with them all the rights and privileges of native-born English freemen, and were organized into separate colonial communities and governments for the enjoyment, exercise, and protection of those rights, and the better management of their municipal and local affairs. In this relation to the British Government, feeling, knowing, and appreciating their position, the colonies, when first called together in council to consider the aggressions made upon them by the British King and Parliament, felt that they had common cause for complaint, and their sympathies, privations, and privileges of colonial life were alike equal, and called on all to unite in a common appeal for redress and justice and the maintenance of their rights as freemen at all hazards.

Oppressions working injuriously upon any part of the country were felt and experienced by the whole. The imposition of heavy taxation on Massachusetts Bay fell alike on each one of the thirteen colonies. And when the stamp act was passed the people of the thirteen colonies were all equally interested and concerned. And in the Continental Congress of 1765 assembled in New York the question was asked, "Upon what ground shall we vindicate our liberties? On the faith of our charters, or on the principles of natural rights?" "A confirmation of our essential and common rights as Englishmen," said Christopher Gadsden, of South Carolina, "may be pleaded from our charters safely enough. But any further dependence upon them may be fatal. We should stand upon the broad common ground of those natural rights that we all feel and know as men, and as descendants of Englishmen. I wish the charters may not ensnare at last by drawing different colonies to act differently in this great cause. Whenever that is the case all will be over with the whole. There ought to be no New England man, no New Yorker known on the continent, but all of us Americans." This was the universal feeling, and then and there a Union was formed, an agreement entered into, a compact made, not between States, for there were none; not by Constitution, there was none; not by Articles of Confederation, they had none; but by the whole people, as Americans, to defend, establish, and maintain their liberties.

The people proceeded unitedly to send up their remonstrances and memorials to the King and Parliament, asking for a redress of their grievances, praying for nothing but justice and the restoration of peace and quiet to a disturbed country. The oppression and wrongs were general, and they asked for general relief. With relief came quiet, order, and submission, as in the case of the repeal of the stamp act; but with renewed outrages, greater oppressions, and a manifest disposition on the part of King and Parliament to press down harder and severer upon the people, and instead of recognizing the rights and liberties to which they were justly entitled, even as equals and of the blood of Englishmen, constant efforts to reduce them to abject vassalage were exhibited; then was there united resistance, a firm and fixed purpose to come together as one man and demand of their lords and masters the justice and rights and privileges—moral, civil, and political—to which they were justly entitled. The sentiment then was, looking to the present and future interest of the colonies, that all lines and divisions were blotted out, sectionalism was hushed, Massachusetts shook hands with South Carolina and Virginia and the other colonies joined in and pledged to the Union. Then it was that the great statesman of Virginia, Patrick Henry, exclaimed:

"Government is dissolved, fleets and armies, and the present state of things show that Government is dissolved. Where are your landmarks, your boundaries of colonies? We are in a state of nature. I did propose that a scale should be laid down. That part which was once Massachusetts Bay, and that part which was once Virginia, ought to have some weight." * * * "The distinctions between Virginians, Pennsylvanians, New Yorkers, and New Englanders, are no more. I am not a Virginian, but an American."

Would that this were the language and feeling to-day of all the members of this House, and the people everywhere. This great and patriotic sentiment rang throughout the colonies, and electrified the nation. And their Congress, assembled in the midst of this unhappy and excited condition of the people, said, in an address delivered to the inhabitants of the thirteen colonies, "that they had met to consult together for the welfare of our common country." So, sir, were the titles of Union, American, United Colonies assumed and adhered to as the style of the Government about to be established. The entire legislation of the Continental Congress was in the name and by the authority of that Union which had been made. Troops were called into the field for common defense, an army was organized, and a commanding general-in-chief appointed; and such was the universal understanding of the former Union and its present and undeniable existence, that the Congress of 1774 passed in the name and by the authority of the United Colonies resolutions of non-importation, non-consumption, and non-exportation as between England and America, and declared:

"We do for ourselves and the inhabitants of the several colonies whom we represent, firmly agree and associate under the sacred ties of virtue, honor, and love of country, as follows:

"First. That from and after the 1st day of December next we will not import into British America, from Great Britain or Ireland, any goods, wares, or merchandise whatsoever; or from any other place any such goods, wares, or merchandise as shall have been exported from Great Britain or Ireland; nor will we, after that day, import any East India tea from any part of the world; nor any molasses, sirups, panicles, coffee, or pimento from the British plantations, or from Dominica, nor wines from Madeira or the Western Islands, nor foreign indigo.

"Second. That we will neither import nor purchase any slave imported after the 1st day of December next; after which time we will wholly discontinue the slave trade, and will neither be concerned in it ourselves nor will we hire our vessels, nor sell our commodities and manufactures to those who are concerned in it."

With other resolutions and articles of a similar character, showing the power of Congress, authorized by the people, to legislate and prescribe rules for their government, it proceeded to recommend and direct the organization of the colonial Legislatures and municipal authorities by which these laws should be freely and effectually carried out; and further to determine who were the friends of American freedom, and who its enemies. So did the Congress of 1774 further declare:

"And we do further agree and resolve that we will have no trade, commerce, dealings, or intercourse whatever with any colony or province in North America which shall not accede to, or which shall hereafter violate this association, but will hold them as unworthy of the rights of freemen and inimical to the liberties of this country."

I have been thus minute in regard to the original organization of this country to show that its first powers were inherent in the people, and that they spoke through their Congress, composed of members chosen as we have been chosen, and that that Congress, in reflecting the will of the people by resolutions or acts, made a rule of conduct from which there was no appeal or no relief except the people themselves. So you may trace the acts and doings of the Congress of 1775, who, feeling a consciousness of strength and unity guaranteed by the indorsement of their constituents, assumed the highest functions of sovereignty over the colonies and their armies. And in their address to the Army they said:

"We are reduced to the alternative of choosing an unconditional submission to the tyranny of irritated ministers or resistance by force. The latter is our choice. We have counted the cost of this contest, and find nothing so dreadful as voluntary slavery. Honor, justice, and humanity forbid us tamely to surrender that freedom which we received from our gallant ancestors, and which our innocent posterity have a right to receive from us. We cannot endure the infamy and guilt of resigning succeeding generations to that wretchedness which inevitably awaits them if we basely entail hereditary bondage upon them. Our cause is just. Our union is perfect. Our internal resources are great." * * * "In our native land, in defense of the freedom that is our birth-right, and which we enjoyed till the late violation of it; for the protection of our property, acquired solely by the honest industry of our forefathers and ourselves; against violence actually offered, we have taken up arms. We shall lay them down when hostilities shall cease on the part of the aggressors and all dangers of their being renewed shall be removed, and not before."

With war upon them, and a solemn resolve never to surrender, Congress proceeded to establish communications by post routes with the colonies, and to issue bills of credit for war expenses, amounting to near two million dollars, which was increased a hundred fold afterwards from time to time. Thus passed event after event, the Congress controlling the destiny of citizen, colony, and Government, in life, liberty, and property, until on the 4th of July, 1776, when the United Colonies as one people declared themselves free. In 1777, on the 15th of November, the Articles of Confederation were adopted only to make the Union stronger and the security of the people greater; and when, in 1789, to form a "more perfect Union, to establish justice," &c., the Constitution was adopted and made the supreme law of the land, all powers of people, of executive, of legislative, and judicial authority were clearly and fully defined and established. It declares that Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imports, and excises to pay debts and to provide for the common defense; to borrow money, regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the States, and with the Indians; to establish uniform laws of naturalization and bankruptcies, to coin money, regulate its value, and the value of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures; to provide for counterfeiting the securities and coin of the Government; to establish post offices and roads, to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court; to define and punish piracies and felonies committed against the laws of nations; to declare war; grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water; to raise and support armies; to provide and maintain a navy; to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces; and to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

Now, sir, after enumerating what Congress has the power to do, and shall and may do, it goes on to say what shall not be done. No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed. No direct taxes shall be laid except, or rather unless, in the language of the Constitution, in proportion to the census taken, and so on are there many other prohibitions laid down. Now, then, when any emergency shall arise which shall require the exercise of any of these powers it is the duty of Congress to put them forth; it is its duty to make rules or enact laws for the Government by a general law of each particular case. When there is an invading or threatening army hostile to the country Congress shall raise an army to meet it, and shall support that army. When there is gold dug from the earth and made ready for molding Congress shall coin that gold and regulate its value. And when foreign coin is imported Congress shall regulate the value of that. When hundreds and thousands of people from other countries land on the shores of this to become inhabitants thereof Congress shall make uniform rules of naturalization; and by its grant of powers to regulate commerce shall determine everything concerning commodities and the intercourse of foreign countries. When a man or set of men counterfeit the coin of the Government or any of its securities Congress shall provide by law for the punishment of such parties. And when war is declared, when the country is engaged in war, Congress shall make rules concerning captures on land and water. Now, sir, in regard to the laws made for coining money, of the value of foreign money, of fixing the conditions of naturalization, of the punishment of counterfeiters, and so on of all the laws made under the powers of Congress as granted by the Constitution, where is there a man or set of men, a court, or any other tribunal will say they are not right, necessary, or constitutional? Nowhere; the action of Congress is final, and it is but the duty of the courts and the Executive to carry out the laws, for they are the statutes and constitution of the people, and the people are sovereign. So also in times of war Congress can pass such laws and regulations concerning captures on land and water as in its judgment seems best, wisest, and most conducive to the public welfare. And when it has made its laws, in obedience to this Constitution, what court or power, the creature of the people, shall say it is wrong, nugatory, and invalid? None, sir, nowhere dare say so.

Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason. Suppose, sir, there was no law fixing punishment for the crime of treason, would it not be within the power of Congress to say by statute what that punishment should be, whether death, confinement for life, forfeiture of property, or anything else? Most assuredly. But, say some, "no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the lifetime of the person attained"—quoting the language of the Constitution. But the question may be well put to these gentlemen, where is there or ever was there a case where attainder of treason worked corruption of blood or forfeiture except upon trial by a court of proper jurisdiction, judgment, and sentence, or attainder by bill or præmunire? I assert that there can be no attainder of treason, working corruption of blood, without first the action of the court as I have suggested. But the question is, has Congress the power to pass a law which shall say that the property of a traitor, whether it be in lands, negroes, horses, or anything else, shall be forfeited forever to the Government in consequence of that treason?

I lay down the broad proposition, nay, I assert it as a truth, that when a man becomes a traitor to his country, rebels against its authority, and resorts to arms to overthrow and destroy it, he forfeits everything he possessed, even unto his life, when the Government has manifested its power and possessed that which the traitor had while in resistance and rebellion, and whatever he may be possessed of thereafter is alone by the grace of the Government, not by any legal or constitutional demand he may make or ever enjoyed. I can see no reason for making classifications or distinctions in property. I see no reason in admitting the right to seize, possess, and apply to the use of the Government chattels, personality, or movable property, which may be in the possession of the enemy used for the destruction of the Republic, and at the same time denying the right to seize and confiscate realty, which also does its work toward supporting by its herds, its grasses, its minerals, and its timber the same enemy. Lands are inheritable, it is true—so also are money, and horses, and negroes, according to the laws of the southern States, but no one, I presume, will doubt for a moment the power of the Government to seize and apply to its own use forever any property of this latter kind. Will gentlemen say that as our Army moves along, fights a great battle, and conquers the enemy, that the horses, the mules, the cattle, the money, the negroes, the cannon, the small-arms, ammunition, &c., property of the men in arms, the conspirators and leaders of this wicked rebellion, are not subject to immediate seizure and confiscation? Shall we not, have not the people, through their representatives, the power to say that the horses shall be taken and our cavalry mounted on them—the mules hitched to our wagons, the negroes taken from their fortifications, and rifle-pits; and teams, and ranks, and put upon ours? Shall we not take their money (if it is of any value) with which they paid their expenses and defray our own? Shall we not take their cannon, and small-arms, and ammunition, with which they killed and wounded us, turn it upon them, kill, wound, and destroy them? Certainly no one will question this right. Then why exempt the land, the field which the traitor has come forward and voluntarily given up to the enemy upon which to build his fort, his arsenal, his magazine or to pitch his camp?

Sir, there seems to go forth a deep sympathy for the offspring of the landed master of this southern rebellion. You may go forward with your laws and your Army, cut down the humble tenant who has been misguided in this great affair, sweep away all he has, turn his wife and children out upon the cold charities of the world, and make to him no redress for the capture and use of his only horse or barrel of meal; but when you reach the landed proprietor, the aristocratic traitor of the South, who has done all he could against you, you cry aloud, Walk light, be careful, this is sacred ground; you cannot, say the opponents of this bill, touch this land except during the lifetime of the traitor, because the Constitution forbids; it must revert to the heirs of the traitor after his death.

Suppose, sir, a battle is fought to-day on a large plantation in Georgia, and the enemy is defeated, and with that defeat one hundred bushels of wheat, one thousand bushels of corn, five thousand pounds of bacon, fifty horses, several tons of hay, twenty negroes, and $10,000 in gold, the remainder of a rebel's proffer to the enemy, falls into our hands, the rule is, and it is right, apply all to the use of the Army and Government. When you have thus done Mr. A. approaches you and says, All this personality you have taken and used belonged to Mr. B., and since it came into your possession Mr. B. has died; therefore I want some evidence of this indebtedness for the benefit of his innocent children; you have taken all they had, they are helpless and needy. Says the sympathizer, these things we had a right to take as Mr. B. was a traitor; but see here, we have left you the land, that according to our Constitution we could not take except during the life of the party. But, says Mr. A., that land does not belong to Mr. B., it is the land of another. What becomes of the kindness and sympathy of the great philanthropist? Let him answer. So again, sir, upon the forfeiture of land. A. commits murder, or arson, or any other felony; he is arrested, tried, convicted, and hung; his landed estate is small, his personality smaller. Upon execution for cost may not and has not all been sold, and the title in fee forever pass? Certainly the records of nearly all the courts will verify this.

Again, a prodigal and unfortunate man becomes indebted beyond his estate; suits are brought, judgments obtained, executions levied, property in land and all sold without the right of redemption, and the title passes forever to the purchaser. Are the wives and children to blame? Yet they are made penniless by operation of law because of the crime of the father. Why, then, make a distinction in the case of treason? Sir, it was never intended by our fathers, the framers of the Constitution, that a traitor to his country, a man who without a cause should inaugurate a war which would almost deluge the country with blood and clothe the whole nation in the habiliments of mourning should be held more sacred in rights and privileges than the unfortunate inebriate who in half wit lost his estate, or his liberty, or life.

The framers of the Constitution had before them all the English laws on treason, corruption of blood, forfeiture, and confiscation. They perfectly understood the meaning of attainder and the legitimate consequences of a conviction. They knew that the man attainted of treason was in law dead. He could not transmit property; he could not hold office; in short he was forever deprived of the franchises of citizenship. These punishments were a consequence of the heinousness of the crime, for none could be greater, more diabolical than willful, premeditated, armed resistance to the Constitution and laws, the shooting and murdering of loyal citizens, and an attempt to overthrow the Government which had protected him in his life, his liberty, and his property, and had never wronged him. The moment these things became patent, by declarations, resolutions, and other manifestations of opposition, he could no longer claim the guarantees of the law or Constitution in any particular, but became an enemy and was disfranchised. And our fathers, looking at this with an appreciative understanding, declared that Congress should have power to make laws for the punishment of treason. They knew the Government had power and right to do this, to take the life of the offender and to confiscate his property. This opinion is sustained by the courts of the country. In the case of Brown against the United States, (8 Cranch,) which came up from Massachusetts in 1812, on appeal from the circuit court, which had condemned property belonging to the enemy, Chief Justice Marshall says:

"Respecting the power of Government no doubt is entertained. That war gives the sovereign full right to take the persons and confiscate the property of the enemy where ever found is conceded. The mitigations of this rigid rule which the humane and wise policy of modern times has introduced into practice will more or less affect the exercise of this right, but cannot impair the right itself. That remains undiminished and when the sovereign shall choose to bring it into operation the judicial department must give effect to its will. But until that shall be expressed no power of condemnation shall exist in the court."

Again:

"War gives an equal right over persons and property, and if its declaration is not considered as prescribing a law respecting the person of an enemy found in our country, neither does it prescribe a law for his property."

Again, sir, he says:

"Like all other questions of policy, it is proper for the consideration of a department which can modify it at will, not for the consideration of a department which can pursue only the law as it is written. It is proper for the consideration of the legislature, not of the executive or judiciary."

In obedience to this rule Congress proceeded, in 1862, to pass a law of confiscation, the first clause of the fifth section of which act reads as follows:

"That to insure the speedy termination of the present rebellion it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to cause the seizure of all the estate and property, money, stocks, credits, and effects of the persons herein-after named in this section, and to apply and use the same and the proceeds thereof for the support of the Army of the United States, that is to say,

"First. Of any person hereafter acting as an officer of the army or navy of the rebels in arms against the Government of the United States.

"Second. Of any person hereafter acting as president, vice president, member of congress, judge of any court, cabinet officer, foreign minister, commissioner or consul of the so-called confederate States of America.

"Third. Of any person acting as a governor of a State, member of a convention or legislature, or judge of any court of any of the so-called confederate States of America.

"Fourth. Of any person who, having held an office of honor, trust, or profit in the United States, shall hereafter hold an office in the so-called confederate States of America."

Now, sir, the sixth section directs that a public warning shall be given to all these people if they would lay down their arms and come back to their allegiance, then the law was of no avail, inoperative. But notwithstanding that warning and counsel and advice they persisted in their course of rebellion, defiance, and war.

The joint resolution of July 17, 1862, reads as follows:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the provisions of the third clause of the fifth section of an Act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes, shall be so construed as not to apply to any act or acts done prior to the passage thereof; nor to include any member of a State legislature, or judge of any State court, who has not, in accepting or entering upon his office, taken an oath to support the constitution of the so-called confederate States of America; nor shall any punishment or proceedings under said act be so construed as to work a forfeiture of the real estate of the offender beyond his natural life."

Where is the necessity of this resolution? The act in all of its sections begins by declaring "that for all crimes, misdemeanors, &c., hereafter" committed, the punishments and penalties therein mentioned shall be inflicted. There is no ex post facto law nor any bill of attainder passed by Congress in this act of 1862. If any claim that the act of the last Congress providing for the confiscation of the property of rebels is either ex post facto or a bill of attainder I will be under lasting obligation to him if he will produce a commanding authority for such assertion, either pagan or Christian. Sir, where is there attainder in this bill working corruption of blood at all? Blackstone says, 4 Com., page 388:

"Another immediate consequence of attainder is the corruption of blood, both upward and downward so that an attainted person can neither inherit lands or other hereditaments from his ancestors, nor retain those he is already in possession of, nor transmit them by descent to any heir, but the same shall escheat to the lord of the fee, subject to the king's superior right of forfeiture. And the person attainted shall also obstruct all descents to his posterity whenever they are obliged to derive a title through him to a remote ancestor."

Where is there corruption of blood upward and downward in this bill whereby the son, or the grandson, or a collateral heir shall be deprived of any estate, real or personal? There is none; the case is not mentioned. The action of the law is upon the person himself, the man who has committed treason, who is living and in possession of property; and I believe there is a maxim of law—and if I am mistaken I hope some gentleman will correct me—that no one can be heir to the living.

Now, then, we only propose to deal with the living, acting rebel; punish him, to take his life if needs be, his property of every description, and declare to the world and all future generations that this punishment was because he was a traitor. What declaration has been made in this bill by its friends or anywhere else that innocent children and women are made to suffer? I declare, sir, that I can see no legislation as to the estates of children or innocent people. The law declares precisely the opposite, that it is the guilty, the criminal against whom it shall work. There are some gentlemen on this floor who are so tenacious of being recognized as Union men, devoted to the Union and its cause, that no day scarcely passes by without some protestation of Unionism. Indeed, sir, some are so fearful of being called or considered sympathizers of this hellish rebellion that they will not recognize the living, old or young, south of Mason and Dixon's line, but belch forth strong and unmistakable manifestations of love and affection for the unborn children of traitors, and declare that the action of Congress in this case would be monstrous, cruel, wicked, and inhuman upon the poor little child that some unborn child is to beget by some other child yet unborn, at some future period of the world. Sir, is not such attempted reasoning wonderful? What is its object if it is not to stir up and keep alive party envy and strife to the prejudice of the country and the interest of the rebellion?

The repeal of this resolution is said to be monstrous and desperately wicked, and that by such legislation we are but increasing the rebel hatred toward us and making the breach wider and wider; that it is a persecution inhuman in its nature, unheard of, and condemned by the civilized world. Indeed, sir, I have been surprised at the utterances of gentlemen on this floor; the tenor of their speeches and the sympathies of their hearts it seems run alone toward the rebels in arms. The unfortunate and miserable condition of these men is beautifully and eloquently portrayed by their friends on this floor, the orphan and widow of the traitor calls forth their tears and their wailings, but the Government of their fathers, the trampled Constitution of their country, the weeping of the orphan, and wailings of the widow of their own homes and defenders find no sympathy, no cheering word, no solace in those cold and heartless souls of theirs. They find and offer excuses and apologies and reasons for the rebels, and nothing but abuses, denunciations, and crime for the Government. And with all this before the country the effort is made to soft-sawder the people by saying they will support the Government and the war by voting men and money to fight the battles of the country in a conservative and constitutional manner. I desire above all things to see a soldier who has fought a conservative fight, a general who has led a conservative charge, and gained a conservative battle, or a commander who would carry on a conservative war. Sir, it cannot be done; in war you must have audacity, your Army must have audacity, your leaders, your President, and your legislators must have audacity, and without it you fail.

In war times like these many innocent persons suffer; the law works hard upon them, it is to be regretted, deeply deplored; but the life of the nation is at stake; the lives, liberty, and property of thirty million people are jeopardized. Shall we risk all for a few conspirators and rebels whose purpose it is to destroy and kill? No, sir. We dare not sit quietly by and see our people overrun and trampled in the dust when it can be avoided by prompt and proper legislation. The oft-repeated story that we must reconcile this people by moderate and humane legislation (moderate and humane fighting, too, it would be well to add) is but idle and ridiculous. That has been tried, and failed. We pleaded and coaxed and begged, but availed not. We held out the olive-branch of peace for months; instead of accepting it they scorned it and fired at your flag. We have been more or less since this war began pandering to the South, trying to coax her back into the Union; but she has only answered by insult and taunt and injury. Let us stop this whining, childish play, and whip her back. Crush this wicked and hellish rebellion; annihilate, if needs be, this people who have sought and now seek to break up the Union, usurping power by infamy, perjury, and crime; who have trampled the Constitution under their feet; who have by marauding bands invaded your beautiful fields, robbed you of your public revenues and private property, destroyed your public records, burnt your houses and your towns, carried away your non-combatant citizens into long and loathsome imprisonments, where many still languish; murdered many of them, sometimes in their own homes and the presence of their families, and sometimes by cruel and infamous deaths, extending their atrocities even to women and children, thus setting at defiance all laws of civilized warfare. Let us never cease our efforts for our own protection and the infliction of condign punishment upon the authors of these wrongs and the overthrow of the rebel confederacy.

Sir, I charge any man, and all men, whether in office or out of office, here or elsewhere, who refuse to support their Government and fellow-citizens against such unprovoked wrongs and cruelties, or profess to sympathize with such enemies, as false to their allegiance, to friends, neighbors, State, and nation. Mr. Speaker, I charge them not only with being false to neighbors, State, and nation, but false to that glorious and grand band of soldiers composing the armies of the Union to-day—those men who have breasted the storm, thrown themselves in the breach, and maintained the integrity of the Republic and the honor of the Government from the beginning of the war to the present moment. Go with me to-day if you please, dark, gloomy, and dismal as it is, to the tented fields of the Rappahannock, of Chattanooga, and of Charleston, and behold a spectacle such as the eye of man never rested on before: five hundred thousand American freemen standing as a mighty wall between loyalty and treason, free government and despotism, liberty and slavery. They were once the happy occupants of pleasant homes and full well appreciated the endearments of family, kindred, and neighbor; but when they discovered this foul and wicked conspiracy against their Government, their homes, family, and friends, they paused not, nor did they falter, but, like men, patriots, and philanthropists, rushed forward to stay the tide of desolation, misery, and woe, wantonly to be inflicted upon their happy country. Their bosoms swelled with as much affection for mother, wife, and children as ours, and terrible was the sorrow and grief when all was left behind; but they saw that glorious tree of liberty under whose benign shades they had rested, prospered, and grown strong, being belted around by treacherous and wicked hands, and, bidding adieu to mother, farewell to wife and children, breathing a silent but earnest prayer for God's protection and blessing to them, they threw themselves into the mighty conflict and stayed the murderous hand. Almost three years have they stood between us and danger, and there they are to-day, noble, gallant, and brave, immovable, undaunted, unconquerable.

Sir, to my mind the proudest and sublimest evidence of patriotism is to be found in the brave sentinel with knapsack on his back, musket on his shoulder, pacing back and forth his narrow round in sunshine and in rain, in tempest and in calms, in winter and in summer, watching the stealthy approach of a desperate enemy. No condition of climate, no hardships, no deprivations, no abuses, swerve him from his line of duty, love and defense of country. Sir, he stands there in the front, the proudest, loftiest, and grandest monument of patriotism and glory. God bless the private soldiery and the Army of the Union, and accursed be the tongue that would defame them, or the man that would not support them.

Sir, your sentinels have been shot and killed while upon the watchtowers of the country; your Army has been sometimes almost depleted, and the three hundred thousand new graves that dot the land all over but too sadly tell the story of yesterday and to-day; the homeless, friendless, and landless, together with the weeping and the mourning everywhere, but too plainly tell us of the hour; but the unerring finger of truth and justice points us to the cause, and humanity, honor, Christianity, liberty, and God call for redress and the infliction of punishment, just punishment on those who have done all this. The widow and orphans of the dead patriot of Gettysburg ask at your hands food and raiment. Make the rebels pay it. The armless, legless, eyeless soldier demands of you support for the future. Get it from the rebels. They caused the war; they undertook to resist and overthrow the very best Government known on earth, and elected the sword as arbiter. Then let them die by the sword.

Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire, (interrupting.) I hold in my hand a letter written at the Clarendon Hotel, dated January 6, 1860, addressed by Franklin Pierce to Jefferson Davis, in which I find these words:

"Without discussing the question of right, of abstract power to secede, I have never believed that absolute disruption of the Union can occur without blood; and if, through the madness of northern abolitionism that dire calamity must come, the fighting will not be along Mason and Dixon's line merely. It will be within our own borders, in our own streets, between the two classes of citizens to whom I have referred. Those who defy law and scout constitutional obligations will, if we ever reach the arbitrament of arms, find occupation enough at home."

It is frequently stated by gentlemen upon the other side of the House that the abolitionists caused the war. Now I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if in his judgment that class of politicians in the North represented by such men as Vallandigham of Ohio, Seymour of New York, and ex-President Pierce of New Hampshire, entertaining and proclaiming such sentiments as those I have just read, have not done infinitely more to stimulate and encourage the rebels to take up arms against the Government of the United States and prolong the war than all the speeches and efforts of all the abolitionists combined?

Mr. COX. If it be in order, I object to the gentleman bringing in the New Hampshire election on a question of this kind. Besides, he distorts the intention of that letter. Unless I am allowed to reply, I object to the interruption.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. ROLLINS,] I say emphatically yes; and in reply to the objection of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. COX,] I say let the letter of the ex-President speak for itself. This is not a war between abolitionists and pro-slavery men, but a war between loyal men and traitors; a war resulting from a deep-laid conspiracy many years ago on the part of bad, ambitious, and despotic men of the South. And when they began it they hoped, doubtless from pledges made, that they would have aid in the North. They confidently expected a million of men from the free States to join in their unholy crusade against the Government, and it is too true they had their aiders, abettors, and comforters in the North, and to-day every word spoken, every sentiment uttered, every sympathy expressed in the North in favor of the rebels but hinders the Government and strengthens the rebellion; and he who does thus speak or feel finds no friends among the loyal men of Kentucky, for we hate the rebels South and despise the rebels North; and I declare from my place here, for myself and for them, that whether the leaders and conspirators of this great crime be southerners or northerners, in the South or in the North, they deserve death, and should be hung summarily as a terror to those who shall live after us.

It must in justice, however, be said that the great mass of the rebel army, those who carry the musket, handle the artillery, and wield the sword, are the poor men of the South, and are compelled to follow the commands of their leaders. For these I have a due regard and would show proper consideration; but for the wily, ambitious, and wealthy traitor I can make no excuse, offer no apology; he must meet his fate. I have none for Davis, nor Toombs, nor Mason, nor Silldell, nor Breckinridge, nor any of that class of men.

If the soldier is considered as an accessory to this crime of treason it would be well to favorably consider his acquittal and hold the principal responsible in life, property, and liberty.

This Government must so act and this Congress must pass such laws that the punishment of treason will be so severe, so terrific, so alarming that no future generations will undertake it. Decide that question now; let us come up to the work like men; let us not shift the responsibility on our children or our children's children. Let us be faithful to our trust; let us not indulge in crimination and recrimination; let us not find abuses and condemnations for those who are in authority and are using all their efforts to put down this rebellion.

I have no charge to make against this Administration, no words of condemnation. The President is there as the Chief Executive of the nation, not by my vote, yet by a majority vote of the people of the United States. He therefore is their President and my President, and it is their duty and my duty to stand by him, uphold him, and encourage him during his term of office. If he has exercised extraordinary powers it was alone because of the rebellion; if lives and property have been taken it is because of the rebellion; if the great institution of slavery has been irrecoverably crippled or destroyed the rebellion was the cause; if five hundred thousand graves have been filled in the last two years the rebellion was the cause; if the whole country has been draped in mourning it was because of the rebellion; if, sir, we cannot legislate here to-day in harmony the rebellion is the cause. The rebellion then being the cause of all our troubles, our misery, our woe, our mourning, our heavy taxes, our war, and our battles, we should do all in our power to destroy it and restore to our whole land, from Maine to Florida, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, peace and quiet, happiness and prosperity, with one Constitution, one Government, and one flag.

Mr. PRUYN. Mr. Speaker, I had supposed until yesterday afternoon, from what I could learn in regard to this discussion, that it was to be considerably prolonged, and that I would not have an opportunity to speak to the question for some days to come. I mention this, as the debate is now to close, in order to account for any want of arrangement in the remarks which I am thus hastily called upon to make.

I do not propose to discuss the constitutional limitation on the power of Congress to punish the crime of treason. That question has been exhausted by the very able arguments of my colleague from New York, [Mr. KERNAN,] which he presented yesterday. But there are other views of the subject of a more general character to which I shall ask the attention of the House during the limited time allowed to me.

From the leading position occupied by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] who addressed the House at an early period of the debate, we are fairly authorized to look upon his views as those upon which the friends of the Administration rely in support of the pending proposition. His argument seemed to me to be one of an extraordinary character, which, had it come from the Democratic side of the House, would have been received by the other side with strong marks of disapproval. He admitted the doctrine of secession, practically, to such an extent that I do not see how this House can escape its acknowledgment, if, after the enunciation of such views, they adopt the joint resolution now before us.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania assumed two positions which I will notice. The first was, that the confederate States having renounced their allegiance to the Union, and organized a distinct and hostile government, have, by force of arms, risen from the condition of insurgents to that of an independent Power de facto, and having been acknowledged as belligerents both by foreign nations and our own Government, the Constitution and laws of the United States are abrogated as far as they are concerned, and that as between the two belligerents, they are under the laws of war and the law of nations alone; and that whichever Power conquers may treat the vanquished as conquered provinces, and may impose upon such conditions and laws as it may deem best.

This position, it will be seen, clearly asserts the South to be a distinct and independent nationality, and whichever party is the victor in the struggle may, under the law of nations, impose such terms on the other as it deems proper. It is a clear and distinct recognition of the doctrine of secession; for it admits that the moment a rebellion passes the line of an insurrection and the rebels renounce their former allegiance, as soon as it assumes form and substance sufficient to organize, equip, and maintain an army in its support, the rebels become an independent nationality, entitled to all the rights conceded to an established Government. And the gentleman asks:

"What, then, is the effect of this public war between these belligerents, these foreign nations? Before this war the parties were bound together by a compact, by a treaty called a 'Constitution.' They acknowledged the validity of municipal laws mutually binding on each. This war has cut asunder all these ligaments, abrogated all these obligations."

This is not the view taken by the northern mind of this subject. Nor is it that under which the Administration has acted. If sound, we are then waging an unjustifiable and causeless war, which should be ended at once. I had supposed we were engaged in a struggle to enforce respect to our Constitution and laws, but if the gentleman from Pennsylvania be correct we are waging a war of subjugation and conquest. He stands on the same ground in this respect as the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD.]

I hold, on the other hand, that in virtue of the "Constitution," to which the gentleman has referred, the acts of legislation by which the southern States attempted to throw off their allegiance and to create a new nationality were utterly void; that those States still belong to the Union, and are still subject to our Constitution and laws; that although as far as foreign nations are concerned the rebellion may have reached a condition to justify them in calling it a civil war, so far as our Government is concerned it is a rebellion, and nothing more.

If this be not so, and the war be continued in the spirit in which it has been conducted thus far, involving a destruction of property and a loss of life such as has not been witnessed in modern days, we must soon expect that the Christian Powers of the world will interfere to arrest its course. The right so to interfere has thus far been stoutly denied by this Government, but if the doctrine now contended for be sound, and be approved by the vote of this Congress, that interference may soon come.

But I must pass on to the other position of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to which I intend to refer. He says:

"No one acquainted with the magnitude of this contest can deny to it the character of a civil war. For nearly three years the confederate States have maintained their declaration of independence by force of arms. True, they have met with sad defeats. But success has not been all on one side. But what renders their position beyond controversy is, the great Powers of Europe have acknowledged them as belligerents, entitled from foreign nations to equal rights with the parent Government. What is still more conclusive, we have acknowledged them as belligerents ourselves. With unfortunate haste we blockaded their ports: A blockade is declared only against a foreign nation. If they were still members of the Union we should repeal the laws granting ports of entry. A nation does not blockade itself. We have treated their captive soldiers as prisoners of war, not as rebels; we have exchanged prisoners; we have sent and received flags of truce. This is not the usage awarded to an unorganized bandit."

The first position is, in substance, that the rebels by their own acts made themselves a separate nationality; the second is, that by blockading their ports and in minor ways we have acknowledged that nationality.

Now, it seems to me that there is a principle lying behind this which has been overlooked. It is that every Government, every State, has the right within its own limits to enforce respect to its own laws in its own way. A police officer with a few of his men puts down a street disturbance; a sheriff goes out with proper assistance to arrest persons engaged in resisting the service of process, and if need be calls a military force to his aid; and the State to put down a rebellion uses not only the civil powers it can command, but its armies and navies if need be. Nor is it a violation of treaty arrangements with foreign Powers which permits them to trade at our ports if we find it necessary to close those ports in order to suppress an outbreak against the laws. The right to compel respect to them in such way as any Government may find to be necessary lies behind all treaty obligations, and is a power which cannot from its very nature be granted away or extinguished.

That the President looked at the matter in this light when he issued his proclamation of blockade on the 19th of April, 1861, is clear from the language of the instrument. He recites the existence of the insurrection and the determination of the Government to repress it, and declares that with the view of aiding in this object and in the protection of the public peace a blockade of the ports in the rebel States is established.

No southern nationality is recognized by this instrument; its objects and its language are utterly inconsistent with such an idea. No foreign nation could possibly have been misled by it. But to show even more conclusively the President's view, he declares in the last paragraph of the proclamation that if any person under the pretended authority of the States in rebellion should molest a vessel of the United States, or the persons or cargo on board of her, such person would be held amenable to the laws of the United States for the prevention and punishment of piracy. Surely this is not the language of one belligerent to another. It is that of the supreme power of the State to its own people.

But if I am wrong in this, then it follows as a logical result from the premises laid down by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the President, by what the gentleman calls his "unfortunate haste" in instituting the blockade, and thus, as it is claimed, conferring belligerent rights on the confederates, and acknowledging their existence as a nation, dissolved the Union. If such be the result of the President's acts, then there certainly was an "unfortunate haste" in it, a haste which cannot be too much deplored.

The war power of the President has been alluded to in this discussion, and one gentleman, a few days ago, spoke of it as a power equivalent to that of the Roman dictatorship. Could the dead revisit the earth how indignantly would Washington and Hamilton and Franklin and Madison and the other great men who framed our Constitution deny that in its broad and liberal provisions intended to "secure the blessings of liberty" to them and their posterity there lay concealed the powers of a Roman dictatorship. I earnestly protest against this doctrine, and deeply regretted to hear it asserted in this House. It is too great a heresy, I trust, to be entertained here or elsewhere. Nor do I believe this House to be prepared to subscribe to the doctrine legitimately resulting from the position assumed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the President may dissolve the Union by a proclamation of blockade such as that we have considered. This doctrine recognized and we at once recognize secession. Nor can we complain of foreign Powers who recognize the South as belligerents, for they simply followed our example, as none of them did so until a long time after the proclamation of blockade had been issued.

I must now pass to other views of this matter; but before doing so it may be well to look very briefly at the origin and history of the doctrine of secession. It is one which has at different times been theoretically and practically presented to the American mind. The first and a strong approach to it was in the case of Vermont, which practically seceded from New York. Shortly after the Declaration of Independence the people residing in the northeastern counties of New York, now constituting the State of Vermont, dissatisfied with their relations with New York, determined to erect a separate sovereignty. They held public meetings, discussed the matter, and resolved to organize a new State. They claimed in substance that they had as good right to refuse to recognize the authority of New York as New York had to cast off her allegiance to Great Britain. The movement soon resulted in the organization of the State of Vermont.

The nullification movements of South Carolina during General Jackson's Presidency are so well known to our history that I need but to refer to them. The question was then discussed in all its bearings by the greatest minds of the country, and it was hoped forever settled. The decisive and energetic conduct of General Jackson at that time secured for him the warmest applause and respect of all political parties.

Not many years since the Legislature of Wisconsin, the majority of its members being then Republicans, passed resolutions which, as I recollect them, and I have no doubt many of the House do also, distinctly recognized the doctrine of secession. I had intended to read these resolutions at length, but unfortunately the volume of the Statutes of Wisconsin which I am informed contains them is not at present in the Library.

In the Law Lectures of St. George Tucker, one of the most distinguished jurists of Virginia, I find it stated that secession is revolution.

On the other hand, Mr. Rawle, equally distinguished in his own State, (Pennsylvania,) holds to views widely different. I wish to have read to the House an extract from Rawle on the Constitution, commencing on page 295 of that work. The Clerk read, as follows:

"The secession of a State from the Union depends on the will of the people of such State. The people alone, as we have already shown, hold the power to alter their constitution. The Constitution of the United States is, to a certain extent, incorporated into the constitutions of the several States by the act of the people. The State Legislatures have only to perform certain organic operations in regard to it. To withdraw from the Union comes not within the general scope of delegated authority. There must be an express provision to that effect inserted in the State constitutions. This is not at present the case with any of them, and it would be perhaps impolitic to confide it to them. A matter so momentous ought not to be entrusted to those who would have it in their power to exercise it lightly or precipitately on sudden dissatisfaction or causeless pique, perhaps against the immense majority of their constituents. But in any manner by which a secession is to take place nothing is more certain than that the act should be deliberate, clear, and unequivocal."

Mr. PRUYN. Mr. Speaker, I differ entirely from the views thus put forth by Mr. Rawle. I do not believe that any State has the right, by incorporating a clause in its constitution providing for a secession from the Union, to give to its Legislature or to any other body that power. I have referred to these things not by way of approval, of the doctrine of secession, for I do not believe in it, but simply to show somewhat of the history of this matter, and that this idea of the right to secede was not confined to the public men of the southern States.

Mr. SLOAN. I understand the gentleman to state that the supreme court of the State of Wisconsin, and the Legislature of the State, first recognized the doctrine of secession. I desire to ask the gentleman when and in what case?

Mr. PRUYN. By certain resolutions of the Legislature, passed in 1858 or 1859.

Mr. SLOAN. I ask the gentleman if those resolutions were anything more than what are called the Kentucky resolutions, which have been incorporated into the platform of the Democratic party for sixteen years?

Mr. PRUYN. I have quoted from memory, and I am corroborated by the statement of one of the members from Wisconsin, who has told me that such was the purport of the resolutions. And that corresponds with my recollection.

Mr. SLOAN. The substance of those resolutions was only the Kentucky resolutions which were incorporated into the platform of the Democratic party in the national convention in 1852, and in nearly every convention since.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I desire to make a single statement in reference to the resolutions to which the gentleman refers. In the year 1859 resolutions were passed by the unanimous Republican vote of the Legislature of Wisconsin, declaring that the Government of the United States was a compact, that there was no common arbiter in case of dispute between a State and the Government, and that each State was judge for itself of the infraction of the contract and of the mode and measure of redress.

I state beyond that, that the supreme court of the State of Wisconsin, in the case of ex parte Booth, on application for a writ of habeas corpus, decided that they would not entertain a writ of error from the Supreme Court of the United States to themselves, taking almost the same ground in reference to the matter which the Legislature of Wisconsin did, and refused to make any return to the Supreme Court. But for the credit of Wisconsin I will say that last year those resolutions were repealed.

Mr. SLOAN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if the language of the resolutions of the State of Wisconsin was not almost identical with the language of the famous Kentucky resolutions of 1798; and if all that the supreme court held was not simply that, in a proper case brought before that court, they had the right to judge of the constitutionality of an act of Congress, within the Union, as a simple judicial remedy, exercising their functions as the highest judicial tribunal of our State? And I ask him further if either those resolutions or the decision of the supreme court had the least taint of this doctrine of secession about them?

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I state in reply that I used the language of those resolutions. It was that the Government of the United States was a compact, and that in case of dispute between a State and the Federal Government there was no common arbiter, and that each State was a judge as well of the infraction of that compact as of the mode and manner of redress.

I state beyond that, that at the last session of the Legislature those resolutions were repealed, and repealed with the declaration that those were the sentiments indorsed by Jeff. Davis, and every Democrat voted against the repeal because it had such a declaration as that, which they deemed to be false; and every Republican voted for it.

I will say, while I cannot quote from the lengthy decision of the supreme court of our State, it did refuse at that time—though it has changed since—to make a return to the writ of error from the Supreme Court of the United States. Does the gentleman stand upon those resolutions of 1798 and those of 1859, or does he abandon them?

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman from New York will allow me a moment to reply. The gentleman from Wisconsin evades my question. I asked him whether the resolutions of the Legislature of the State were not identical in substance with the famous Kentucky resolutions, and he declines to answer that question. I assert that they were, and that those resolutions have been in the platform of the party to which the gentleman belongs for the last sixteen years, and have been adopted by every Democratic national convention. I ask the gentleman now whether he repudiates the platform his party has acted upon in every presidential election during the last sixteen years.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I understand that the resolutions of 1798 contain no such doctrine as that incorporated in the resolutions of the Wisconsin Legislature in 1859. And if I thought the resolutions did I would repudiate those resolutions. It is because I think they do not contain any such sentiments that I give my adherence to them.

Mr. SLOAN. That is an issue of fact between the gentleman and myself which the records must determine. I think the gentleman shows his ignorance of the political history of the country and of his party in asserting that there was any substantial difference between the resolutions of the Legislature of Wisconsin and the resolutions of his party.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I will not either defend myself against the charge of ignorance which my colleague makes upon me, nor impugn the knowledge of the gentleman. I have not stood at any time on the platform which I have alluded to, adopted by the Republican party in Wisconsin. I have opposed it from the very beginning, and I believe that in that respect I have been at variance with my colleague.

And now, having answered the question which he asked me, I will ask him if, while I was opposing these resolutions of the Legislature and the decision of the supreme court of the State of Wisconsin on these points, my colleague did not stand on the opposite side to me defending them both?

Mr. SLOAN. I am willing to answer any question put to me. Under the circumstances in which those resolutions were passed I approved them, and I still approve them; and, with a proper opportunity, I am willing to defend my position in regard to them.

Mr. PRUYN. And now, Mr. Speaker, the gentlemen from Wisconsin having made their explanations, I will briefly state some other views on the subject I was considering.

Had the Constitution of the United States contained an express provision authorizing any State at any time it saw fit to withdraw or secede from the Union it is quite evident that our present struggle would have been avoided. It is admitted by all that many of the public men of the South have from an early period of our history claimed that by the true construction of that instrument the right to secede existed, if not in terms, by clear implication; while at the North this claim has been strongly denied. Should not the fact that the right has been thus uniformly asserted lead the North, while it denies its existence, to moderate the violence with which those who hold it have oftentimes been denounced. Let us deal with the rebellion with the firm determination by united and vigorous efforts to suppress it, but let it be done in the spirit of philanthropy combined with power which should mark the conduct of a great and magnanimous Commonwealth.

Nor does this imply any sympathy with the erroneous principles which the South has advocated. On this subject the North has been united. Its rising after our flag was struck at Sumter was magnificent; nothing in history compares with it; and it will never be satisfied until that flag shall once more float over that fortress, the emblem of a common Government and a restored Union.

I can claim for those whom I more particularly represent that they have at all times responded to the call of the Government, and have furnished men and money for the defense of our institutions with a readiness unsurpassed in any part of the Union; and those with whom I act politically have united in all this with just as much energy as their neighbors. All that the Democratic party demanded from the Administration was that it should respect the Constitution; and when the restraints of the Constitution were overlooked and broken down, when the great principles of civil liberty were disregarded in the despotic measures adopted by the Administration, it was our duty to express plainly and boldly, and I trust we did, the dissatisfaction we entertained.

The measure now before us, which contemplates in its results the confiscation of the lands of private individuals in the rebel States, necessarily leads us to consider the manner in which this war should be conducted. In the language of General McClellan's celebrated letter, it should be conducted (I quote from memory) "in the highest spirit of Christian civilization." During the debate extracts have been read to you from Vattel, from Wheaton, and other writers, to show how utterly incompatible this measure is with the law of nations. Let me add an extract from another standard authority. Manning, in his Commentaries on the Law of Nations, (page 135,) says:

"Formerly the lands of the individual subjects of a conquered State were confiscated by the victors; many such instances will immediately present themselves to the memory of the classical student or to the reader of modern history in the examples of the conquest of the Gauls by the Franks, and of England by the Normans. But at the present epoch lauded property and immovable property in general is not liable to confiscation from the effects of war." * * *

"This moderation is a great improvement upon the ancient custom; it mitigates the evils of war without interfering with its results; it was a change introduced as civilization advanced; it has been for many centuries the constant usage of European warfare, and is now firmly established as part of the European law of nations."

I do not propose to enter upon this subject at length; much has been said about it already. But I may remark that Mr. Adams, (John Quincy,) in the discussions growing out of the arbitration between this country and Great Britain before the Emperor of Russia in 1822, denied the right to emancipate enemy's slaves.

Mr. Bancroft in his history, (volume eight,) speaking of the proclamation of Governor Dunmore, the last royal Governor of Virginia, forfeiting life and property, and declaring freedom to all the negroes belonging to the rebels if they would join his army, says:

"At Dunmore's proclamation a thrill of indignation ran through Virginia, effacing all differences of party, and rousing one strong impassioned purpose to drive away the insolent power by which it had been put forth."

Mr. Hamilton denied the propriety even of confiscating debts. He said, in discussing the treaty of 1794:

"So degrading an idea will be rejected with disdain by every man who feels a true and well-informed national pride, by every man who recollects and glories that in a state of still greater immaturity we achieved independence without the aid of this dishonorable expedient."—Hamilton's Works, vol. 7, p. 329.

Chief Justice Marshall said, (in 7 Peters's Rep., page 86:)

"The modern usage of nations which has become law would be violated; that sense of justice and of right which is acknowledged and felt by the whole civilized world would be outraged if private property should be generally confiscated and private rights annulled."

The confiscation of property as a political measure has been abolished by positive law in Spain, in Belgium, in France, and, I believe, in some other European countries; and its incompatibility with the present state of civilization is established by the most incontestable authority.

Let me quote, the eloquent words of the late Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. Crittenden,) when this subject was discussed in this body nearly two years ago. He said:

"Here are ten States, and by your law of confiscation you proscribe man, woman, and child. The whole history of mankind does not furnish anything like it. Such a proscription was never before issued by human authority. No plague, no pestilence which ever descended upon mankind has ever wrought such mischief as this would. To inquire whether such a measure is against the Constitution of the United States would seem to be mockery. It is against the very instincts of mankind, against the lessons of human policy, against all lessons of Christianity and humanity."

The principles upon which the war was to be conducted were declared to the world in the celebrated resolutions of Congress after the great battle of Bull Run, and again in the President's proclamation of 22d September, 1862, in which he says: "I do hereby proclaim and declare that hereafter, as heretofore, the war will be prosecuted for the object of practically restoring the constitutional relation between the United States and each of the States and the people thereof in which States that relation is or may be suspended or disturbed."

And in one of the resolutions introduced into the Senate last year by Senator SUMNER, which passed both Houses, it is declared that the United States "hereby announce as their unalterable purpose that the war will be vigorously prosecuted according to the humane principles of Christian States until the rebellion shall be overcome, and they reverently invoke upon their cause the blessings of Almighty God."

Let Congress adhere to this declaration. Let us do nothing to disgrace our country before the civilized world. Let the humane principles of the law of nations and the benign influences of Christianity regulate our conduct in the fearful struggle in which we are engaged.

We may then hope that the time will soon come when the Constitution will again be respected throughout our whole country, and our Union be restored to its former strength and proportions.

But if this is not to be, and a wholesale system of confiscation is to be entered upon, such as modern history cannot parallel; if we are thus to be held up to the denunciations of all Christendom, the responsibility must rest with those who adopt the measure now proposed.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I hope the gentleman from New York who has just spoken and occupied but half an hour [Mr. FRYN] will have permission to print the remainder of his speech; and that gentlemen on the other side will withdraw their objections made yesterday to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] printing the remainder of his remarks.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to state that my remarks are published in the Globe to-day, except the portion I was not able to deliver within the time.

Mr. COX. I consider my objection as having been withdrawn before it was published.

Mr. WILSON. Of course I cannot publish it now.

No objection was made to publishing the speeches referred to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 83, nays 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broonall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Denning, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, McCloud, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—83.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Bailey, Augustus C. Baldwin, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Strouse, Stuart, Thomas, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—74.

So the resolution was passed.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. ASHLEY stated that Mr. WILDER had paired off with Mr. PERRY; that Mr. WILDER would have voted in the affirmative, and Mr. PERRY in the negative.

Mr. SMITH stated that he had paired off with Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri, who would have voted in the negative, while he would have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. PIKE stated that Mr. BLAINE was detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. ANCONA stated that Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania, who would have voted against the resolution, was detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. ALLISON stated that Mr. PRICE was absent on important business.

The result was then announced as above stated.

INTERNAL REVENUE BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to go to the business on the Speaker's table for the purpose of taking up the internal revenue bill, which has been returned from the Senate with amendments, with a view to its reference to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. COX. I object.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. COX. I rise to a privileged motion. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next; and I ask for tellers on my motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Cox and SCHENCK were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 79, noes 69.

Mr. SCHENCK demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 75, nays 73; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brandegee, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Deming, Dennison, Driggs, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Herrick, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Pike, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Strouse, Stuart, Thomas, Tracy, Wadsworth, Elihu B. Washburne, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—75.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Donnelly, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, William B. Washburn, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—73.

So the motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. HOLMAN, (at seven minutes to five o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned until Monday.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 8, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS PRESENTED.

Mr. HARLAN presented the credentials of Hon. JAMES W. GRIMES, chosen by the Legislature of Iowa a Senator from that State for the term commencing March 4, 1865; which were read, and ordered to be placed on the files of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. POWELL. I present resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky in favor of the passage of a bill to reimburse that State for losses sustained by rebel raids. I desire, if the Senate will allow me, to call the attention of the Committee on Military Affairs to the importance of this question, and I hope they will give it their very prompt attention. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented the petition of Isaac Reede, a soldier of the war of 1812, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COWAN presented five petitions of J. Galusha Staunton, praying that certain patents may be issued to him upon the payment of the "balance fee" into the United States Treasury; which were referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. POMEROY presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas in favor of a grant of land for the endowment of Olathe College in that State; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas in favor of indemnifying the loyal citizens of that State for losses incurred by raids of guerrillas, and also of granting pensions to the widows and children of those killed; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, presented a petition of citizens of Johnson county, Kansas, praying for an appropriation of $100,000, one half to be applied to the endowment of a college located at Olathe, and the residue for the relief of the widows and orphans of citizens murdered by Quantrell's bushwhackers and other rebel bands; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, in favor of a grant of land for the endowment of the Olathe College in that State; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of citizens of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying for the sale of the mineral lands of the Rocky mountain country, and also for aid for the construction of the Northern and Central Pacific railroads; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILSON presented a memorial of the religious Society of Friends of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, and adjacent parts of Maryland, praying for exemption from military duty; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of soldiers of the State of Massachusetts who volunteered and enlisted into the service of the United States for the term of nine months in the autumn of 1862, praying for a bounty of twenty-five dollars; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. HOWE presented two petitions of citizens of Oconto, Wisconsin, praying for a modification of the reciprocity treaty; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MORGAN presented resolutions of the Assembly of the State of New York in favor of an increase of the facilities for convenient and expeditious travel and transportation of troops between the cities of New York and Washington; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer the petition of a large number of colored citizens of Philadelphia, in which they ask Congress to take all steps toward universal freedom; and they especially pray that they will do everything in their power toward granting the elective franchise to the colored people of the United States.

In presenting this petition I am reminded of an incident which occurred during the last Congress before this rebellion. I then presented a petition from colored citizens, which, by a vote of the Senate, was duly referred to a committee known as the Harper's Ferry committee, of which the Senator from Virginia, Mr. Mason, now a rebel, was the chairman. The Journal of the Senate shows the action of that committee on that occasion. I read from the Journal. It is under date of June 15, 1860:

"Mr. Mason, from the select committee on the Harper's Ferry invasion, to whom was referred the petition of citizens of Massachusetts of African descent, submitted a report, accompanied by the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the paper purporting to be a petition from citizens of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts of African descent, presented to the Senate by CHARLES SUMNER, a Senator from Massachusetts, on the 5th of June instant, and on his motion referred to a select committee of the Senate, be returned by the Secretary to the Senator who presented it."

The Senate never acted upon this resolution, but it stands on our record as one of the last efforts of a person who is now in open rebellion. I content myself with remarking that it is natural that one who was preparing to be a rebel should deny that colored persons were citizens of the United States. I ask the reference of this memorial to the committee on slavery and freedmen.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred.

Mr. GRIMES. I present the petition of T. H. Robinson, president of the Columbia Fire Company, and of the other members of that company, in the city of Washington, representing that they are deeply impressed with the inefficiency of the mode of extinguishing fires now and heretofore practiced in this city by means of hand fire-engines.

They say that they have observed with great satisfaction the mode practiced in Baltimore, Philadelphia, and other cities, by means of steam fire-engines, and they earnestly petition Congress for an appropriation to purchase a steam fire-engine for the protection of the public and private property in this city, which the members of the Columbia Fire Company propose to take charge of and keep free of expense to the Government. They say that the amount necessary to make the purchase is $6,000, and that their company buildings are situated very near the Capitol building, and that it would be a vast advantage to the Government if their prayer should be granted. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to present the petition of Issac N. Haynie and others, of Cairo and its vicinity, in the State of Illinois, asking for the establishment of a western navy and dock-yard and naval depot at that point. This petition sets forth at some length the advantages of that location for a navy-yard and naval depot, showing among other things that it is at the confluence of all the great rivers of the valley of the Mississippi; that it is below the point where the rivers freeze or are obstructed by ice, and also at a point which is navigable at all seasons of the year; that boats are never obstructed by low water in coming to Cairo; that nearly the whole commerce of at any rate the upper part of the valley of the Mississippi passes Cairo, reaching through Kentucky and Tennessee away to Alabama up the Cumberland and Tennessee rivers, and reaching up the Ohio to Pittsburg, and up the Mississippi to its sources; that the commerce of all that country passes this point; that it is a healthy location; and that it possesses superior advantages to any other in the country for the location of a navy-yard.

The petitioners accompany their petition with a map showing the depth of water at this point, the elevation of the land above low-water mark, the extent of the floods, and also the certificates of physicians and Army surgeons who have had experience there as to the health of the location. The petition is also accompanied by a proposition from the proprietors of the Cairo city property, who own nearly all the land there, proposing to donate to the Government of the United States forty acres of land upon which to locate this navy-yard and depot. I move that these papers be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS OF KENTUCKY.

Mr. DAVIS. I present a resolution passed by the General Assembly of the State of Kentucky in relation to the adjustment and payment of claims of citizens of that State against the United States; and I will accompany the presentation by a few remarks.

The State of Kentucky has lain open to the incursions of the rebels on the whole of her eastern line, extending from the river Ohio to the angle made by the lines of that State, Tennessee, and Virginia upon the Cumberland mountains, a distance of more than one hundred miles, and along her whole southern boundary separating her from the State of Tennessee, which is upward of two hundred miles in length.

Since the commencement of the war she has been exposed along both to frequent incursions by large bodies of troops as well as by guerrilla parties, and three heavy invasions. About two years ago last September she was invaded at Columbus by General Polk at the head of eight or ten thousand rebel troops; and at the same time by Zollicoffer through Big Spring Gap, commanding a force of some six or eight thousand; and about the same time she was invaded from the region of Abingdon, in Western Virginia, through the gaps of Big Sandy, by a body of troops under the command of Humphrey Marshall, numbering some three thousand. In the summer of 1862 she was invaded from East Tennessee by about fifteen thousand troops, and shortly afterwards by Kirby Smith, commanding an army of more than thirty thousand men. Both before and since those invasions there have been constantly incursions and raids into that State by large detachments of troops and by that portion of the rebel forces denominated guerrillas. About one third of the territory of the State has been for a good portion of that period overrun and occupied by rebel forces; and last fall a year ago about three fourths of the entire State was occupied by their armies. The consequence is an immense amount of depredation upon property as well as upon person by the rebel troops in that State. There is no State in the Union that has suffered more than the whole of the southern portion of that State. She early felt that she was competent to defend herself if she was granted that permission by the United States Government. In January, 1862, a bill was introduced into the House of Representatives authorizing that State to raise twenty thousand volunteer troops for her defense. It was passed in the other branch of Congress by a vote of about two to one, and was reported in the month of February, 1862, to the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It could not and did not receive the action of that committee until March last, and the committee then made a report modifying the bill that had been passed by the House of Representatives, and instead of authorizing that State to raise twenty thousand volunteer militia for her own defense they changed it into a United States force to serve for twelve months, and placed it under the command of the President of the United States as Commander-in-Chief.

I do not know why this subject was so long neglected. I know of no sufficient reason for the delay. I am well assured, though, that if that State had been permitted by the legislation of Congress to raise a force for her own defense she would have raised one amply sufficient for that purpose, and in defending herself against the rebel invasions she would have rendered the most essential service that she could render to the cause of the United States. But if the force raised by her had proved inadequate for the work then from the northwestern States, from Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio, we should have got ample assistance to render the work of defense most effectual, and in that way protect the whole Northwest against rebel incursions and invasions from the South.

I have listened, Mr. President, again and again to the contemptuous reproaches thrown at the State of Kentucky in this Chamber, that she was not defending her own soil, and that that work had to be performed by troops from other States as far north as Massachusetts. The cause for that condition of things in Kentucky is obvious. Her own sons who enlisted into the Army of the United States, almost as fast as they were organized were ordered into other States, and in that way were compelled to leave their own State and her proper defense, and that made it necessary that other troops should be thrown within her borders to perform the work.

In June last there was an invasion of the State of Maryland by the rebel army. Within three days after that invasion the President of the United States issued his proclamation authorizing Maryland and Pennsylvania and Ohio to raise one hundred thousand volunteer troops for six months to repel that invasion and to defend those States against the invaders; and within ten days afterwards that proclamation was amended by authorizing the raising of twenty thousand more State militia for six months for that work.

Now, sir, why there should be such prompt interposition to authorize that character and that number of force for the defense of those States, while for more than two long years Kentucky has been denied the privilege upon her own earnest importunity of being allowed to raise any force of that character for her defense, I cannot altogether comprehend; but if there had been early the same disposition and promptness to authorize Kentucky by her own sons and her own children to organize for her own defense, she would have made it in the most effective and successful form.

But, Mr. President, I believe on the 3d of March, 1863, this transformed bill that had come from the other House to enable that State to raise troops for her defense, and that was here converted into a measure to raise United States troops, became a law. The Governor of Kentucky and the other authorities of that State immediately set to work to organize a force under that law. Its passage in any form had been so long delayed, however, that many of the people in the exposed parts of the State who would have been disposed to volunteer, and would have gladly volunteered for the defense of their sections and their homes, had been driven from them into the northwestern States, or had taken refuge in the Union armies, or had been conscripted by the rebels, before it went into operation. Nevertheless the Governor was so successful as to organize about seven thousand troops under that law, which as it was passed contained a form of a pledge that they were to be for the defense of the State. What has resulted? That pledge has turned out to be a delusion. These seven thousand troops thus raised under pledges of form at least that they should be held in the State for her protection, some weeks since were ordered, every man of them, out of the State into other fields of service, and the whole State has been left entirely destitute of any defense, except a few straggling regiments and corps from other States. The Governor has recently recommended and I believe the Legislature has passed a bill authorizing the raising upon State authority of a body of five thousand militia for her defense. I greatly regret that that description of force was not resorted to earlier, two or three years ago, and that a much larger force was not then organized. If such a measure had been adopted the defenses of the State would have been much more effective than they have proved to be under the patronage and control of the General Government.

Now, sir, our State is limited in its wealth and resources. Its revenues especially are limited and it wants all of its means, all of its available resources for the purpose of enabling it in this day of its trouble and of its abandonment by the General Government to raise its force for its own defense; and while it is in this strait the United States is its debtor for money advanced by the State on account of the General Government to the amount of about three hundred thousand dollars as long ago as between two and three years. Two years since, and from that time up to the last session of Congress, Kentucky was sending her special agents here from time to time, importuning and almost dogging the Government of the United States for a settlement of her accounts and the payment of this balance to her, that it might thus be appropriated to her own defense and incidentally to the common defense. Her Governor came here the winter before last in person, and impudently the President day after day for a settlement and the payment of this balance, that it might receive the direction I have indicated in its expenditure; but he was unable to get a settlement. The matter remains in the same condition still. She has asked the President in vain for that settlement. It has never been conceded to her, and does not seem likely to be in any reasonable time.

For the purpose of having a settlement of the account of the State against the United States, and of having a settlement and adjustment of the claims which her citizens have against the Government for use, appropriation, and damage to the property by the authorities of the United States, I now give notice that I shall ask leave to introduce a bill at an early day embracing both these objects, and I will appeal to the justice of the Senate to pass the measure after this long delay. Surely, sir, if there ever was a claim against the Government under any state of case that demanded a favorable consideration it is these claims of Kentucky as a State and of her citizens against the United States; while other States have been allowed by the Treasury officers, and by special acts of Congress, large amounts for both classes of claims.

She has perseveringly from the beginning of the war been denied the privilege to raise militia to be mustered into the service of the United States for her own defense, while other States have been promptly and spontaneously offered that privilege to the amount I have indicated. After she had raised under that bill that made some sort of a promise for that object seven thousand troops, that force was ordered from the State into other States to carry out the military objects of the Government; and she is now determined to raise a force on her own authority. Is it then asking too much that the sum which is due to her by the Government of the United States, and that due to her people also, shall now be paid to enable her and them to meet in part the charge of raising troops for her own defense?

She is now overrun almost from day to day by guerrilla parties. If these State forces had been left for her defense these guerrillas could have been repelled, and they could have been met and annihilated as they ought to have been. This sort of guerrilla warfare consisting of predatory incursions attended with robbery, rapine, and murder, ought not to be recognized by the authorities of the United States as war. The forces engaged in them ought not to be treated as public enemies but should be regarded as robbers and brigands. They ought not to be captured but attacked, pursued, and exterminated.

But, sir, if the State of Kentucky could have retained these seven thousand troops, or if now, at this late day, she was allowed to raise her own militia for her own defense, and the bill was footed by the United States, as it ought to be, because their services would be as much to the general cause as the service of any other forces, she could yet make her defense effective. As it is now, along this whole line of three hundred miles of frontier she is exposed from week to week and from day to day to bloody and cruel and devastating inroads. When driven at length to her own resources to defend herself, I hope the Senate will regard these claims of her government and people, and will pass a law authorizing a commissioner to settle them, and when they are liquidated direct their payment by the disbursing officers of the Treasury.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be printed, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to have it go over until to-morrow morning. I want to make two or three inquiries in regard to the subjects that have been started here this morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the resolution will be laid on the table.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, it was Ordered, That Henry Charles De Alina, colonel, United States volunteers, have leave to withdraw his petition and other papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, it was Ordered, That the petition of John Robb and the opinion of the Court of Claims in his favor be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DOOLITTLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 96) to enable the people of Nevada to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 97) to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. SUMNER, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 98) to repeal all laws for the rendition of fugitive slaves; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. HENDRICKS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 100) authorizing the holding of a special session of the United States district court for the district of Indiana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 101) amendatory to the act entitled "An act for a grant of lands to the State of Kansas in alternate sections to aid in the construction of certain railroads and telegraph lines in said State;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 102) to establish certain post roads, and to regulate commerce among the States, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COWAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 103) to define the rank, pay, and emoluments of chaplains in the United States Army and volunteer force, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPherson, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (No. 16) to amend a joint resolution explanatory of an act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes, approved July 17, 1862; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

Mr. SUMNER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 24) to provide for submitting to the several States an amendment of the Constitution of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that it be referred to the committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suppose the proper committee to which to refer bills to change the Constitution would be the Judiciary Committee. There are already several propositions before that committee in reference to amendments to the Constitution, and I submit to the Senator whether that is not the proper committee to have charge of these subjects.

Mr. SUMNER. Let the amendment be read, and then perhaps the Senate can determine best.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of such Legislatures, shall become a part of the Constitution, to wit:

Article —. Everywhere within the limits of the United States, and of each State or Territory thereof, all persons are equal before the law, so that no person can hold another as a slave.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on referring this joint resolution to the committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that at a very early stage of the session the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENPERSON] introduced a proposition to change the Constitution of the United States so as to prohibit slavery everywhere within its territorial limits. That proposition has been under consideration, and has been somewhat discussed and considered by the Committee on the Judiciary. This is a proposition in another form on the same subject. I submit to the Senator from Massachusetts whether the appropriate committee for all propositions to change the Constitution is not the Judiciary Committee. It seems to me that would be the proper committee. At any rate we are considering that very subject, and these propositions had best all go together. If the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senate should think that the proper committee to consider amendments to the Constitution is the committee on freedmen and slavery, the Committee on the Judiciary had better be discharged from all these propositions which are pending before it in regard to amendments of that character or relating in any way to the subject of slavery.

Mr. FESSENDEN (to Mr. TRUMBULL). Move to amend the motion so as to substitute the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I submit it to the Senator from Massachusetts; I thought probably he would give it that direction.

Mr. SUMNER. I am obliged to the Senator from Illinois for his remarks. He will remember that only a few days ago he reported from the Committee on the Judiciary the petitions relating to the fugitive slave law with a recommendation that they be referred to the committee on slavery. Now, on general grounds, indeed, on the grounds suggested by the Senator, that subject should properly go before the Committee on the Judiciary; but the Committee on the Judiciary have thought otherwise, and it has now been referred to the committee on slavery. Still further, there are propositions which have already been referred to the committee on slavery relating to an amendment of the Constitution so far as to prohibit slavery throughout the United States. I presume the reason for that reference was that the committee on slavery was specially constituted to take into consideration that subject and what should be done with reference to it, whether great or small, whether with regard to the treatment of the freedmen, or amendments in the laws of the land, or even in the Constitution. The language of the resolution under which the committee has been raised is broad enough to cover every proposition relating to slavery; and I simply follow the lead of my distinguished friend, who the other day moved the reference of all papers relating to the fugitive slave law to that committee, when I propose to refer this proposition to the same committee. If the Senator wishes to take charge of it I certainly shall not object; but I understand that already the same question is now pending before the committee on slavery, as the Senator says it is pending before the Committee on the Judiciary. If the Senator desires, after this statement, that this joint resolution which I introduce to-day be referred to the committee of which he is the honored head, I shall consent with the greatest pleasure.

MR. SAULSBURY. I move that the further consideration of this resolution be indefinitely postponed; and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

MR. TRUMBULL. Does that question have precedence of a reference? However, it is immaterial. Either is open to discussion, and I only wish to say a word in reply.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. It has precedence.

MR. TRUMBULL. I only wish to say a word in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts. Personally, I have no desire to take charge of this proposition which the Senator submits. It is only because I supposed that the Judiciary Committee was the proper committee to consider amendments to the Constitution.

The Senator remarks that the Committee on the Judiciary the other day were discharged from the consideration of certain petitions relating to the fugitive slave law and asked that they be referred to the special committee on the subject of freedmen and slavery. That is true, sir. That was deemed by the Committee on the Judiciary to be the appropriate committee to consider all these propositions in reference to a change in the law; but none of the petitions which the Committee on the Judiciary asked to be discharged from related to an amendment of the Constitution. If petitions have been referred to the committee on freedmen and slavery asking for a change of the Constitution, it has been inadvertently done, I presume, so far as the Senate is concerned. I had not observed it, and was not aware that petitions of that character had gone to the committee on freedmen and slavery. Certain it is that petitions of that character and a resolution to amend the Constitution in that respect were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary at a very early day in the session. I have certainly no personal desire to take charge of this matter because I happen to be on the Committee on the Judiciary. It is for the Senate to determine which are the appropriate committees for the business that is presented. It seemed to me that the appropriate committee for all propositions to change the Constitution was the Judiciary Committee. If the Senate is of a different opinion I shall certainly acquiesce in any disposition of it. It is only because I thought, as this subject was pending before the Judiciary Committee, they had best be together, that I made the suggestion.

MR. DOOLITTLE. I never heard before in my life that an amendment to the Constitution was ever referred to any other committee than the Judiciary Committee. It seems to me this is one of those cases that cannot admit of any serious question as to where this proposition should go. I shall not take up time in discussing the subject, but clearly it ought to go to the Judiciary Committee.

MR. SUMNER. I am perfectly willing to follow the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois. I only hope the committee will take charge of it and act upon it soon.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware to postpone this resolution, proposing an amendment to the Constitution, indefinitely.

MR. SAULSBURY. Upon that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour

having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to announce the special order.

MR. SUMNER. I hope we shall be allowed to finish the morning business. There is some other morning business yet to be presented.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will receive morning business if there be no objection. The Chair hears none. The question is on indefinitely postponing the joint resolution before the Senate.

MR. FOOT. I ask for the reading of the resolution. I have not yet heard it read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 8, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Davis, Harding, Hendricks, Powell, Saulsbury, and Wright—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wilson—31.

So the motion to postpone indefinitely was not agreed to.

MR. SUMNER. At the suggestion of the Senator from New York I modify the motion so as to have the joint resolution go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be so referred.

MR. SUMNER. I also ask leave, without having given previous notice, to introduce a bill.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The title of the bill will be read.

THE SECRETARY. "A bill to secure equality before the law in the courts of the United States."

MR. SAULSBURY. I object to its introduction.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. Previous notice not having been given, the bill cannot be introduced as an objection is made.

MR. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 25) repealing a joint resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

MR. ANTHONY. I ask to have the resolution referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It proposes to repeal a joint resolution approved March 2, 1861, and as that resolution is short I ask to have it read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

A joint resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved, &c., That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the said Constitution, namely:

ART. XIII. No amendment shall be made to the Constitution which will authorize or give to Congress the power to abolish or interfere within any State with the domestic institutions thereof, including that of persons held to labor or service by the laws of said State.

Approved March 2, 1861.

MR. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I voted, as did two thirds of the members present of both Houses of the Thirty-Sixth Congress, for this resolution. I would have gone much further than this in any reasonable and proper effort to avert the evils of civil war and to assure the people who had been disaffected by the misrepresentations of demagogues, and made to believe that the Republican party meditated the invasion of their constitutional rights. But the offer was spurned by those whom it was intended to conciliate. So far from accepting it in the spirit in which it was tendered, they threw off their allegiance to the Government and organized rebellion, with the avowed purpose of preventing a Republican Administration from doing what it solemnly avowed it had no purpose of doing, and what they had the power, in a perfectly constitutional manner, to prevent it from doing. Not only was the revolt made upon a false pretext, but even if the pretext had been true there was abundant remedy by peaceable means and within the Constitution.

It does not consist with the dignity of the Government to continue this offer after it has been so received; and it is no longer proper that such a restriction should be put upon the power of Congress, or should be kept upon the power of Congress, even if those to whom it was tendered should be willing to accept it. The grand events of the last two years have altered the whole aspect of the question, and have advanced public opinion to a point which it would not have attained in scores of peaceful years. The policy that then would have been only the affirmation of a political truism would now be an outrage upon the sense of the country and a shame in the face of the civilized world. The true policy now is to strike at slavery wherever it can be reached. So far from adding new guarantees to its existence and its safety, so far from reaffirming the old ones, the true policy is to remove by legal measures the securities that now protect it. The amendment which the Constitution requires on the subject of slavery is quite in the other direction. It has been indicated by the Senator from Massachusetts, [MR. SUMNER,] and the Senator from Missouri, [MR. HENDERSON,] in their propositions so to amend the Constitution as to give to Congress the power to abolish slavery, and thus to secure the public tranquillity by removing the disloyal cause of the troubles which afflict the land, to secure the sympathy of the world by placing our institutions upon the basis of progressive civilization, to invoke the favor of Heaven by ceasing to violate its laws. This proposition comes most appropriately from a Senator from that State which declared that slavery was inconsistent with the Declaration of Independence and the Bill of Rights, and from the Senator of a State that has felt the curse of slavery and the terrible evils of the rebellion that slavery has inaugurated. Wisely has Missouri, wisely has West Virginia, wisely has Maryland determined to remove that curse, and wisely will Congress, and the States determine when they shall resolve that the curse shall never be restored where it has been removed by the people, or where it has been practically abolished by its own suicidal revolt against the Government.

It may be argued that to confer upon Congress the power to abolish slavery may be an implication that the power already exercised in that direction and the larger exercise of it contemplated are not legitimate. The inference is not a necessary one. And the States where the slaves are emancipated by the President's proclamation or by acts of Congress directed against rebels and the source of rebel supply may reenact slavery as soon as the pressure is removed. It is necessary to guard against that; it is necessary not only to proclaim and to establish freedom, but to secure it.

Nor is such a policy inconsistent with the declarations of the Republicans, that originally they had no design of interfering with slavery in the States where the people chose to retain it. We had no such design. It is not we, it is they who have opened the way to freedom, and have made it our duty to tread in the path before us. Slavery in the States never was stronger than it was on the 4th of March, 1861. The election which had pronounced its downfall in the Territories and in this District had affirmed its accursed rights in the States. But God maketh the wrath of man to praise Him, and the remainder of wrath He restraineth. What the Republican party could not do, what no election could do, what no peaceable movement would have been likely to accomplish in many years, slavery has done of itself and to itself. It has sealed its own doom; it has made its existence incompatible with the safety of the Republic, with the continuance of the Union. It has committed suicide. If we had been asked a few years ago, Do you purpose to invade Virginia? do you intend to blockade Mobile? do you mean to batter down the walls of Sumter? no one will doubt the sincerity with which we should have answered, No. Yet we have done all this and much more of the same character, and the only complaint is that we have not done enough of it nor with sufficient vigor. Equally sincere was our denial of the intention to interfere with slavery in the States. But they who have made it necessary that we should invade Virginia, that we should blockade Mobile, that we should batter down Sumter, have equally made it necessary that we should strike at slavery, the primal cause, the sustaining power of the rebellion. The responsibility, so far as their own interests are affected, is theirs; the duty is ours; the benefit will be to the country, to the world.

MR. SAULSBURY. A few moments ago, when the Senator from Massachusetts asked leave to introduce a bill of which previous notice had not been given, I objected, not on account of the source from whence the application was made, but simply because I thought we had had enough this morning of the negro. Since that, the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island has been introduced and entertained, and we have had a speech on the same subject. I therefore withdraw the objection I made to the introduction of the bill of the Senator from Massachusetts, so that the whole batch may go to the committee together. When the committee reports, I inform the Senator from Rhode Island that I shall take occasion to review the consistency and the honesty of his party in reference to this whole subject of slavery.

Mr. ANTHONY. I beg to say one word in reply. If the Senator from Delaware has ever made any speech in this Chamber the whole staple of which was not upon the negro, it is one that I did not have the pleasure of listening to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Rhode Island will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Senator from Delaware having withdrawn his objection to the introduction of the bill proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, the question is upon granting leave to introduce that bill.

By unanimous consent leave was given to introduce a bill (S. No. 99) to secure equality before the law in the courts of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of John F. Denson, paymaster's clerk in the Navy, praying for an increase of compensation of paymasters' clerks, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 104) to regulate the pay of clerks to paymasters in the Navy. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print twelve hundred extra copies of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey for the use of the Senate, and three thousand copies to be distributed by the Superintendent, reported it without amendment; and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. CLARK. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John C. Magill, have directed me to ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the petitioner have leave to take his papers if he chooses to file them with the Court of Claims, it being a case on a contract and no resolution directing the Senate committee to take cognizance of it.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of F. B. Groff, ask that the same disposition be made of this petition, it being a matter arising on a contract.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. The same committee have also directed me to report adversely upon the claim of Samuel L. Linah. The claim has already been submitted to the War Department, and they have allowed upon the claim what the Department thought just, and the committee do not see any reason for revising that report. I move the indefinite postponement of the petition.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. The same committee, to whom was referred the petition of sundry soldiers asking for a bounty under the act of Congress, have directed me to ask that the committee be discharged from its consideration, with a view that it may go to the War Department as the proper place.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. The same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Charles W. Denison, asking to be reimbursed for expenses incurred on a mission to England, have directed me to make an adverse report, and I move that that case be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. The same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Susan W. Harris, praying for compensation for four slaves which she alleges were set free and emancipated under and by virtue of an act of Congress emancipating slaves in the District of Columbia, have directed me to make an adverse report, it appearing that her claim was presented before the commissioners and rejected by them, and the law provides that that shall be a final disposition of it unless in certain cases within which this case does not come. I move that the petition be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

SLAVERY AND THE REBELLION.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolutions for consideration; and they were ordered to be printed and laid on the table:

1. Resolved, That, in order to determine the duties of the national Government at the present moment, it is of the first importance that we should see and understand the real character of the contest which has been forced upon the United States, for a failure truly to appreciate this contest must end disastrously in a failure of those proper efforts which are essential to the reestablishment of unity and concord; that, recognizing the contest in its real character, as it must be recorded by history, it will be apparent beyond controversy that this is not an ordinary rebellion, or an ordinary war, but, that it is absolutely without precedent, differing clearly from every other rebellion and every other war, inasmuch as it is an audacious attempt, for the first time in history, to found a wicked power on the cornerstone of slavery; and that such an attempt having this single object—whether regarded as rebellion or as war—is so completely penetrated, and absorbed, so entirely filled and possessed by slavery, that it can be justly regarded as nothing else than the huge impersonation of this crime, at once rebel and belligerent, or in other words, as slavery in arms.

2. Resolved, That, recognizing the unquestionable identity of the rebellion and of slavery, so that each is to the other as another self, it becomes plain that the rebellion cannot be crushed without crushing slavery, as slavery cannot be crushed without crushing the rebellion: that every forbearance to the one is a forbearance to the other and every blow at the one is a blow at the other; that all who tolerate slavery, tolerate the rebellion, and all who strike at slavery, strike at the rebellion: and that therefore, it is our supremest duty, in which all other present duties are contained, to take care that the barbarism of slavery in which alone the rebellion has its origin and life, is so utterly trampled out that it can never spring up again anywhere in the rebel and belligerent region; for leaving this duty undone nothing is done, and all our blood and treasure have been lavished in vain.

3. Resolved, That, in dealing with the rebel war the national Government is invested with two classes of rights—one the rights of sovereignty, inherent and indefeasible everywhere within the limits of the United States, and the other the rights of war, or belligerent rights, which have been superinduced by the nature and extent of the contest; that, by virtue of the rights of sovereignty, the rebel and belligerent region is now subject to the national Government as its only rightful Government, bound under the Constitution to all the duties of sovereignty, and by special mandate bound also "to guaranty to every State a republican form of government and to protect it against invasion;" that, by virtue of the rights of war, this same region is subject to all the conditions and incidents of war, according to the established usages of Christian nations, out of which is derived the familiar maxim of public duty, "indemnity for the past and security for the future."

4. Resolved, That, in seeking the restoration of the States to their proper places as members of the Republic, so that every State shall enjoy again its constitutional functions and every star on our national flag shall represent a State, in reality as well as in name, care must be taken that the rebellion is not allowed, through any negligence or mistaken concession, to retain the least foothold for future activity, or the least germ of future life; that, whether proceeding by the exercise of sovereign rights or of belligerent rights, the same precautions must be exacted against future peril; that, therefore, any system of "reconstruction" must be rejected which does not provide by irreversible guarantees against the continued existence or possible revival of slavery, and that such guarantees can be primarily obtained only through the agency of the national Government, which to this end must assert a temporary supremacy, military or civil, throughout the rebel and belligerent region, of sufficient duration, to stamp upon this region the character of freedom.

5. Resolved, That, in the exercise of this essential supremacy of the national Government a solemn duty is cast upon Congress to see that no rebel State is prematurely restored to its constitutional functions, until within its borders all proper safeguards are established, so that loyal citizens, including the new-made freedmen, cannot at any time be molested by evil-disposed persons, and especially that no man there may be made a slave; that this solemn duty belongs to Congress under the Constitution, whether in the exercise of rights of sovereignty or rights of war; and that, in its performance, that system of "reconstruction" will be found the best—howsoever it may be named—which promises most surely to accomplish the desired end, so that slavery, which is the synonym of the rebellion, shall absolutely cease throughout the whole rebel and belligerent region, and the land which it has maddened, impoverished, and degraded, shall become safe, fertile, and glorious from assured Emancipation.

6. Resolved, That, in the process of "reconstruction" it is not enough to secure the death of slavery throughout the rebel and belligerent region only; that experience testifies against slavery wherever it exists, not only as a crime against humanity but as a disturber of the public peace and the spoiler of the public liberties, including the liberty of the press, the liberty of speech, and the liberty of travel and transit; that obviously, in the progress of civilization, it has become incompatible with good government, and especially with that "republican form of government" which the United States are bound to guaranty to every

State; that from the outbreak of this rebel war, even in States professing loyalty, it has been an open check upon patriotic duty and an open accessory to the rebellion, so as to be a source of unquestionable weakness to the national cause; that the defiant pretensions of the master, claiming the control of his slave, are in direct conflict with the paramount rights of the national Government; and that, therefore, it is the further duty of Congress, in the exercise of its double powers, under the Constitution, as guardian of the national safety, to take all needful steps to secure the extinction of slavery, even in States professing loyalty, so that this crime against humanity, this disturber of the public peace, and this spoiler of the public liberties shall no longer exist anywhere to menace the general harmony; that civilization may be no longer shocked; that the constitutional guaranty of a republican form of government to every State may be fulfilled; that the rebellion may be deprived of the traitorous aid and comfort which slavery has instinctively volunteered; and that the master, claiming an unnatural property in human flesh, may no longer defy the national Government.

7. Resolved, That, in addition to the guarantees stipulated by Congress, and as the cap-stone to its work of restoration and reconciliation, the Constitution itself must be so amended as to prohibit slavery everywhere within the limits of the Republic; that such a prohibition, leaving all personal claims, whether of slave or master, to the legislation of Congress and of the States, will be in itself a sacred and inviolable guarantee, representing the collective will of the people of the United States, and placing universal emancipation under the sanction of the Constitution, so that freedom shall be engraved on every foot of the national soil, and be woven into every star of the national flag, while it elevates and inspires our whole national existence, and the Constitution, so often invoked for slavery, but at last in harmony with the Declaration of Independence, will become, according to the holy aspirations of its founders, the sublime guardian of the inalienable right of every human being to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; all of which must be done in the name of the Union, in duty to humanity and for the sake of permanent peace.

MANAGEMENT OF HOSPITALS.

Mr. NESMITH submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to procure and transmit to the Senate the record of proceedings of a court-martial, convened in New York city by virtue of special order No. 118, December 7, 1863, for the trial of Assistant Surgeon Webster, for refusing to permit a dangerously wounded soldier to be removed from the McDougall general hospital, in a cold storm of rain, without permission of the medical director of the department, together with the defense of the accused read at the trial, the finding of the court, the recommendation of its members in respect to a remission of the sentence, and the decision of Major General Dix thereon. Also, that the General-in-Chief of the Army be requested to report in detail what authority, if any, subordinate military commanders have, by existing regulations, independent of the medical department, over general hospitals; what distinction, if any, there is in that respect between field or post hospitals and general hospitals; what orders or decisions have been made by the Secretary of War, General-in-Chief, or Surgeon General on the subject; and whether the interests of the service do not require that all orders relating to the management of general hospitals, and the reception, treatment, and transfer of patients, should pass through the Surgeon General or his immediate representative, the medical director.

Mr. WILSON. I think that resolution had better lie over until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will lie over.

NAVAL COAL-HEAVERS AND FIREMEN.

Mr. GRIMES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for granting honorable discharges to coal-heavers and firemen in the naval service, as are now granted to seamen, ordinary seamen, landsmen, and boys.

REVISION OF DISTRICT LAWS.

Mr. MORRILL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire whether any further legislation is necessary to complete the revision of the laws of said District contemplated by the act of March 3, 1863.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Pacific Railroad be requested to consider the question of so amending the ninth section of the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean," &c., as to make the cities of Lawrence and Topeka points on said road.

POST ROUTE.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Fort Scott, Kansas, by the military road to Fort Smith, Arkansas.

MILITARY INTERFERENCE WITH ELECTIONS.

Mr. POWELL. I offer the following resolution, and I ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to transmit to the Senate all orders or instructions issued from the War Department to provost marshals in the States of Kentucky, Delaware, Maryland, and Missouri, concerning elections in those States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will inquire of the Senator from Kentucky if the report which has been laid on our tables this morning does not embrace everything of that kind?

Mr. POWELL. It does not. It only gives us the orders issued to and by generals commanding in the field. This resolution calls for the orders issued to provost marshals.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Does not what is in this report appear to be all?

Mr. POWELL. It does not.

Mr. WILSON. I do not believe there is any reason for making objection to the inquiry. I am perfectly willing for one that it shall be made.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have certainly no objection to the inquiry. I merely wished to call the attention of the Senator from Kentucky to the report which has been laid on our tables. I did not know that he had examined it.

Mr. POWELL. I will say to the Senator that I examined it particularly this morning, and it is incomplete. There are matters not embraced in that report which this resolution will bring out.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no sort of objection. I wish to know myself whether there has been any interference with elections by the military.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 18) to amend a joint resolution explanatory of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 26th ultimo, transmitting a report of the Secretary of War, communicating the correspondence between the authorities of the United States and the rebel authorities on the exchange of prisoners, and the different propositions connected with that subject; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report of the Secretary of State on the subject of a reciprocity treaty with the Sandwich Islands; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in obedience to law, a statement showing the balances to the credit of that Department on the 1st of July, 1862, the amounts appropriated for the year ending June 30, 1863, the amounts drawn from those appropriations or carried to the surplus fund, and the balances remaining in the Treasury at the last named date; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (No. 30) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General W. T. Sherman, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENLISTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 41) to promote enlistments in the Army of the United States, and for other purposes; the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. HENDERSON, in section three, line five, after the word "he," to strike out the words "his mother, and his wife and children," and after the word "notwithstanding," in the seventh line, to insert:

And his mother, his wife, and children shall also be free, provided that by the laws of any State they owe service or labor to any person or persons who have given aid or comfort to the existing rebellion against the Government since July 17, 1862.

So that the whole section will read as follows:

That when any person of African descent whose service or labor is claimed in any State under the laws thereof shall be mustered into the military or naval service of the United States, he shall forever thereafter be free, any law, usage, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding; and his mother, his wife, and children shall also be free, provided that by the laws of any State they owe service or labor to any person or persons who have given aid or comfort to the existing rebellion against the Government since July 17, 1862; and all laws and parts of laws inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. CARLILE. Mr. President, "in these unhappy times, when good men are rendered odious and bad men popular, when great men are made little and little men are made great," he who would serve his country must be "above the reach of personal considerations." It has been the habit of those who "Crook the pregnant hinges of the knee, Where thrift may follow fawning," to charge with disloyalty all who differ with the party in power, and to denounce as sympathizers with rebellion all who attempt to confine the General Government within the limits prescribed by the Constitution. If a warm and undying attachment to the Constitution which created the Union constitutes disloyalty, then am I disloyal. If sincere, fervent, impassioned, burning desire for the overthrow of the rebellion and the return of peace is sympathy with the rebellion, then am I a sympathizer. At the hazard of my life I opposed the secession of my State. "Solitary and alone," when stout hearts quailed and strong men faltered, I inaugurated and organized the movement that rolled back the wave of secession and kept within the fold of the Union the section of the State in which I reside. There is not to-day a spot of earth over which the confederate flag floats upon which I would dare to tread.

That Virginia which gave to the Colonies the commander of their armies, and to the States the president of the Convention that framed the bond of union between them, as well as the father of the Constitution and the author of the Declaration of Independence, should have been betrayed into secession, is one of the wonders of the age. That her people should oppose the exercise of arbitrary power is but consistent with her past history, around which cluster so many precious recollections. Glorious old State! even now, while striving to release herself from a Union in the formation of which she acted so conspicuous a part, and for which she gave away an empire, she stands proud and defiant, the wonder of the world, the valor of her sons and the fortitude of her people challenging the admiration of mankind. With almost every acre of her soil red with the blood of her children, she still is, as she has been from the beginning, the main stay and support of a cause into which she was betrayed.

I am not, Mr. President, as hopeful as some of an early cessation of hostilities, nor do I believe that the "starvation" which has kept the confederates alive for the last three years is likely to terminate in their early death. I believe with Andrew Jackson that the Constitution cannot be maintained nor the Union preserved in opposition to public feeling by the mere coercive powers of the General Government. It is because I have so believed that for near two years I have been thrown in opposition to those with whom I would have gladly acted, and with whom I expected at the opening of the extra session and of the first regular session of the last Congress to act.

We have, however, in the progress of this struggle reached a point where its nature and its character must be settled, and settled definitely. Upon that settlement depends, in my judgment, not only the restoration of the Union but the perpetuation of the liberties of the people inhabiting the States represented in this Chamber as secured to them by the Constitution of 1789. For near two years it has been patent to my mind that the theory advanced by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in the very able and ingenious speech with which he favored the Senate last week, although not the declared policy of the Administration, governed in this fierce and mighty struggle which is sapping the foundations of public liberty and rapidly exhausting the resources of the nation.

Is the struggle—and these are the questions that are forcing themselves upon the Senate now for its determination—is the struggle in which we are engaged an exercise by the Government of the United States of its constitutional power to suppress an insurrection within its constitutional jurisdiction, and to put down a rebellion against its lawful authority, or is it a war waged by the States represented in this Chamber, commonly called the northern States, against the southern States? If the former, it is a struggle between the Government of the United States and its rebellious citizens, and in its prosecution we must draw all our legislative power from the Constitution. If the latter, we are under no constitutional restraint, and are only responsible to the civilized world for the manner in which we conduct the war. That the latter is the opinion of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in the other House is to be ascertained from his recent speech, in which is the following paragraph:

"But it is said that this must be considered a contest with rebel individuals only, as States in the Union cannot make war. That is true so long as they remain in the Union. But they claim to be out of the Union; and the very fact that we have admitted them to be in a state of war, to be belligerents, shows that they are no longer in the Union, and that they are waging war in their corporate name of the 'confederate States.'"

I regard this as an admission that at some period or other in the prosecution of this struggle we have been so affected by the conduct of the people of the seceded States who are in arms against the authority of the General Government as to have lost to the people of the adhering States that form of Government to preserve which they in the commencement of the struggle resorted to arms. I regard the positions assumed by the Senator from Ohio, though not so broad, as leading to the same conclusion as that which I have read. The Senator still maintains that we are under the Constitution, and while admitting that in time of peace there is no power conferred on the Congress of the United States by the Constitution to interfere with the domestic relations as recognized by the States of the Union, he claims by virtue of that very Constitution to derive legislative authority from the laws of war. Let me state as I understand them the positions assumed by the Senator in the speech to which I have referred. They are these: That the struggle in which we are engaged is with States as such united under a common Government and not with individuals; that we are not engaged in suppressing an insurrection or rebellion, but in open, flagrant war with a belligerent Power, which we have recognized as such; that being engaged in civil war we are only bound by the laws of public war and are not restrained by the Constitution of the United States in the means we employ, the measures we adopt, or the manner in which we conduct the war; that Congress is not authorized by the Constitution to emancipate slaves, but in time of civil war Congress derives the power to emancipate from the laws of war.

To prove that such power is conferred upon Congress, the Senator cites the clause authorizing Congress to raise armies. He denies that the President possesses the power under the Constitution. He denies that his emancipation proclamation can have any effect upon slaves who are not brought within its operation during actual hostilities. Now, sir, granting that we have the constitutional power, where can any law that we may enact on this subject have any effect during the existence of this rebellion beyond our military lines? If you can derive the power to emancipate slaves from the power to raise armies, it seems to me it would be a less stretch of the imagination to suppose that the President possessed the power when he has sworn to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution.

In opposition to the authority of the Senator on this subject, that we derive any legislative power from the laws of war, I will quote the opinions of Mr. John Quincy Adams. In a speech made by him in New York in 1839, in speaking of the powers of Government as divided between the different departments, he said:

"The legislative powers of Congress are, therefore, limited to specific grants contained in the Constitution itself, all restricted on one side by the power of internal legislation within the separate States, and on the other by the laws of nations, otherwise and more properly called the rights of war and peace, consisting of all the rules of intercourse between independent nations. These?"

That is, the laws of war—

"are not subject to the legislative authority of any one nation, and they are, therefore, not included within the powers of Congress."

But the very nature of the Government, being one of limited and delegated powers, being a compact between the people of the several States in their separate and distinct character of States, is conclusive as to the power of Congress to legislate beyond the grants contained in the instrument which creates Congress itself. The very first section of the very first article of the Constitution declares that

"All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives."

To the Constitution, then, not to the laws of war, we must look for all power which we can rightfully exercise as the legislative branch of this Government. All powers not granted were not reserved to the people in the aggregate, but were reserved to the States respectively and to the people thereof; clearly showing that the Government of the United States is the result of compact between the States, and that the Union created by the Constitution is a Union only to the extent of the powers granted, and no further. To attempt, therefore, to make war against the States as such, is, in my judgment and in the view which I have presented of the power of the Federal Government, an unwarrantable and arbitrary assumption of power which the States as such would be justified before the civilized world in resisting. To assume such a position is to give to the rebellion, which we have been engaged for nearly three years in subduing, a position which it never could have obtained for itself. It is to acknowledge that the experiment our fathers made and the institutions under which we have lived and grown can no longer be maintained by the people; not that the experiment itself or that the institutions themselves are failures, but that the people to whom their preservation has been intrusted have become unworthy of them and are lacking in that virtue and intelligence which are necessary to enable them to preserve institutions won for and bequeathed to them by the founders of the Government.

The whole scope and plan of the powers of the Government, as ascertained by the Constitution, is to operate upon individuals and not States. The Government of the United States enforces obedience to its Constitution and laws by exacting their rigid observance from individuals and not from States. You have no power under the Constitution to coerce a State; you have no power under the Constitution to use force against a State as such; but you are confined in the employment of all the force which belongs to you under the Constitution to its assertion as against individuals and not against States. This very proposition, to authorize the Government that was about to be formed to use force against a State, was made in the Convention that framed the Constitution of the United States, and was postponed without a dissenting voice. In the plan of a constitution and form of government submitted to the Convention by Mr. Randolph in the shape of resolutions, the sixth resolution contained a grant of power "authorizing an exercise of the force of the whole against a delinquent State," and when it came up for consideration—

"Mr. Madison observed that the more he reflected on the use of force, the more he doubted the practicability, the justice, and the efficacy of it, when applied to people collectively and not individually. An union of these States containing such an ingredient seemed to provide for its own destruction. The use of force against a State would look more like a declaration of war than an infliction of punishment; and would probably be considered by the party attacked as a dissolution of all previous compacts by which it might be bound. He hoped that such a system would be framed as might render this unnecessary, and moved that the clause be postponed. This motion was agreed to, nem. con."—The Madison Papers, vol. 2, p. 761.

Here, then, we have the authority which is claimed by the Senator from Ohio denied in the Convention that framed the Constitution, and the nature of the force and against whom it is to be used clearly defined.

Now, sir, what are the war powers of the General Government? They are contained in the Constitution. Congress has the power "To declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water; to raise and support armies; but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years; to provide and maintain a Navy; to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces."

That is the extent of the war powers of Congress. When Congress has declared war, when Congress has raised its army, the mode and manner of conducting that war is intrusted to the Executive and the military authorities of the Government, and they are to be bound in its conduct, by the laws of war. To suppose that a Government created by each State for itself, a Government that could have no force or effect in any single State until it was ratified and adopted by that State for itself, would contain a grant of power to make war upon the State so adopting, is to suppose that the men who created it were wholly irrational. It is to suppose that they had learned nothing in the war out of which they had just come. The Government of the United States is the child of civil war. It is the creature of civil war. It was framed by men who resorted to civil war for the purpose of severing the tie which united them with the mother country. It was established upon the principle that there could be a union in the same Government for common purposes between States of different local interests and different local institutions. The principle that was established by the foundation of this Government was, that a union of States having different interests and dissimilar local institutions could be formed for purposes of common defense. If the power which is proposed to be exercised here is exerted, and if it is necessary to be exerted to maintain territorial unity, it is a declaration that after seventy years of trial that principle has proven to be a failure, and we are at war in 1864 to destroy what it took seven years of war, from 1776 to 1783, and six years of peace, to establish.

Mr. President, I have no interest in this question of slavery. I dislike to discuss it. I only refer to it because it has been selected as the institution to be annihilated, and because through it State rights are to be stricken down and State sovereignty ignored. The argument that slavery is the cause of the war, that there can be no union with slaveholding States, is an argument against the facts asserted and the principles established by the formation of the Government; it is an argument against the right of a State to govern itself and to prescribe and regulate within its own jurisdiction its own domestic and internal policy; it is an argument which, if acquiesced in, must inevitably destroy our present beautiful system of Government and erect upon its ruins a strong central Government; it is an argument tending to consolidation of power in the central Government; it is an argument against any union between States of different geographical interests and of dissimilar local institutions. If we are unable by constitutional means to resist the power of secession and preserve the Union then has our experiment proven a failure. Such was the view taken by the distinguished Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] at the second session of the last Congress, when he said:

"Mr. President, our nation is in a stage and condition of its national existence where undoubtedly it attracts more than it ever did before the notice of the nations of the world, not merely in relation to the skill which is shown in our new projectiles or improved ordnance or invulnerable ships, or even in our battles, but the attention of the world is attracted to what is to be the result on this great occasion of this national experiment of ours. They say, 'Your experiment of a republican form of government succeeds well enough in time of peace, when there is no occasion to try it, when there is nothing to test it; but they have looked forward to some time which might bring periods of trial and convulsion; and the question before the world is, is our system competent to that occasion, does it possess strength and elements of power sufficient to meet the shock of such a contingency? If it will not do that, they say it is not what we have claimed it to be before the world—the great and successful experiment in popular government.' Now, say the world, 'we shall see whether you can succeed with what appears to us a feebly formed Government in a period of trial.' That we may be enabled to sustain the integrity of the nation—I mean its entirety, not its sense of justice—by the physical force of the nation is but one step in it. That is not the point. The great question before the world to be now settled by us is, can we sustain the integrity of our Government, and perpetuate our institutions, and do so according to the limitations and provisions of the Constitution? That is what is to show that our Constitution is competent to the trial, and nothing short of that. If, when this occasion arises, we are compelled to resort to means which, in effect, are the means used by stronger Governments, our experiment is a failure. If we are constrained to call up, invoke, and put in exercise in any one department of the Government—it is immaterial in what department of the Government—more of power, more of force than the Constitution provides, or than is limited by that Constitution—the moment we do that, or are constrained from our supposed necessities to do that, we acknowledge before the world that our institutions are insufficiently founded, and that we are after all compelled, in the period of trial, to resort to the force which, they say, is necessary to the existence of a nation, and our experiment is a failure. We should, therefore, particularly in a period like this, carefully study and sacredly regard all the limitations and provisions of the Constitution. It is vain and idle in us to war against a part of our people because they have made war upon this Government, if we at the same time have to sap the foundations of the Government by stabbing through the vitals of the Constitution."

I concur with the Senator from Vermont; and if we have arrived at that period in this struggle when the legislative authority of this Government is compelled to acknowledge that the rebellion has so far proven a success that they have established for themselves a government of their own which we are bound to recognize and acknowledge, then the time has arrived when the people of the adhering States, as they are called, ought to pause and consider well whether a continuance of the war for the purpose of liberating the African and against the right of self-government in the States is not more likely to result in their own enslavement, by the loss to them of their constitutional liberties, than in the benefit of the African.

We have never as a Congress recognized the confederate States as a belligerent power. If it be true, as the Senator from Ohio says, "that they have won a position beyond the reach of your Constitution, that our war with them must be tested by the laws of war, and these questions must be decided by the laws of war as recognized and practiced among civilized nations in ancient and modern times," I ask you for your authority under the Constitution of the United States, and as a Government created by it, to wage this war. I regard the admission contained within that sentence as pregnant with meaning, and, if correct, fatal to the cause of reunion.

Much of the Senator's speech was devoted to showing that we could not put slaves in the Army without committing ourselves to their emancipation, assuming without proving the authority in this Government to emancipate; and to prove that assumption he read from an act of my own State emancipating slaves who had aided in the war of the Revolution. The power of a State to emancipate its slaves has never been doubted. The power of the Federal Government or the power of the Confederation which preceded it never was invoked for the purpose of emancipating a single slave.

The Senator is for arming the slaves of the confederates. He says:

"Their whole confederacy is built, as Mr. Stephens said, on the idea that man should own property in man; that the negro is inferior and must be held subordinate to the white race; that he must be held as a slave. If they arm the slaves and promise them freedom, their whole confederacy would crumble into dust. I do not fear any empty threats of that kind."

Let me say to that Senator if it shall become necessary in this struggle for the confederates to arm their slaves they will arm and emancipate them too; and I will say further if their confederacy never crumbles into dust until it does so from the arming and emancipating their slaves it will last until "Heaven's last thunder shakes the world below."

The slaves know that their owners have the legal right to emancipate them. Many of them know that you have not. They do not concur in the opinion that the Congress derives from the laws of war legislative authority to emancipate, "by bill or otherwise." They may have faith in the power of your Army to protect them.

I have been and am willing to assert the power of this Government against rebellion, and have, by virtue of my location, a deeper interest in the preservation of the Union under the Constitution than gentlemen residing in States remote from the scene of hostilities. I therefore would go as far as he who goes farthest to exert every constitutional power for the restoration of the Union; but I cannot, consistently with what I believe to be the true policy in the attainment of that end, consent to the exercise of powers clearly not within the scope of the Federal Government.

Let the contest, therefore, be conducted against individuals in arms, and not against States; let it be the use of force for the purpose of breaking up and dispersing the military power of the seceded States; let your army be not an army for conquest; let not war be visited upon populations and homes; let us not have in our morning papers achievements such as were accomplished by that bad man, Butler, the other day in my own State when he sent his transports and his artillery, his gunboats and his infantry, to a widowed lady's plantation, not residing upon it, but who had collected for the support of her servants some twenty or thirty thousand pounds of pork and other provisions for their subsistence. Butler's division destroyed the provisions thus collected for the servants, ninety-nine of whom he captured and brought away with him, and thereupon a dispatch appears in the papers of the day headed, "Great battle at Brandon; General Butler's great victory; an achievement of which the nation ought to be proud;" all of which, the destruction of the private property of an absent widow lady and the capture of her slaves, was accomplished without the loss of a man or the sinking of a transport.

No, Mr. President, those people are entitled, not only under the Constitution of the United States but by the laws of war, to your protection. They have a claim upon your sympathy. They were your fellow-citizens. They are now, because of your inability to protect them, compelled to acknowledge what is to them a government de facto. You should be able to afford protection where you demand allegiance.

Mr. President, I have said from the beginning, and I have been confirmed in that opinion by every day's experience, that the mere coercive powers of this Government never will restore the Union. What progress have you made in its accomplishment? Where has your Army gone one hundred miles from your water or your rail transportation? Do you not know the utter impossibility of carrying it any distance where you will have to wagon over miserable roads the supplies to subsist the men? The further you go into the interior, the further you recede from the great lines of communication and thoroughfares of travel, and the larger your Army, the weaker it becomes.

I claim no sympathy for the authors of this rebellion; I grant your power to use physical force against armed rebellion; but I think true policy requires, as well as humanity dictates, that we should distinguish between those in rebellion against your authority, those in arms, and those who are not willingly engaged in an effort to sever the connection that heretofore existed between them and this Government. Bring to bear your power against offending individuals; but at the same time bring to bear your power in favor of those who are not engaged in the strife, or who have been made the unwilling instruments of a power which they were unable to resist.

In the war with Mexico instructions were sent out from the War Department to our generals to purchase even their supplies from the Mexicans. No one doubts the right in time of war to levy contributions on the enemy for the support of the Army; but that law of war was modified by our Government in its instructions to the commanding general in Mexico. Shall we treat these people worse than we treated the Mexicans? If it was deemed right to accompany the Army with one empowered to treat for peace with a foreign nation, is it improper to accompany the Army with the olive-branch now? Will you exact obedience to your laws where you are unable to give protection?

In the beginning of the struggle we clearly defined its character, clearly defined the power of the Government of the United States as against the citizens of the seceded States. We declared it to be, what alone it can constitutionally be, an exertion of the physical power of the nation against individuals, and not against States. In the instructions of Mr. Seward to our ministers in Great Britain and France, in April, 1861, he expressly disclaimed all right or all power on the part of the Government of the United States to interfere during this war, if you call it such, with the rights of any State; and he said, in so many words, that whether the rebellion should succeed or should fail the status of the slave would remain the same. The President of the United States, in his inaugural address delivered from the eastern portico of this Capitol, expressly disclaimed all authority to interfere with the domestic institutions of the States, and all desire to do so. Let us adhere to the position taken by these different organs of the Government and by the Congress of the United States in its resolution of July, 1861, prosecute this struggle against individuals for the purpose of asserting the supremacy of the Constitution and enforcing obedience to the laws made in pursuance thereof.

So late as last July Mr. Seward, in a letter to Mr. Adams, taking a survey of our domestic relations, which I shall not detain the Senate by reading, for I presume Senators are familiar with it, characterizes the struggle in which we are engaged as an insurrection, and denies that the Confederate States are entitled to recognition as a belligerent Power. A discussion in this body urging that they have won a position outside of the Constitution and acknowledging them as an independent Power, and recognizing them as a belligerent, will not be likely to facilitate what I presume was the object of the Secretary's dispatch to our minister in England.

What is a war of conquest, Mr. President? Who can tell when it ends? It is interminable; never ending; always existing. It may for a time be lulled into quiet, but only to gather renewed strength and to renew the combat.

Mr. DOOLITTLE obtained the floor; and on his motion the further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Kansas, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, February 8, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER stated that the regular order of business was the call of the States and Territories for bills for reference, not to be brought back into the House by motions to reconsider.

DEPARTMENTAL REPRESENTATION.

Mr. PENDLETON, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to provide that the Secretaries of Executive Departments may occupy seats on the floor of the House of Representatives; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to a select committee of seven.

FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

Mr. SPALDING, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to repeal the fugitive slave law; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY.

Mr. ORTH, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to create and organize a Department of the Government to be called the Department of Industry; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LAND ENTRIES IN MISSOURI.

Mr. BLOW, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to confirm certain entries of land in the State of Missouri; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PAY OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. WILSON, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to amend the sixteenth section of the act entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

IMPORTED GOODS FOR CANADA.

Mr. JULIAN introduced a bill to repeal so much of the acts of Congress approved March 3, 1845, and August 6, 1846, as authorizes the transportation of goods imported from foreign countries through the United States into Canada, or from Canada into the United States, to be exported to foreign countries; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

UTAH INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. KINNEY introduced a bill to vacate the present Indian reservations in Utah Territory and to settle the Indians in the Uinta valley; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

INDIAN DEPREDACTIONS IN UTAH.

Mr. KINNEY also introduced a bill to provide for the appointment of commissioners to ascertain and report to the Secretary of the Interior the losses sustained by the people of the Territory of Utah by Indian depredations; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

INDIAN LANDS IN UTAH.

Mr. KINNEY also introduced a bill to extinguish the Indian title to lands in the Territory of Utah suitable for agricultural and mineral purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SEVENTH DISTRICT IN VIRGINIA.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee of Elections, presented a report, accompanied by two resolutions, declaring that Lewis McKenzie is not entitled, and that B. M. Kitchen is not entitled, to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the seventh congressional district in Virginia, and asked that the report be printed and laid upon the table.

It was so ordered.

Mr. SMITH presented the views of the minority of the Committee of Elections on the same question, and asked that they be printed and laid upon the table with the other report.

It was so ordered.

CALL OF STATES FOR RESOLUTIONS.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the next business in order, to call the States for resolutions, commencing with the State of Wisconsin.

CHICAGO HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. ARNOLD. As I was not present when the State of Illinois was called for bills, I now ask unanimous consent to introduce an act to improve the Chicago harbor.

Mr. HOLMAN called for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read in full.

Mr. ARNOLD. I move its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. As this is a bill to levy a tax on all the commerce of the lakes, I move that it be referred to a select committee of nine.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I have introduced the bill for the purpose of having the subject investigated. I am not prepared to say I shall support the bill. I want the subject examined.

The SPEAKER. Under the present call there can be no debate on any bill introduced.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I have no opposition to the reference of the bill, provided it be sent to a select committee.

The SPEAKER. Bills introduced under this call are to be referred, under the rule, to their appropriate committees. The House can determine which is the appropriate committee.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. Then I object to the introduction of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The objection comes too late.

The question was taken on the reference to the Committee on Commerce; and it was agreed to.

So the bill, having been read a first and second time, was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GRINNELL, having been absent when the State of Wisconsin was called, asked leave to introduce a bill.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia, objected.

PLEDGE OF PUBLIC ECONOMY.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin, offered the following resolution, and moved the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, That the thanks of this House are due to those noble women who, as members of Sanitary Commissions, Ladies' Aid Societies, and Christian Commissions, have contributed in labor and means to the relief of our soldiers; that this aid has become necessary, not because Congress is unwilling to meet every demand which justice to our brave men in the field may require, either in the way of bounties, pay, or relief, but because we recognize the fact that the resources of the country in money and credit form a material part of our power to crush out the rebellion, and that the mite bestowed by the poor and the bounty contributed by the rich are material aids in the righteous work before us; that this House recognizes its own duty to respond to the patriotic efforts referred to, and to reserve, so far as possible, the public funds and credit for the uses of the war; that, while acknowledging and encouraging these individual efforts, which have (considered as the results of the labor of the fair hands of our ladies alone) brought important sums, and which at the great northwestern fair at Chicago alone produced $75,000, it would be cruel mockery to those noble women for this House to expend millions upon any schemes, however specious, to which public faith is not already pledged, or not demanded by the immediate necessities of this war; and that, in view of the premises, this House pledges its faith alike to the women of the country, to the men who have liberally contributed of their substance, and to our creditors, that it will pursue a course of rigid economy, and, while exercising a wise and cautious liberality toward all objects immediately connected with the suppression of the rebellion, it will strictly refrain from all schemes, whether of internal improvement or otherwise, to which public faith is not already pledged, and which, not materially affecting the war now before us, may constitute a charge either upon the credit or means of the country.

Mr. ARNOLD. I propose to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin has moved the previous question.

Mr. MORRILL. Is it in order to ask for a division of the resolution, letting it end at the close of the first paragraph?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is susceptible of division.

Mr. DAWES. If the previous question be not seconded, the resolution will be open to debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] has given notice of his intention to debate it.

The previous question was not seconded; there being, on a division—ayes 34, noes 67.

The SPEAKER. The resolution goes over, under the rule.

Mr. STEVENS. I would like to offer an amendment to the effect that "therefore each member of this House shall pay fifty dollars to the Sanitary Commission." [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. That amendment will be in order when the resolution comes before the House.

COMMUTATION MONEY.

Mr. ELDRIDGE submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, required to furnish to this House information as to the amount of moneys received up to this time for commutation by drafted men; also what disposition has been made of said moneys. If substitutes have been purchased for drafted men, how many; where and who have been procured as such substitutes; what sum has been paid for each, and whether for white or black, and how much for each.

The SPEAKER. This being a resolution calling on one of the Executive Departments for information requires unanimous consent to be considered.

Many MEMBERS objected.

The SPEAKER. It will lie over for one day.

COLORED TROOPS.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House: 1. The number of regiments of negro troops already enlisted, the time when each regiment was organized, and the number of privates in each regiment. 2. The amount paid for bounties, pay, and equipments of each regiment, and all other sums paid out in connection with their organization. 3. In what battles negro regiments have been engaged, and what regiments have been so engaged, and how many belonging to such regiments have been killed and how many wounded in such battles, discriminating between the different battles.

Objection was made; and the resolution was laid over for one day, under the rules.

THANKS TO MAJOR GENERAL W. T. SHERMAN.

Mr. COBB, on leave, introduced a joint resolution tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General W. T. Sherman; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. COBB demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ARREST OF CONSUL GENERAL.

Mr. HIGBY submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House all information in the State Department touching the arrest of our consul general to the British North American provinces; and all official communications touching Canadian commerce that have been made by the Colonial Secretary or other Canadian or British officer since the 1st of November last to our Government.

INDIAN AFFAIRS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. SHANNON presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of California relative to Indian affairs; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FREEDMEN.

Mr. WINDOM submitted the following resolution; on which he demanded the previous question:

Whereas James E. Yeatman, president of the western sanitary commission, who has recently visited the plantations and camps of the freedmen along the Mississippi, has, in reporting his observations of the same, made the following statements, namely: Dr. Littlefield, who is the physician of the Infirmary Farms, is located at the Savage place, where he has established a freedmen's hospital. He appears to take a very deep interest in this people, and is desirous to aid in improving their condition. He reports he has to furnish medicines and attendance to many of those on leased plantations, especially to those on the places leased by one man who had leased five plantations, whose negroes are greatly neglected and poorly provided for. The testimony of quite a number of persons fully corroborated this statement. One of the freedmen, Henson Jackson, working at Wilton's plantation, said that they got corn wherever they can find it on abandoned plantations; that they frequently have to go as far as Texas Bayou; that he has been without bread for days; that four pounds of meat per week is all that is allowed him; that he pays for his flour, and has worked since April without receiving any pay or clothing whatever; that he only receives tickets for actual day's work, to be paid when the crop is sold. Others from the same farm testified to the same thing, and laborers from other plantations gave similar testimony. None received molasses, rice, or beans, and hominy only when they choose to make it themselves. The poor negroes are everywhere greatly depressed at their condition. They all testify that if they were only paid their little wages as they earn them, so that they could purchase clothing, and were furnished with the provisions promised, they could stand it; but to work and get poorly paid, poorly fed, and not doctored when sick, is more than they can endure. Among the thousands whom I questioned none showed the least unwillingness to work. If they could only be paid fair wages they would be contented and happy. They do not realize that they are free men: Therefore,

Resolved, That the committee on emancipation be instructed to inquire what, if any, legislation is necessary for the relief and proper management of said freedmen; and that said committee be authorized to report by bill or otherwise.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

THE REBELLION.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia, submitted the following resolutions; on which he demanded the previous question:

Whereas the present deplorable civil war was inaugurated and is still carried on by a few desperate but daring men who, without any cause whatever, have not only filled the land with widows and orphans and caused almost untold millions of treasure to be spent, but have put in peril the very life of that Government which never deprived them of one solitary right, but which was so mild and beneficent it was only known by the blessings it conferred. And whereas Jefferson Davis, the chief of rebels, is reported to have said in a speech delivered in Jackson, Mississippi, in December, 1863: "My only wonder is that we consented to live so long a time in association with such miscreants (referring to the people of the North) and have loved a Government rotten to the core. Were it ever to be proposed again to enter into a union with such a people I could no more consent to do it than to trust myself in a den of thieves." And whereas this same high official in the great synagogue of freedom has repeatedly since, in his messages to the rebel congress utterly repudiated the idea of ever ceasing his wicked designs and returning to his allegiance to the Government, whose Constitution and laws he has trampled under foot; and has also declared that no compromise would be entertained by him, or those he represents, that did not secure to the States in rebellion their independence and final separation from the United States. And whereas Alexander H. Stephens, the vice president of the so-called southern confederacy, is reported to have said in a speech delivered in the month of July, 1863, at Charlotte, North Carolina, "As for reconstruction, such a thing was impossible; such an idea must not be tolerated for an instant. Reconstruction would not end the war, but would produce a more horrible war than that in which we are now engaged. The only terms on which we can obtain permanent peace is final and complete separation from the North. Rather than submit to anything short of that, let us all resolve to die like men worthy of freedom." And whereas John Letcher, in one of his messages to the rebel legislature of the State of Virginia, declared, "The alliance between us is dissolved, (meaning between the United States and the southern States,) never I trust to be renewed, at any time, under any conceivable state of circumstances." And whereas the Richmond Enquirer, one of the organs and advocates of this imaginary southern confederacy, in its issue of January 9, 1863, says, "Separation is inevitable. War has failed to prevent it. Peace cannot stop it. An armistice with propositions for reconstruction by constitutional amendments of conventions of States would very soon reveal the fact that separation was final; and, so far as one generation can speak for its successors, it is eternal." And whereas the Richmond Dispatch of January 10, 1863, another organ of the leaders of this wanton and unprovoked rebellion, said in response to a peace and reunion speech, delivered in New York by the editor of the Express, "That we assure him that the people of the confederate States would infinitely prefer being the vassals of France or England; nay, they would prefer to be serfs of Russia, to becoming in any manner whatever associated politically or otherwise with the Yankee States." And further, "that President Davis expressed the sentiment of the entire confederacy in his speech the other night, (in Richmond,) when he said 'the people would sooner unite with a nation of hyenas than with the detestable Yankee nation. Anything but that. English colonization, French vassalage, Russian serfdom—all, all are preferable to any association with the Yankees.'" And whereas the Richmond Sentinel, still another advocate of this new-fledged confederacy, in its comments on the proceedings of what is known as the Frank Pierce meeting, held at Concord, New Hampshire, on the 4th day of July, 1863, says, "Do the New Hampshire Democrats suppose for one moment that we could so much as think of a reunion with such a people? Rather tell one to be wedded to a corpse; rather join hands with the fiend from the pit. The blood of many thousands of martyrs is between us. A thousand feelings of horror repel the idea of a renewal of affection." And whereas the Richmond Whig, another mouthpiece of treason and of crime, in its issue of the 10th of January, 1863, speaking of those who are opposed to breaking up the Union bequeathed to them by their fathers, says, "They are by nature menials, and fitted only for menial duties. They are in open and flagrant insurrection against their natural lords and masters, the gentlemen of the South. In the exercise of their assumed privileges they deport themselves with all the extravagances, the insolence, the cruelty, the cowardice and love of rapine, which have ever characterized the revolt of slaves. The former leniency of their masters only serves to aggravate the ferocity of their nature. When they are again reduced to subjection, and taught to know their place, we must take care to put such trammels about them that they will never have an opportunity to play their tricks again." It is therefore,

1. Resolved, That any attempt on the part of the Government of the United States to conciliate the leaders of the present rebellion, or compromise the questions involved, would be but an attempt on the one hand to rob the gallows of its own, and on the other to humiliate and bring into utter contempt this Government in the estimation of the civilized world.

2. Resolved, That every State which has ever been is still a State in the Union, and that when this rebellion shall have been put down each of the so-called seceding States will have the same rights, privileges, and immunities under the Constitution as any one of the loyal States, except so far as the holding of African slaves in bondage is affected by the President's proclamation of the 1st of January, 1863, the action of Congress on the subject, or the events of the war.

3. Resolved, That this House utterly repudiate the doctrine advanced by some, that the so-called seceding States have ceased to be States of and in the Union, and have become Territories thereof, or stand in the relation of foreign Powers at war therewith.

During the reading of the proposition, Mr. MALLORY said: Mr. Speaker, is there no rule excluding such resolutions on account of their extreme length?

The SPEAKER. If there be any such rule the gentleman will point it out.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask the Chair for information.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware of any which will affect lengthy resolutions, except the hour rule. [Laughter.]

Mr. MALLORY. Watch carefully and see whether it does not occupy more than an hour.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. Is it in order to offer a resolution with a stump speech in the body of it?

Mr. GRINNELL. If gentlemen wish them left out of the resolution I ask that they have privilege to insert the extracts in their speeches.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is in order.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Is it in order to have the preamble reprinted?

The SPEAKER. Not now.

Mr. ANCONA. I move that it be laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is being reported for information. Gentlemen of the House have the right to know what it is they are to lay upon the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is it proper to insert in a resolution speeches of rebels who have seceded from the United States?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware of any rule that prevents it.

The resolution was then read through.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the proposition be divided.

Mr. COX. I move that it be laid upon the table. It is balderdash.

Mr. STEVENS. I suggest to the gentleman to withdraw that motion.

Mr. COX. I withdraw it.

Mr. ROGERS. I renew it.

The previous question was not seconded.

Mr. STEVENS. I propose to debate the resolution.

The resolution was then laid over, under the rules.

PROSECUTION OF THE WAR.

Mr. BROWN, of West Virginia, introduced the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Whereas our beloved country, our highly cherished institutions, Constitution, and Union of the States are all imperiled by a causeless and wicked rebellion:

Be it therefore resolved, That it is the duty of every loyal citizen to give to the Government, and to the agents in its employ, both in the cabinet and in the field, all the legitimate aid and comfort in his power in their efforts to put down such rebellion.

Resolved, That, as the rebels began the war, we will prosecute it until the last insurgent is disarmed and the authority of the United States acknowledged over every foot of ground rightfully belonging to the Republic.

Resolved, That in the prosecution of the war we will use all the military power of the Government, but will combine with it all the means of conciliation calculated to give to the Government and country an honorable and lasting peace.

Resolved, That it is the duty of the Government, so far as it is in its power, to give equal protection to all loyal citizens without reference to their locality, whether residing within the seceded or loyal States; and one of the strong incentives to a vigorous prosecution of the war is to rescue our loyal brethren of the rebellious States from the domination of a military despotism.

The previous question was not seconded.

Mr. STEVENS. I propose to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Then the resolution goes over, under the rule.

PAY OF CADETS.

Mr. WHALEY introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be requested to inquire into the expediency of increasing the pay of the cadets at the Military Academy at West Point; and to report by bill or otherwise.

EXPENSES AT PORT ANGELOS.

Mr. COLE, of Washington, introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish this House with a statement of the amount of money paid out of the Treasury of the United States to Victor Smith, or other parties, in liquidation of donation or preemption claims, building or rent of custom-house, or other expenses connected therewith, at Port Angeles, Washington Territory.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The call of States for resolutions having been concluded, resolutions calling upon the Secretaries for information, and which have been laid over heretofore under the rule, are next in order. The first resolution is one presented by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] on the 7th of January last, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to report the amount of debt incurred in the several States in their efforts in suppressing the rebellion.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to inform the House that I am anxious to call up to-day the Louisiana election case, which was partly finished on a former day, and then postponed for other business.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would say to the gentleman that the morning hour will expire in five minutes, when I desire that the House shall proceed to the consideration of the conscription law.

Mr. COX. I call for the regular order of business. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will not press his matter until this order of business is disposed of, as there are several resolutions on the Calendar calling for information, and it will consume but a few moments to dispose of them.

WAR DEBTS INCURRED BY STATES.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order to be the consideration of the following resolution, reported by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] on the 7th of January:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to ascertain and report the amount of debt incurred in the several States in their efforts to aid in suppressing the rebellion, and that in the judgment of this House all debts legitimately and necessarily contracted for this purpose should ultimately be assumed and liquidated by the General Government.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I demand the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the previous question will not be seconded. I think the resolution ought to be debated.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Is an amendment in order?

The SPEAKER. Not unless the demand for the previous question is withdrawn.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I desire to move to amend by striking out the last clause of the resolution.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I withdraw my demand for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I propose to debate the resolution.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. My colleague who introduced the resolution is not present, but I understand he desires that the resolution shall go over to another day.

No objection being made, the resolution was laid over until another day.

UNITED STATES TREASURY NOTES.

The next resolution in order was the following, introduced by Mr. SCOFIELD on January 7, and laid over from that day:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby requested to inform the House whether under existing legislation the seven-thirty United States Treasury notes, due August 19 and October 1, 1864, will be paid in coin of the United States; and also whether any additional legislation is necessary to make the interest and principal of the twenty-year bonds, into which the seven-thirty United States notes are convertible, payable in coin.

Mr. SCHENCK. The morning hour having expired, I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DAWES. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that the Louisiana election case was partially finished a week ago yesterday, and was then postponed for other business. I yielded to that arrangement then because I thought the importance of the bills which the gentleman himself had in charge was sufficient to justify it. The claimant from Louisiana has partly finished his speech, and I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that he yield long enough to allow the claimant to conclude his remarks, when I will call the previous question and take the vote. Although I desired to say some things in reply to what has already been said on that matter, I will refrain from any remarks myself. I will say, further, that it is highly inconvenient for the gentleman from Louisiana to remain here longer.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would yield almost anything as a matter of courtesy, but I think the public interest requires that we should go on with the consideration of the enrollment bill.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. I ask the permission of the gentleman from Ohio to introduce a resolution calling for information, and having no political reference.

Mr. SCHENCK. I must decline.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the chief justice of the Territory of Dakota, transmitting the report of the board of canvassers of that Territory relative to the contested election from that Territory; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a statement of the balances of appropriations upon the books of the Treasury to the credit of his Department on the 1st of July, 1863; also the amount of appropriations by Congress for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1863, and the balances remaining in the Treasury at the last named date; which was referred to the Committee on the Expenses in the Interior Department, and ordered to be printed.

EXPENSES OF THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a statement of the contingent expenses of his Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1863; which was referred to the Committee on the Expenditures of the Interior Department, and ordered to be printed.

CLERKS IN INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior transmitting a list of the clerks in his Department, the time they have been employed, and the amount paid to each during the fiscal year ending December 30, 1863; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

CONSCRIPTION BILL.

The question was then taken on Mr. SCHENCK's motion, and it was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWES in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of Senate bill No. 36, to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863.

The CHAIRMAN stated the question to be upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I have modified my amendment to the amendment, and I ask the Clerk to read it as modified.

The Clerk read, as follows:

No one shall be entitled to pay commutation money except ministers actually in charge of some religious congregation; men having a wife or child depending on them for support, and not having an income of $1,200 independent of their industry; members of the religious Society of Friends, or other religious denominations conscientiously opposed to bearing arms. Any drafted man on whom a parent, wife, child, sister, or brother may depend for support shall be allowed for each dependent ten dollars a month, not exceeding $500 in all, payable directly to such dependent or the guardian or person charged with the care of such dependent, and not subject to the control of the drafted man.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was disagreed to.

The question recurred upon Mr. GARFIELD's amendment to strike out section five of the Senate bill, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

And be it further enacted, That any person drafted into the military service of the United States may, before the time fixed for his appearance at the draft rendezvous, furnish an acceptable substitute, subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War. If such substitute is not liable to draft, the person furnishing him shall be exempt from draft during the time for which such substitute is not liable to draft, not exceeding the term for which he was drafted; and if such substitute is liable to draft, the name of the person furnishing him shall be liable to draft, in filling future quotas. And if any drafted person shall hereafter pay money for the procuration of a substitute, under the provision of the act to which this is an amendment, such payment of money shall operate only to relieve such person from draft in filling that quota, and his name shall be retained on the roll in filling future quotas; but in no instance shall the exemption of any person on account of his payment of commutation money for the procuration of a substitute extend beyond one year; but at the end of one year in every such case the name of any person so exempted shall be enrolled again, if not before returned to the enrollment list under the provisions of this section.

Mr. SMITHERS. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, and I offer it with the concurrence of the Military Committee.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Amend section six in line eleven by inserting after the word "quotas" as part of the same sentence, "but if any substitute would have become liable to draft if he were not in military service, then the person furnishing him shall, from the time such substitute would have so become liable, become and be liable to draft in filling any quota thereafter to be filled."

Mr. SMITHERS. I will state briefly that the object of this amendment is to qualify the first clause of the section, so as to provide that if a substitute is not liable to draft the person furnishing him shall be exempt from draft during the time for which the substitute may be exempt, not exceeding the term for which he was drafted. It may be that a substitute is not liable to draft at the time he becomes a substitute, but he may become so afterwards. The object of my amendment is to make his principal liable to serve from the time when the substitute would have become liable. For instance, a substitute may be obtained who is only nineteen years of age, and he would soon become liable to draft. The object of my amendment is to make the principal, in such a case, liable after his substitute shall have become liable to military service.

Mr. STEVENS. I call the attention of the gentleman from Delaware to the fact that the fifth section already contains that provision.

Mr. SMITHERS. I will say to the gentleman that I have no doubt myself that that would be the legal construction; but inasmuch as this bill is to be enforced by persons who are not lawyers, I think it well to make it so specific that there can be no mistake.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, that was

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 34.

the question I was about to propound to the gentleman from Delaware. I know that the clause of the section which we are now considering—from the sixth line to the eleventh—was drafted for that very purpose, and I think it accomplishes it very plainly.

Mr. SMITHERS. My amendment is offered for the sake of certainty.

The question being on the amendment to the amendment, tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SMITHERS, and STEELE of New York, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—yes 29, noes 71.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on Mr. GARFIELD's amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last two words. I do this for the purpose of saying, in a sentence or two, what I said on the last occasion when we had this question before us. The amendments made to the section of the substitute bill are so numerous that they have cut out most of the differences between it and the section in place of which we desire to put it. But still there are two differences, and in voting for the substitute section we will vote for or against these two differences. I will state them briefly.

The committee will notice, in the sixth section of the substitute, these words: "before the time fixed for his appearance at the draft rendezvous." These words do not appear in the section of the Senate bill which we are considering. The Senate bill provides that any person drafted into the military service of the United States may furnish an acceptable substitute; but it does not say when he must furnish him. It does not limit him in any way. The Committee on Military Affairs thought it best he should be limited, and that he should be required to furnish his substitute some time before the day that he was summoned to appear at the draft rendezvous to do duty. That line we put in to limit the time within which the person drafted is to be permitted to furnish a substitute. We thought it best to do so, in order that every man may know that if he furnishes a substitute at all he must do it at or before the time he is to appear at the draft rendezvous for duty.

Mr. PIKE. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that those words may be added to the Senate section.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is one other difference. We have changed the language in the Senate bill in another respect. The Senate bill says that the person furnishing a substitute shall be liable on future calls.

Throughout that bill the words "calls" is used. We thought that word too indefinite. In the present law the word "draft" is used. A man shall be liable or shall not be liable, as the case may be, on future "drafts." The interpretation given by the Judge Advocate General, the Provost Marshal General, and the Solicitor of the War Department—and those interpretations have been numerous, following each other almost at the rate of one a week—have held the word "draft" to mean something quite different from the meaning which Congress attached to it.

It was found to be an unfortunate choice of a word. Some thought that the word "draft" merely applied to the drawing of that day, some thought that it applied to all the drafts made under a certain call. The Senate used in this bill the word "call" instead of the word "draft," providing that persons shall or shall not be liable to any future "call." It seemed to the Committee on Military Affairs that the word "call" was equally an unfortunate expression to make use of. It may mean the President's call for a quota, or it may mean the call of the provost marshal. We have, therefore, substituted for the word "call" the word "quota," and in going over the bill we have found it necessary to adapt it to these general changes. I do not care particularly whether the Senate section be changed or the House section adopted; but it seems to me that we would save time by adopting the substitute. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SMITHERS. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "appearance" the words "for duty;" so that it shall read:

That any person drafted into the military service of the United States may, before the time fixed for his appearance for duty at the draft rendezvous, &c.

Mr. GARFIELD. I accept that.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to. The question recurred on Mr. GARFIELD's amendment, and, on a division, it was agreed to.

The sixth section was read, as follows:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the commutation money paid by persons drafted in any congressional district shall be applied by the War Department for the procurement of substitutes, which substitutes shall be credited to that district in filling its quota. And if the quota of such district shall not then be full a further draft shall be made in said district, according to the provisions of this act and the act to which this is an amendment, and like proceedings had until the quota of such district shall be filled. But this section shall not be construed to affect in any way the commutation money paid under section nineteen of this act: Provided, That colored troops enlisted and mustered into the service of the United States in any State shall not be credited upon the quota of any other State. And the bounty, pay, or expense of said enlistment shall not be paid out of said commutation fund.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to strike out the whole of that section. In regard to the first five lines relating to the crediting of the commutation money, I send a communication from the Provost Marshal General, which expresses the opinion of the committee on that subject.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Sir: I respectfully ask your attention to section six of Senate bill 38, to amend the enrollment act.

"The first five lines of the section will result in a double credit being given to certain districts. We credit a district with a man for every $300 paid by persons drafted in it, and if, as required by section eight of the act named above, we also credit the district with the man procured with the $300, a double credit will be given. It is true that this may be avoided by not crediting the district with men who pay commutation money, but this would not agree with the interpretation given by the Government to the present law and to the late practice, and would probably produce dissatisfaction. In addition to this, it will be exceedingly difficult, and will add greatly to the labor of this office, to keep the accounts with each district necessary to carry out the provisions of the section referred to."

Mr. SCHENCK. The objection of the Provost Marshal General to that portion of the section is, that by crediting the $300 commutation money paid and also the substitute obtained, the Government gives two credits while it gets only one man.

From the fifth to the ninth lines of the section, the clause relating to further drafts has been provided for elsewhere by the House committee. We propose to move to add it to the third section of the substitute which we shall propose.

As to the remaining portion of the section, it seems to me, as it did to the committee of the House, to be entirely unnecessary. The portion of the nineteenth section of the Senate bill to which reference is made in the latter part of this sixth section is that which relates to the exemption of persons on account of conscientious scruples, and provides that where drafted they "shall be assigned by the Secretary of War to duty in the hospitals, or to the care of freedmen, or shall pay the sum of $400 to such person as the Secretary of War shall designate to receive it, to be applied to the benefit of sick and wounded soldiers; and such drafted persons shall then be exempted from draft during the time for which they shall have been drafted."

They have, sir, without any such provision of law, the right to such exemption upon paying their commutation, whether it be $300 as the House committee propose, or $400 as the Senate bill provides. That portion of the section which gives to this class of persons, when drafted, the right to be employed in hospitals, &c., it seemed to the committee to be proper to retain, and they have therefore directed to have embodied in their substitute the first portion of the nineteenth section down to and including the word "men" in the ninth line. The remaining portion in relation to paying the commutation we have deemed entirely unnecessary, and we propose to strike it out.

Then again the clause of section six, "that colored troops enlisted and mustered into the service of the United States in any State shall not be credited upon the quota of any other State," is entirely unnecessary. Under the general provisions of the bill every one drafted and mustered into the United States-service from any State must be credited not only to that State but to the district, county, and even the township or ward of a city in which he shall be obtained. I suppose that but for some jealousy in regard to these colored troops this provision would never have been inserted. There is, however, no distinction whatever made in this respect. The committee have, therefore, considered this clause as entirely foreign to the bill, and therefore propose that it shall be stricken out. The latter portion of the proviso is precisely as the law now stands, and is therefore unnecessary. We propose, therefore, to strike out the whole of the sixth section, and to incorporate the single clause to which I have referred in the substitute, as we have done in the second section.

Mr. ELIOT. Is it in order to move to amend the original text of the section before the vote is taken on striking it out?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. ELIOT. I move to amend the sixth section by striking out the first five lines, and inserting in lieu of them the following:

That the commutation money paid by persons drafted in any congressional district shall be credited and applied by the War Department as now provided by law.

If the motion of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to strike out the whole section shall prevail this amendment, if adopted, will of course go with it. The object of the amendment is to perfect the original section. If it be stricken out no harm will be done, but if, on the contrary, the House should prefer to retain the section as it is, the amendment which I offer is necessary, in order to make the section conform to the existing law.

If the Clerk will be kind enough to read the amendment again I will call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to it.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. ELIOT. The objection to the present form of the section is this, that in the judgment of the Provost Marshal General there will be a double credit. That objection rests upon the construction which has heretofore been given to the law as it now stands; that is to say, it has been construed that when the commutation money has been paid the credit shall be at once given to the person paying it. Now the law provides that the district shall be credited, and the objection is made that if these two credits be given there will be a double credit for the same commutation. As the law now stands, as soon as the money is paid it goes into the Treasury by virtue of a resolution passed during this session of Congress. It goes directly into the Treasury of the United States, and it is impossible to give credit to any district. It is impossible to apply the money in any particular case. The amendment is that when commutation money is paid it shall be credited as the law now requires; that is to say, it will go into the Treasury, and as the law is now, credit will be given to the party paying the money.

Mr. SCHENCK. I propose to strike out that part of the sixth section. The gentleman proposes to strike out that section and to insert that the law shall stand as it now is. If we strike out that part of the sixth section, the law will stand as it now is; therefore the gentleman's amendment is not necessary.

Mr. ELIOT. One word in reply to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. If the section be stricken out, the consequence he suggests will follow; but if the House shall retain the section, then it is desirable that my amendment shall be adopted. That is all. I want to perfect the section in case it shall be retained.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will withdraw his amendment, I will move to strike out the first sentence of the section.

Mr. ELIOT. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I modify my amendment so as to strike out the following:

That the commutation money paid by persons drafted in any congressional district shall be applied by the War Department for the procurement of substitutes, which substitutes shall be credited to that district in filling its quota.

Mr. Chairman, I propose to leave the law where it is now. I think that the law is better left where it is by saying nothing about it than by any legislation cumulative of the law.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not believe in the construction given by the Provost Marshal General, who seems to me to be a bad lawyer. I do not believe that this bill would require more than one credit. I move to add to what is proposed to be stricken out the words, "and shall be credited to no other district." I move to perfect the words proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan. I have a word to say in reference to those first five lines. I am assured by the Provost Marshal General that it will require an additional number of clerks, at least fifty, to do the work of the Department should the first five lines be retained. I hope therefore that the whole section will be stricken out. I can see no benefit to result from it. The business of the Department will be increased to such an extent that fifty extra clerks will be required, and perhaps one hundred.

Mr. STEVENS's amendment to the amendment was adopted.

The question recurred on Mr. SCHENCK's amendment as amended.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 44, noes 56.

Mr. FARNSWORTH demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. FARNSWORTH and CLAY were appointed.

The amendment was rejected; the tellers having reported—ayes 50, noes 60.

Mr. ELIOT. I understand that the amendment which proposed to strike out the first five lines of section six is lost. I move now to amend by striking out those lines, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

That the commutation money paid by persons drafted in any congressional district shall be credited and applied by the War Department as now provided by law.

Mr. STEVENS. That is precisely as the law now stands. The law is just as the amendment would make it.

Mr. ELIOT. I do not understand it so at all. The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend by adding at the end of section six the following:

All male able-bodied persons of African descent, resident in the United States, whether citizens or not, between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years, shall be enrolled according to the provisions of the act to which this is a supplement, and form a part of the national forces of the United States.

The practice of the President and the officers of the different Departments now amounts to what this amendment provides. They do take all able-bodied colored men, whether under any particular law or not I am not able to say. I wish to legalize what has been done, and enable them to enroll all able-bodied persons in the United States, whether they be black or white, in order that they may form a part of the national forces and be subject to draft with the others.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. I would inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether his amendment places colored soldiers upon an equal footing in every respect with white soldiers?

Mr. STEVENS. It places him, as to liability to be drafted, upon the same footing with white persons.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY. I would like to inquire of my friend from Pennsylvania, whose amendment has just been adopted, whether he looks upon his amendment as having the scope and effect of enrolling in all the loyal States of the Union all the slaves, and of having them drafted without compensating their owners when they shall be taken from them?

Mr. STEVENS. I will answer the gentleman if it is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. No further debate upon that matter is in order.

Mr. DAWSON. I move to amend the sixth section by adding thereto the following proviso:

Provided, That in ascertaining the quota of troops hereafter to be raised by conscription a credit shall be given to the States and counties for their citizens who shall have enlisted in the military organizations of other States, the same to be ascertained by the Secretary of War.

In reference to this amendment, I merely wish to say that at the commencement of the rebellion a number of counties in the western States, and several counties in western Pennsylvania, sent a large number of volunteer troops into Western Virginia, and for whom no credit has been given to those various counties. The object of the amendment is to secure to those States and counties the credit to which they are entitled. The object of the proposition is manifestly correct.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Committee on Military Affairs had that matter under consideration, and they felt that there was force in the reasons urged by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. There is not a State from which a large number of persons have not gone and enlisted in the military organizations of neighboring States. Especially has this been the case in Pennsylvania and Ohio, and other States which lie upon the borders of Western Virginia and Kentucky.

But it has been found that it will be difficult, and indeed quite impossible, to adjust the account of the States if we attempt to carry out this principle. In the first place, we shall have to prove that the parties have not changed their residences. We should have questions of difference between contiguous States. Upon a careful consideration of that matter we found that more harm would be done to the Government by attempting to change this matter than by allowing it to remain as it is.

Mr. DAWSON. The question is so important that I trust the committee will not reject it upon any slight objection, such as is urged by the gentleman from Ohio. My amendment provides that the Secretary of War shall ascertain and determine the question. Now, can there be any such difficulty as that suggested by the gentleman from Ohio which shall outweigh the injustice which is now being perpetrated? The counties of Pennsylvania were patriotic and prompt, and sent large numbers of men from Greene and Fayette counties to fill up the ranks in Western Virginia to resist invasion. Those counties have received no credit for such troops, and the different drafts which have been made since that time have drawn out a large number of the able-bodied men of those counties; and if this bill as it now stands becomes a law, I doubt whether they will be able to furnish any considerable number of troops unless they are credited for those they have already furnished. I trust the committee, therefore, will adopt the amendment.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAWSON. Certainly.

Mr. SLOAN. I would ask the gentleman if these men have not received local bounties in the places where they enlisted; and would it be just to the localities where they have enlisted and received bounties to deprive them of the credit of these men?

Mr. DAWSON. I understand that in no instance have they received local bounties other than contributions from individuals, and in addition to that I may say that the people of those districts have generously contributed to support the families of these absent soldiers.

Mr. BROWN, of West Virginia. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Is there not an amendment to the amendment already pending?

The CHAIRMAN. There is, and no further amendment and no further debate is in order.

Mr. DAWSON called for tellers on the amendment to the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. DAWSON and BEAMAN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 58, noes 60.

So the amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. SCHENCK's motion to strike out the entire section as amended; and being put, it was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to strike out the seventh section, which is as follows:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the fourteenth section of the act hereby amended shall be amended so as to read as follows: That all drafted persons shall, on arriving at the rendezvous, be carefully inspected by the surgeon of the board, who shall truly report to the board the physical condition of each one; and all persons drafted and claiming exemption from military duty under the second section of said act shall present such claims to the board of enrollment, which board shall be governed in making their decision by the rules prescribed by the Provost Marshal General, under section six of said act.

I care very little whether the section is stricken out or not, but I will state that it is a mere reenactment, almost in precise terms, with a slight alteration which is rather for the worse, of the fourteenth section of the original conscription act. I call the attention of gentlemen to the fourteenth section of the act now in force, which provides that all drafted persons shall, on arriving at the rendezvous, be carefully inspected by the surgeon of the board, who shall truly report to the board the physical condition of each one; and that all persons drafted and claiming exemption from military duty on account of disability or any other cause shall present their claims to be exempted to the board, whose decision shall be final. The Senate bill provides, as a substitute for that section, a simple provision that this thing shall be done under such rules as may be prescribed by the Provost Marshal General. That is now the practice; that is the present understanding of the law. This adds nothing, therefore, to the existing law upon the subject. This section of the Senate bill is a mere reenactment, almost in terms, of the existing law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I offer the following to come in as a proviso at the end of the eighth section:

Provided, That when any person subject to military duty has been enrolled in any of the States of the Union, and after such enrollment removes or intends to remove from the district where thus enrolled into another district, and desires to have his enrollment changed he shall procure from the provost marshal of the district where enrolled a certificate of such enrollment, removal, or intention to remove, and file the same with the enrollment board of the district into which he has removed or intends to remove, and upon proving to the satisfaction of such board that he has actually removed into such district, with the bona fide intention of making the same his permanent residence, said board may place his name upon the enrollment of said district, and give him a certificate of such fact, and upon filing the same with the enrollment board of the district where first enrolled his name shall be stricken from the enrollment of such district, and thereafter he shall be liable to draft in the district to which he may have removed: And provided further, That such change shall not be made after a call and pending a draft.

Mr. Chairman, I offer that as a proviso to the section. I find on examining this enrollment bill that the enrollment is to be continuous; that it is to continue for a series of years, with such alterations as may be made in the enrollment by the respective enrollment boards.

But I find no provision whatever made in the bill for the removal from one district into another of a person liable to draft. As the bill now stands, the person enrolled must, if drafted, answer that draft in the district where he is enrolled, although at the time of the draft he may reside a thousand miles from the district. I think that some provision should be made for these removals, especially in the western States, where persons are continually removing from one district to another, from one county to another, from one State to another, and I offer this amendment for the purpose of meeting cases of that kind where the removals are bona fide.

Mr. GARFIELD. Some of the members of the Military Committee had designed to prepare such an amendment. I have no objection to this one, inasmuch as it seems to meet the case.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last line. I would like to know, Mr. Chairman, what would prevent any man residing in a district which had not furnished its quota or any part of it from removing to a district which had furnished or nearly furnished its quota, thus evading the greater danger of being drafted in the district where he resided. These districts are divided only by a line, and a person liable to be drafted in one district will have only to remove across the line into another district where there is to be no draft. While I think that something ought to be done to provide for bona fide removal it does seem to me that this amendment, unless it be better guarded than it now is, will only produce mischief.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the amendment is liable to that objection it is certainly a grave one. I listened carefully as the amendment was read, but it did not seem to me that it was liable to that objection.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I think the amendment is not liable to that objection. The amendment applies only to bona fide removals. It provides also that before a person's name shall be stricken from the enrollment lists he shall prove to the satisfaction of the enrollment board that his removal is in good faith.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. The most numerous class on which the draft will fall consists of unmarried men, who, having no local attachments or incumbencies, can pass from one district to another. Gentlemen who represent the State of Pennsylvania know very well that it is customary with young men there to go from one township to another ten days before an election for the purpose of voting under our constitution and laws. There is nothing in this amendment to prevent such young men going for a period of ten days, or twenty days, or for a month, or even for a year, and taking up their residence in a district whose quota is very nearly full, for the purpose of avoiding the greater risk of being drafted in the district where they lived. If this risk could induce, as it did, many young men to go to Canada some years ago, how much stronger will be the temptation for them to remove from one county to another, just across the line, or from one State to another, to avoid liability to the draft in the county or State where they lived?

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, this is not a new idea. It has been discussed in the Committee on Military Affairs. It has been considered there; and the attempt at any legislation on that subject was only abandoned because of a supposed inconvenience that would arise in the effort to execute such a provision of law. It was so considered by the executive officers engaged in applying the law. That seemed to make such an impression on the minds of the committee, that although we considered a proposition of that sort, it was determined not to propose it in the House substitute any more than it is incorporated in the Senate bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTFIELD] has suggested some of the difficulties that will arise. If an amendment of this kind is to prevail, I hope it will be drawn with very great care, to prevent such almost inevitable difficulties, inconveniences, and wrongs. I thought, at least, to be provided that if a removal take place, it shall be prior to the occurrence of the draft in the district to which the person removes, or after its occurrence in the district from which he removes; otherwise you will find persons who are enrolled at one place waiting until the draft has taken place at another, and then removing there.

But it seems to me that it is only necessary to state these difficulties to show that, although there seems to be an equity in this, yet in its practical application it will be surrounded with a good deal of difficulty, and especially if the amendment is not prepared with a little more precision than I think it has now been in guarding against these difficulties.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I am willing that my amendment shall be so modified as to provide that such removals shall not take place pending a draft. In that way I think the objection of the gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, will be obviated.

Mr. KELLOGG, of New York. I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that he make his modification read, "after a call and pending a draft."

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I will accept the suggestion of the gentleman, and make my modification conform to it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa. I hope this amendment and the one to which it is an amendment will not be adopted. I believe that the difficulties in the way of the execution of an amendment of that kind are far greater and will embarrass the operation of the law much more than they will be embarrassed in the execution of the law as it now stands.

Now, sir, in the State of Illinois there will be no draft. I mention this as an illustration. Our quota is already full under the last call for five hundred thousand men. Now, under this amendment, with men living in the adjacent States who do not like to go into the service, how easy will it be, especially such young men, and men without incumbencies, as the gentleman has alluded to, for these men to rush over into the State of Illinois and avoid the draft.

In Iowa, too, the gentleman's own State, there will probably be no draft. Men liable to draft in other States will remove into that State for the purpose of evading the draft; and gentlemen know how easy it is for such men to make it appear that their change of residence has been a real and bona fide change. Men who have, as has already been stated, moved over into Canada for the purpose of evading the draft, will all the more readily evade it when they can do it by removing from one district to another, or from one State to another. They will go over for ten days or two weeks, long enough to accomplish their purpose, and then return.

Another objection to this amendment is that it will result in enabling these men removing from one State to another to escape any enrollment or draft at all, even if the draft has not yet taken place in the State to which they remove, or in the State from which they remove.

A man, for instance, removes from New York to Pennsylvania, and when the Pennsylvania enrolling officer comes round, he says to him, "I am not a resident of Pennsylvania. I have only recently come over here, and am going shortly to return," and his name is therefore omitted from the enrollment. But in the State of New York from which he has removed, the enrolling officers, knowing that he has removed to Pennsylvania, have dropped his name from the enrollment. He will be left out altogether under this amendment unless you make it the duty of the provost marshal of the district from which he comes to find out where he has gone, and notify the provost marshal of the district to which he has removed that he has been omitted, so that his name may be included in the enrollment in the State to which he has removed.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I submit the following amendment:

Page 5, section eight, at the end of line eleven, insert: And said boards of enrollment shall have authority to inquire into any case of alleged fraud in enlistments, with power to send for persons and papers, and authority to suspend the operation of any recruiting officer or agent to await the action or order of superior authority upon the report of said board. And the provost marshals, boards of enrollment, or any member thereof, acting by authority of this act, shall have power to administer oaths and affirmations.

The object I have in view in this amendment, by the first clause of it, is to correct an abuse that is prevalent, at any rate in my locality. Recruiting officers, in order to increase the number of their recruits, have been in the habit of inducing youths under eighteen years of age to enlist, having complied formally with the provisions of the law, without the consent of their parents or guardians. The writ of habeas corpus being abolished, or suspended, many youths have been drawn in, and those interested have no redress. They can have no hearing in court.

It is proposed that the boards of enrollment shall have jurisdiction of such cases of fraud, so that they may inquire, and if they find any cases of that kind, suspend the operation of the enlisting officer until the case can be heard. I have known cases of this character. The enlisting officer would induce intoxication first, and then enlistment while in that condition and without the parties having any free volition—an abuse which should be guarded against, although we may need soldiers to march forward in a good cause which we are all in favor of. It seems to me that abuses of this character should be prevented by provisions in this act.

The further clause clothes the members of the board of enrollment with power to administer oaths, which I believe the substitute provides for, and I therefore want it to be provided in the Senate bill. I want to have ingrafted upon the law a provision to enable them to administer oaths.

Both, sir, are eminently proper, and will relieve in many instances where hardship and injustice are done to minors under eighteen years of age.

Mr. GANSON. If the amendment of my colleague permits, where fraud has been practiced upon the board of enrollment, a review of the action in such cases, I suggest that he also embrace a provision for a review of the action where fraud is alleged to have been committed against a drafted person.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I will state that the amendment is broad enough to cover all cases of alleged fraud. Wherever fraud is charged they may inquire and suspend action.

Mr. GANSON. I only suggest the propriety of giving the drafted person, where fraud has been practiced upon him, the right to review the action of the board upon proof.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. My object is to insert a provision in reference to frauds practiced by enlisting officers so that they may be corrected.

Mr. DEMING. Mr. Chairman, the committee had the whole matter under consideration. The great objection to the amendment is that it will establish in every congressional district petty United States courts, with the machinery of marshals, &c. In regard to the particular amendment which the gentleman suggests, it will be better to provide in a separate bill for it rather than incorporate it into this general conscription bill. The proposition that these boards shall have power to inquire into all frauds in regard to enlistments you will see at once will open the widest scope for inquiry. It will involve the necessity of sending for persons and papers, and the summoning of witnesses. It will also involve the necessity of providing a table of fees to be paid to the enrolling officers and the witnesses who are to attend these petty United States courts. The Committee on Military Affairs objected to establishing these courts of inquiry in every congressional district, and they unanimously voted against adopting any scheme like that proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SMITHERS. Is the amendment germane to the section?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order comes too late.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment. These courts exist to-day in every congressional district in the Union, yet there seems to be no redress against enrolling officers dragging children into the Army of the United States. It is impossible to get relief. I know of a lad fifteen years old who was dragged from his home and enlisted in the service, and no redress could be obtained by his father, who remained in Washington for weeks. Some provision should be made for these cases.

Mr. GANSON. Let me suggest to the gentleman that it can be done by restoring the writ of habeas corpus.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. It can be done in a better way. Let us adopt a provision of law applying to these cases of infants—a provision that need not be abused—that these boards of enrollment in these different districts shall be competent to take charge of this matter.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. In reply to the remarks made by one gentleman I will say there will be no extra fees paid to the members of these enrollment boards. They are paid salaries, and no extra expenses will accrue from the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. The question of fees will have no weight whatever with me. I am controlled by the question of right and by the outrages which are now being perpetrated. The greed of these enlisting officers to fill up their companies is doing the most serious wrong. My object was to call the attention of the committee to this matter, and if the amendment of the gentleman from New York will cure the evil I shall be satisfied.

Mr. KERNAN. I hope this amendment will not be adopted. The grievance referred to is a very serious one, and there is no opportunity upon the part of a parent whose child has been stolen away, perhaps while in a state of intoxication, to get any redress before the law, to see whether the child shall be held or not. But, however great the grievance is, I am opposed to giving the powers of a court to these boards. Let every person look to his own district and see how these boards are constituted. They are usually purely partisan, as we all know, proceeding and ruling in many districts only in reference to how men shall vote. I suggest that the remedy proposed by my colleague is a practical one. In the States which are loyal; where there is no insurrection; where there are able judges in every neighborhood who can give redress without a particle of expense to the Government, that should be done. We should provide by law that the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended in communities where there is really no need that it should be suspended. Where there are courts which can investigate these cases summarily and without expense they should be authorized to do so. I hope therefore we will not confer this power of the courts upon the enrollment boards.

Mr. SLOAN. Is the gentleman in favor of that while Judge McCunn is in office?

Mr. KERNAN. I am in favor of it everywhere, where the courts are open, where the laws are enforced, and where there is no insurrection. I am in favor of the regular judges exercising their powers; and although there may be sometimes unworthy judges, like those in Wisconsin, who would not allow their records to be reviewed, I would still stand by the law, and seek my rights under it.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I will modify my amendment so as to provide that the suspension shall only be in reference to the act of the recruiting officer in the particular case in hand, and not to suspend its operation generally.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I do it for the purpose of asking a question. Will the gentleman explain to me what the effect of his amendment will be upon the existing law, which makes the oath of the recruit conclusive as to his age?

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I understand that the oath is only conclusive after the recruit is mustered in. This amendment contemplates a remedy after the party has enlisted, but before he is actually mustered into the service of the United States. Under it the father may go before the enrollment board and show that fraud has been practiced upon his infant son in the matter of his enlistment.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The statute provides that after its passage no person shall be enlisted under the age of eighteen years.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I am well aware of that fact by reason of half a dozen cases of the most outrageous frauds committed in my district in enlisting persons under that age. I have had occasion to go to the Secretary of War to obtain relief in cases of infants not over fifteen years of age who were dragged into the service by fraud, the parties signing a paper and swearing to it when they had no idea that they were swearing that they were of a certain age. The grossest outrages have been practiced upon boys in order to satisfy the greed of enlisting officers. The object of my amendment is to provide a remedy for this thing. I propose that the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended in these particular cases, and that is the extent to which I am willing to go.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment. I move the amendment for the purpose of making a single remark. I am very glad to see this evidence of returning reason on the other side of the House. It always seemed to me that the time would come when they would see the necessity for some tribunal to determine the question of the right of the Government to take into its service every person upon whom they could lay their hands.

I have no doubt that within the knowledge of every man cases as outrageous and as flagrant as those mentioned by the gentleman from New York have occurred. I know an instance in the town from which I come, where an insane man was actually drafted, and when in his frenzy he resisted the officer his friends were unable to convince him that the man was insane. That man, insane as he was, was dragged away from the protection of his friends because there was no power and no tribunal by which his sanity could be determined.

I am glad that a proposition of this kind has come from the other side of the House, but I am opposed to it. The old writ of habeas corpus—the writ of liberty—is the one upon which we can all rely for just such protection as the gentleman seeks by the amendment which he proposes.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that gentlemen upon the other side of the House will move to do away with that order of the President suspending the writ of habeas corpus in such cases, and give a chance to try the question whether the man upon whom the Government may lay its hand has a right to protection or not. There can be no danger; it is all nonsense to talk about there being danger; but if there were danger, the same interruption of the Government would occur in case this amendment were adopted as would occur in trying the question under a writ of habeas corpus.

I am opposed, therefore, to the amendment proposed by the gentleman. I trust that this matter will bring gentlemen upon the other side of the House back to their senses, and that they will, with us, rely in future upon the old writ of liberty upon which we have heretofore relied.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I cannot see for the life of me what the good old writ of habeas corpus would do to remedy the evil complained of. Congress has passed an act that the oath of the enlisted man shall be conclusive.

Mr. KERNAN. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. KERNAN. The gentleman is doubtless aware that some judges have held that while Congress could make the oath conclusive as to the party taking it they could not make it conclusive as to his parents or guardian.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. When Congress passes a law that the oath of a person shall be conclusive of a given fact, without any limitation of terms, I do not see why it is not conclusive upon the parents as well as upon the person enlisted. I know that some evils do occur from young men being inveigled into the service by some recruiting officers anxious to fill up their companies, but the trouble universally is that the young man swears that he is eighteen years of age.

Now, I should have no objection to a law requiring every mustering officer to be sure that every man mustered in is over eighteen years of age, or has the written or oral consent of his parents or guardian to enlist; but I do not think it proper to allow these provost marshals to examine into the affairs of every recruiting officer in their districts.

Gentlemen talk a great deal about the suspension of the habeas corpus. I never saw a loyal man who was afraid of the suspension of the habeas corpus during this war; never. It is only the guilty who flee when no man pursueth.

Now, my own impression is that although the habeas corpus in some instances of military arrests would have been useful, in more cases it would have been better for the Government not only to have suspended the habeas corpus but to have suspended the corpus without the habeas. The trouble has been, not that the habeas corpus has been suspended in a few instances, but that it has not been suspended in more cases; where one arrest has been made by the Government there should have been fifty.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. MORRIS, of New York.

Mr. BEAMAN. I move to add after the word "enlistments" the words, "and in all cases of the enlistment of minors under eighteen years of age."

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I accept that as a modification of my amendment.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move to insert after the words "forty-five," in line ten of section eight, the following:

That the affidavit of two respectable witnesses regularly sworn before a person authorized to administer an oath will be conclusive upon the board as to the age of the drafted or enrolled man.

In the district in Pennsylvania in which I reside a grave difficulty occurred under the draft in 1862. A man in Fulton county, over forty-five years of age, was drafted. He went before the board of enrollment with evidence of the fact. That evidence satisfied the commissioner for the time being, and the man was discharged. He was subsequently arrested as a deserter.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I rise to a question of order. I am not quite sure what the proposition is.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to amend the text.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. Then the amendment proposed is not germane to the amendment before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not proposed as an amendment to the amendment, but as an amendment to the original text, which takes precedence of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COFFROTH. The person I speak of was arrested as a deserter. He sued out his writ of habeas corpus, and went before the judge of that county. He was discharged from custody on the proof furnished that he was over forty-five years of age. Subsequently the lieutenant in charge of a party for arresting deserters in that county, in disregard of the action of the court, went to this man's house to arrest him again for desertion. In the attempt to do so the officer was shot. The man surrendered himself for trial, and on a fair hearing before a jury of his country he was acquitted.

The amendment which I offer is required to meet such cases.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was taken on Mr. COFFROTH's amendment, and it was rejected.

The question recurred on Mr. MORRIS's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I move to amend the eighth section of the Senate bill by adding after the word "therefrom" the words "and all persons whose names have been struck from the rolls on grounds of exemption not allowed or recognized by this bill," so as to make it the duty of boards of enrollment to enroll such persons.

This amendment, Mr. Chairman, proposes to reenroll those whose names have been struck from the roll on grounds of exemption that are not now recognized in the bill. Every member understands that by the bill of last year, which we are amending, exemptions were allowed on grounds that were considered by the Senate and by the Military Committee of this House as insufficient. This amendment proposes that these men shall be reenrolled.

I understand from the report of the Provost Marshal General that this list of exemptions covers nearly seventy thousand men. If these men were justly struck from the rolls no one would propose to put them in again; but the Senate has decided that these were struck from the rolls on grounds that were insufficient, and that is the opinion also of the Committee on Military Affairs in the House.

Now if we can, justly and rightly, and without injury to any one, add some seventy thousand persons to the military force of the country we ought to do so. What injustice would be worked to them by doing so? What have they paid for being exempted? Nothing at all, except the mere trouble and expense of going to the headquarters of the provost marshal of the district and making out their papers. What have they gained? They have been already exempted from one draft. They have gained just so much as you now propose to allow a man to gain by paying his commutation money—$400 according to the Senate bill, and $300 according to the amendment. Have they not gained sufficient? Can it work any wrong to them? Not to do this would work wrong to all the other classes. The hardest cases on which these men were exempted were no harder than those of every man who is called away from home and family, and who leaves nothing behind him for their support.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman who has offered this amendment has anticipated the purpose of the committee. I suggest to him, however, to modify the language of it so as to give it more precision. The language which we propose is that all persons who have been exempted under the provisions of the second section of the act to which this is an amendment, but who are not exempted by the provisions of this act, shall be reenrolled.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I consent to that modification.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will then simply add a remark to what has been said upon the necessity of some amendment of this kind, by calling the attention of the committee to this fact. Among the persons who have been exempted under the provisions of the existing law have been seventy-four thousand under what are known as the humanitarian provisions of the law; that is, persons who have been exempted because they had aged parents depending upon them for support, or who had a younger brother or sister, or who had motherless children.

Gentlemen who have not the opportunity of examining the record the administrative department of the Government have made in carrying out this law, will be astonished to find that men of wealth, bankers and merchants, men of large incomes, because they have happened to have living with them an aged mother have taken advantage of this provision of the law to accomplish their exemption from the draft. Persons who from some former marriage have children who by the death of that former wife are left motherless; men who, though men of wealth, merchants and bankers, living with those children in luxury, have in many such instances escaped both the draft and the payment of commutation by bringing themselves in this way within the letter of the law. Now, this amendment is to enable the officers of the Government to revise the frauds—or rather I should say wrongs, for having complied with the letter of the law they are not frauds—and to place such men again upon the enrollment list and require them to make new cases out under this law somewhat more stringent in its character.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now propose to amend further by inserting after the word "persons," in the second line, the words "liable to draft under the provisions of this bill, or of the act to which this is an amendment."

The provisions of this eighth section, as they now stand, would require all persons to be enrolled who have not been enrolled. This is too sweeping, and may be capable of misconstruction and misrepresentation. It evidently points to those only who are liable to enrollment; and to make the language of the section express the object with greater precision, I have offered this amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. If my colleague will allow me, I will say that I have prepared an amendment in the shape of a substitute for the whole section, embracing the amendments which have already been adopted and embracing also the amendment just offered by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I desire to have it read, and if it meets the views of the gentleman, I will ask him to accept it in place of that which he has offered. Before having it read, I desire to call the attention of the members of this committee to the differences that occur between it and the printed section. They will discover them by comparing the printed section as it is read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Strike out section eight and insert as follows:

And be it further enacted, That boards of enrollment shall enroll all persons liable to draft under the provisions of this act and the act to which this is an amendment, whose names may have been omitted by the proper enrolling officers; all persons who shall arrive at the age of twenty years before the draft; all aliens who shall declare their intention to become citizens; all persons discharged from the military or naval service of the United States, who have not been in such service two years during the present war; and all persons who have been exempted under the provisions of the second section of the act to which this is an amendment, but who are not exempted by the provisions of this act; and said boards of enrollment shall release and discharge from draft all persons who, between the time of the enrollment and the draft, shall have arrived at the age of forty-five years, and shall strike the names of such persons from the enrollment.

Mr. GARFIELD. This amendment, as it will be seen, directs the enrolling officers to place on the list all those who may have been improperly omitted, all those who shall arrive at the age of twenty before the draft, all aliens who shall declare their intention to become citizens of the United States, all persons who have been discharged from the military or naval service of the United States without having been in such service as long as two years during the present war, as well as the persons who have been exempted under the second section of the act to which this is an amendment, and who are not exempted by the provisions of this act. It also provides for striking from the rolls such persons as shall have arrived at the age of forty-five years between the time of the enrollment and the draft.

Mr. SCHENCK. As that includes the three or four amendments adopted by the committee as well as that now offered by me, I will withdraw my amendment, and allow my colleague to offer his in place of it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will now, then, offer the amendment just read. I believe it embraces every amendment which has been offered, acted upon, and carried in committee, and two others. One is that aliens who have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States are to be added to the enrollment list; and the other is the one just offered by my colleague, the chairman of the Military Committee. The section provides for placing on the rolls all such as have not been previously enrolled. Now, we do not want all persons whatever between the ages of twenty and forty-five to be placed upon the list, and this, therefore, restricts them to such as are liable to draft by this act or the act of which this is an amendment.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. Let me ask the gentleman whether it is provided by the committee in the bill that aliens who have voted although they have not made application for citizenship shall be subject to this draft?

Mr. GARFIELD. That is provided for in another part of the bill. If the committee will notice the language of the Senate bill in regard to persons who have not served two years becoming liable to the draft they will discover that it is unfortunately worded. They say exactly the opposite of what they mean. It is to correct that error that I have moved the amendment now pending.

Mr. GARFIELD's amendment was adopted.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I move to add the following as an additional section to the bill:

That it shall be the duty of the board of enrollment to cause a list of the names of persons enrolled to be published in the newspapers of the district in which the draft is proposed to be made for at least three weeks next preceding the day fixed for the draft, and when a sufficient number is drawn from the wheel or box it shall be the duty of the board to select three respectable citizens living within the district so drafted, to take from the box or wheel the names left therein, make out a certified list of the same, and cause it to be published for the length of time and in the manner fixed for the publication of enrollment list; nor shall any one drafted be compelled to report at rendezvous until the provisions of this section are complied with.

Mr. Chairman, by way of giving a reason for that amendment, I suggest to the committee, so far as the operations of the conscription law have fallen under my observation, that it will obviate one of the most prominent difficulties and objections. A conscription law in a country like ours, put it in the most acceptable shape you can, is apt to fail in giving satisfaction to those upon whom it is intended to operate. My amendment is intended to obviate one of the main difficulties in the operation of the law. I care not what guards you may throw round the draft, without a provision to secure the publication of the names left in the box after the draft has been made, people will never be satisfied that it has been faithfully executed. I make the amendment for the benefit of the boards of enrollment as well as for the people themselves. It is not right or just that these men upon whom these duties are imposed shall be subjected to animadversion and suspicion when they have discharged their duties faithfully; and there is nothing which will prevent that but this provision of my amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I oppose the amendment.

The amendment was rejected; there being, on a division—ayes 28, noes 65.

The Clerk read the ninth section, as follows:

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That whenever a mariner or able seaman shall be drafted under the act approved March 3, 1863, entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," he shall have the right within eight days of the notification of such draft, to enlist in the naval service as a seaman, and a certificate that he has enlisted being made out in conformity with regulations which may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, and duly presented to the provost marshal of the district in which such mariner or able seaman shall have been drafted, shall exempt him from such draft: Provided, That the period for which he shall have enlisted into the naval service shall not be less than the period for which he shall have been drafted into the military service: And provided further, That the said certificate shall declare that satisfactory proof has been made before the naval officer issuing the same that the said person so enlisting is a mariner by vocation, or an able seaman.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I offer the following to come in at the close of that section:

And any person now in the military service of the United States who shall furnish satisfactory proof that he is a mariner by vocation or an able seaman, may enlist into the Navy under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy: Provided, That such enlistments shall not be for less than the term of his military service, nor for less than one year: Provided further, That the number of transfers shall not exceed ten thousand.

Mr. SCHENCK. Insert the words "and the Secretary of War."

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I accept that as a modification of my amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the adoption of that amendment, or something equivalent to it, is absolutely necessary to relieve the Navy of the great embarrassment under which it is at present laboring for want of seamen. The original act, to which the bill now before the committee is an amendment, provided exclusively for the increase of the Army, and contained no provision for supplying the other great arm of the national defense, the Navy. In that act there was no provision exempting from draft persons employed in the Navy of the United States, and seamen when drafted were not allowed to enlist in the Navy if they wished to do so. My amendment is made for this purpose. Seamen drafted will be permitted to enlist in the Navy if they wish to do so, and those who enlist will be credited to the quota of the city or town to which they belong. It is absolutely necessary that there should be an additional provision for transfer of those from the Army who are seamen by vocation. That is necessary, for a large proportion of the seamen of the country have already entered into the military service of the United States, or are employed in the mercantile marine. The operation of the local bounties and the desire to increase the quotas of cities and towns have conspired under this act to drive them nearly all into the Army. It is doubtful whether the number of seamen to supply the present wants of the Navy can be obtained by volunteering and recruiting. Hence it is necessary that some provision of law should be enacted for their transfer from the Army.

It is known that great embarrassment is now experienced to provide the number of seamen to keep our naval vessels afloat. Several have been detained from going to sea by want of men. I am informed that for the several vessels fitting out at the several navy-yards fifteen hundred men will be required, and that there is a large number of men now engaged in the naval service compelled to serve after the expiration of their time, because there are no seamen to replace them if they are discharged. Taking these two classes—those held in the service beyond their time, and those required to supply the vessels fitting out at the navy-yards—there will be needed not less than twenty-five hundred men immediately. I trust there will be no objection to the passage of the amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am very well aware of the necessity of doing something to promote enlistments in the Navy, and we might very well, as far as practicable, take cognizance of that great public want in the bill we are now considering, and which has more immediate reference to the Army. With that view this section, among the rest, was introduced; but I think the gentleman from Massachusetts will himself see, upon reflection, that by adding to the section as it now stands the provisions of his amendment he will be going too far, be treading upon dangerous ground, and be holding out even a premium for the commission of fraud upon the public. It is proposed that any able-bodied seaman or mariner, by vocation, being in the Army, may, upon application, be transferred into the Navy under rules and regulations to be prescribed. What will be the effect of that? A man wanting to go into the Navy would first enlist in the Army and get the local bounty, amounting in many cases to three, four, and five hundred dollars, together with whatever portion of the Government bounty may be paid, and immediately afterwards make his application to be transferred to the Navy, where he would stand his chances for a portion of the prize money. Every one understands that no bounties are offered to sailors because the chances of receiving prize money are considered equivalent to a bounty, the prize money not unfrequently amounting to far more than any bounty that is paid to a soldier.

Now, this amendment offers an inducement to go first into the Army for the military bounty, and then to be transferred to the Navy to take the chances of receiving prize money there. Does it not strike the gentleman that there is this objection to opening the door to fraud in the manner he proposes?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. In reply to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs,

I would say that I supposed I had sufficiently guarded the amendment I have offered by inserting a limitation upon the number that might be so transferred, namely, ten thousand, and by the provision that this transfer can only be made under such rules and regulations as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of the Navy in conjunction with the Secretary of War. I suppose they can, in their regulations, make any provision that may be required against any improper transfer.

I think, however, there is some weight in the suggestion made by the gentleman from Ohio in respect to bounties. It is the influence of these public bounties which has induced seamen to enter into the Army in such great numbers instead of enlisting in the Navy; and if those bounties are continued to be offered for entering in the Army, while none are offered for entering the Navy, seamen will continue, to some considerable extent, to enter the Army as soldiers.

With a view to meet the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, I am entirely willing to add to my amendment the provision that seamen who have received a bounty on enlisting in the Army shall have the amount of such bounty deducted from any prize money to which they may be entitled. That, I think, will meet the objection of the gentleman. I modify my amendment by adding:

Provided, That any bounty money which a seaman may have received on entering the Army shall, on his being transferred to the Navy, be deducted from any prize money to which such seaman may become entitled.

Mr. SCHENCK. The proviso still does not appear to remove the difficulty which exists. The amount of bounty paid by the Government on enlistment is proportionately small, as it is paid in installments. The principal bounty obtained by those who enlist or reenlist, as the case may be, comes from local corporations, cities, counties, and States.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Inasmuch as the bill now provides that seamen enlisting in the Navy shall be credited to the cities and towns from which they come, there will be no inducement upon the part of the local authorities to withhold bounties from seamen who are willing to enlist as soldiers.

The gentleman's point, as I understand it, is that the local authorities pay large bounties to men enlisting in the Army. They have been doing it because persons so enlisting are credited to the quota of the city or town to which they belong. Now, under the new provision of this bill which authorizes men enlisting in the Navy to be credited to the quotas in like manner as men enlisted in the Army, there will be no inducement for the authorities to withhold bounties from the sailors.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not see that that removes the objection. It is true that under this bill the localities get credit for the men who enlist in the Navy, but they pay no bounty to those seamen. In order to get into the military service, however, these persons being seamen, have drawn these local bounties. If they had entered the Navy directly they could not have drawn these local bounties, but the day after being mustered into the military service, they suddenly discover that their propensities are entirely for the ocean, and having pocketed the bounty and been transferred to the Navy, they come there within the class of those who may get the benefits of prize money which is the equivalent to the sailor for the bounty paid to soldiers.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. That will not be the future operation of the law.

Mr. RICE's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY. I offer the following proviso to come in at the end of the section:

And provided, That no regularly licensed pilot on the rivers and harbors of the United States shall be liable to draft under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment with a view of reserving for the use of the Government of the United States a class of men whom I think as meritorious as any we have in the West or any where else.

Mr. GARFIELD. Has the gentleman looked at section twelve?

Mr. MALLORY. I have, but section twelve does not cover the case. I wish to exempt from the draft pilots engaged on the western waters, a class of men who acquire knowledge and skill by long practice and the education of years. They are men whose services it is difficult to obtain, and nearly all the skillful pilots in the western country have been impressed into the service of the United States for the gunboats on those waters. I think, for this reason, that they ought certainly to be exempt from draft. You do not want to take men like them and put them into the Army—men who can be so much more usefully employed elsewhere.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would ask the gentleman what are the ordinary wages of pilots?

Mr. MALLORY. I do not know, but they are very high—probably $500 a month.

Mr. SCHENCK. So I have understood, and therefore I think they are fully able to pay their commutation money and stick to their business if they choose to do so. It is a profitable profession.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would state that the ordinary pay of a river pilot is from two hundred and fifty to three hundred dollars per month.

Mr. MALLORY. Surely the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs does not mean to provide by this conscription bill that those whose skill and attainments enable them to make large sums of money shall be subjected necessarily to extraordinary requisitions from the Government?

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir; but no extraordinary exceptions should be made in their favor. My position is just the reverse.

Mr. MALLORY. Well, sir, I am for proceeding in relation to pilots as in relation to everybody else. I am for no discrimination for or against men because of the wages they receive. I am in favor, however, of providing for the necessities of the Government; for if pilots are drafted and do not choose to pay the commutation money, they will be put in the Army, and the Government will be unable to have their services in the Navy. The gentleman, I suppose, does not intend by his bill to compel them to pay commutation money; and if he does not, the pilot, when drafted, may go into the Army when his services are indispensable needed on the gunboats.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I propose to amend the amendment by adding the words "that such exemptions are to be regulated by such rules as may be established by the Secretary of the Navy."

Mr. MALLORY. I think that does away with the whole matter.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am opposed to the original amendment and also to the modification, and to anything that makes a provision of that sort. I am well aware of the necessity of having pilots on the rivers. I am well aware, also, that these pilots are paid very high wages, that theirs is a very profitable employment. Now, it may be that in particular cases it would be an inconvenience if one of those pilots, being drafted, should go as a drafted man, thus depriving those who employ them of his services. I feel very certain that that inconvenience would not arise in many cases; that pilots being engaged in a business by which they are making $500 a month, more or less, would, like other men having profitable employments, pay their commutation rather than go as drafted men. There might be instances in which the patriotism of the pilot would be so great as to induce him to go to the Army. In such a case I would be disposed to commend him for it as I would commend any other man who would do the same thing. But I am afraid that those exceptional cases would not be so very frequent as gentlemen seem to imagine. Instead of making an extraordinary exception against pilots, or against any particular class, I am for making no extraordinary exception for or against anybody. But as far as practicable, where persons are not actually in the employ of the Government, I am in favor of letting drafted men either go and perform military duties, or send substitutes who will do so for them, or pay some equivalent to the Government so that the Government may employ some one else.

Mr. MALLORY. I think the gentleman expects the President of the United States from the operation of this bill. Why not let him take his chance, and if drafted pay the commutation money?

Mr. GARFIELD. The President of the United States is not excepted, as he is already in the military service of the United States as Commander-in-Chief.

Mr. MALLORY. The Vice President of the United States is not in the military service, and he is excepted.

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir; we do except the Vice President. My answer to that is, that we do make exceptions in some very few cases, where from the inconvenience of taking the only officer or some of the few officers of this kind, filling the most important positions in the country, not to do so might derange the whole working system of the Government, including this among the rest. We have more than one pilot, but we have not more than one President and Vice President of the United States. We also except judges of courts; but gentlemen will recollect that we do not except members of Congress. We do not except Senators. We confine exceptions to a very few, exceedingly few, important personages of the Government, the taking away of whom would operate to derange the very working machinery of the Government.

I was going to remark with regard to pilots that the argument in favor of their exemption from liability to draft might be presented in respect to any other class. A tavern-keeper sometimes cannot well be spared, neither can a blacksmith nor shoemaker nor—

Mr. HOLMAN. As the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] imagines that my amendment may embarrass his proposition I withdraw it, and will offer another. I move to amend by inserting, after the words "United States," the words, "while actually employed in the naval service."

Mr. MALLORY. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that the twelfth section makes the provision which he contemplates. His amendment, therefore, is useless.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I withdraw it.

The question was taken on Mr. MALLORY's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move to amend by adding to the amendment to section nine as follows:

Provided, That no regularly licensed pilot upon the rivers and harbors of the United States shall be compelled to render service in any of the vessels of the United States, except when drafted under the provisions of this bill, unless in cases of volunteer enlistments upon such vessels.

Mr. Chairman, I suppose there can be no objection to such an amendment as that. The only wonder is that such an amendment should be deemed necessary, but I propose to explain the necessity for it.

The number of pilots on the western rivers is quite limited. It takes a good many years to familiarize a pilot with the waters of the West. There has, during the present war, been a very large draft upon that class of our fellow-citizens in the West. They have been pressed into the service of the Navy time and again by officers in command of our fleets, or in command of the departments there. It is evidently unjust that they should be liable to conscription into the military service and liable at the same time, at the pleasure of any man in command of a naval vessel, to be taken from their employment and put into the naval service. All I ask is that the pilots of the West shall bear the same liability and no more than other citizens of the country touching the rendition of military and naval service, and if this House will not exempt them from the performance of military duty on account of the great necessity there is for the services of pilots in the fleets of the West and the distinguished services they have rendered time and again under this system of impressment, but will still continue their liability to military duty, I say it is as little as we can do to exempt them from being impressed into the naval service so long as they remain liable to conscription into the military service.

Mr. ALLISON. I oppose the amendment.

The amendment was disagreed to—ayes 50, noes 64.

Section ten was read, as follows:

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That whenever any such mariner or able seaman shall have been exempted from such draft in the military service by such enlistment into the naval service, under such due certificate thereof, then the ward, town, or township, or county, when the same is not divided into wards, towns, or townships, from which such person has been drafted shall be credited with his services to all intents and purposes as if he had been duly mustered into the military service under such draft.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend section ten, in line five, by inserting after the word "township" the word "precinct," and after the word

"townships," in line six, the words "or precincts."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRESWELL. I suggest to the gentleman that he also insert the words "election district."

Mr. GARFIELD. I suppose that is hardly necessary. I propose also to amend, in the seventh and eighth lines, by striking out the words "with his services" and inserting in their place the words "upon his quota." Upon that amendment I desire to make a single remark in respect to the suggestion of the gentleman from Maryland.

We find that in the Senate bill there is no provision made for such subdivisions as occur in a good many of the States of the Union. The Senate bill says simply towns, townships, and wards. Now, in several of the States there are no subdivisions known as towns at all, and therefore it has been thought proper to insert the word "precinct," which I believe will cover the subdivisions in every State. I believe in Maryland they are called "election districts;" but I was informed by some gentleman with whom I conversed that the phrase "precinct" would cover the case of Maryland; and if so, I do not wish to incur the bill with any unnecessary words. I am informed that the words towns, townships, precincts, and wards would cover the case of Kentucky and Missouri, and probably every State.

My amendment now, I repeat, is to strike out the words "with his services," and to insert "upon his quota."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. CRESWELL. I move to amend in the fifth line by inserting after the word "precinct," as inserted on motion of the gentleman from Ohio, the words "election district." I do not think the word "precinct" is equivalent to the term "election district" in the sense in which it is used in Maryland. The term "precinct" is used to designate the subdivisions of a ward, for instance, in the city of Baltimore. In all country localities in Maryland the term is "election districts." In order, therefore, that the counties may have the benefit of those subdivisions as well as the cities I move to insert "election districts."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I move to amend in the fourth line by inserting after the word "thereof" the words "or have been transferred from the military to the naval service as hereinbefore provided." I offer that amendment simply to make the section conform to the action of the committee heretofore.

Mr. UPSON. I ask whether that amendment is at all necessary; whether the object is not already provided for.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. It meets the case of a person already in the military service who may be transferred to the naval service. However, the amendment may not be needed, and I will withdraw it.

The Clerk read the eleventh section, as follows:

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That all enlistments into the naval service of the United States, or into the marine corps of the United States, that may be hereafter made of persons liable to service under the act of Congress entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, shall be credited to the ward, town, or township, or county, when the same is not divided into wards, towns, or townships, in which such enlisted men were or may be enrolled and liable to duty under the act aforesaid, under such regulations as the Provost Marshal General of the United States may prescribe.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend that section by inserting after the word "township" where it occurs the words "precincts or election districts," and to strike out the word "or" which precedes it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the twelfth section, as follows:

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That no pilot, engineer, master-at-arms, or other person having an appointment or acting appointment, and being actually in the naval service, shall be subject to military draft while holding such appointment and forming one of a ship's complement.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to strike out the words, "or other person," so as to make the section conform to the substitute of the committee.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to strike out the words, "and forming one of a ship's complement." The reason for that is simply this: it now excepts men from military draft who hold such appointments. Now a man may not form one of a ship's complement; he may be at a navy-yard as an engineer or as a master-at-arms in the employment of the Government. If the words I have indicated be stricken out the section will then provide for all that was intended.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I move to add the following:

And any pilot, engineer, or master-at-arms now in the military service, or who may hereafter enter the same, by draft or volunteering, may upon application be transferred from the Army to the Navy, upon sufficient evidence that his services are wanted in that capacity, under such order as the Secretary of War may direct.

Mr. Chairman, a large number of our western pilots and engineers are now in the Army. Applications were constantly made to Admiral Foote and Admiral Porter for transfer by these men from the Army to the Navy. The Secretary of War said that there was no law for it. He has ordered, however, such transfers as were absolutely necessary for the good of the service. My amendment will give authority of law for such a practice hereafter.

Mr. SLOAN. I move to amend the amendment by adding the words, "provided that the Secretary of War shall so order."

Mr. GARFIELD. That is already practiced by the Secretary of War every day in the year, and the amendment is not necessary. It has been done in every army I have any knowledge of. Whenever a man is found who desires to go into the naval service, and is an able seaman, he is mustered out and enlisted in the Navy. The amendment is not necessary, for the thing is done already.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MALLORY. I hope that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will move that the committee do now rise. It is late, and we are all hungry and tired.

Mr. SCHENCK. Wait until we get through with the pending section.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment, in order to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Ohio. I agree with him that it is and has been the practice to make these transfers, but the Secretary of War has told me that there was no provision of law for it. All my amendment does is to clothe the Secretary of War with power to make transfers of these men from the Army to the Navy. It will provide for doing under the law what is now done without law. I think it proper, and I do not know why the gentleman should object to it.

Mr. GARFIELD. My only objection to it is that it will allow the men to get into the Navy by the way of the Army, and to have these bounties, &c.

Mr. MOORHEAD withdrew his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MOORHEAD's amendment was then disagreed to.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I move to strike out the word "and" and in lieu thereof to insert the word "or;" so that the section will read, "or being actually in the naval service," &c.

Mr. Chairman, military officers in the West have decided that pilots are in the military service or in the service of the United States, and they have, within my knowledge, pressed them into the naval or gunboat service. If that construction is given I do not see why it should not be provided for in this bill. I hope that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that the amendment should be amended so as to leave the exemption to those actually employed.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. Pilots are required to obtain a license from United States officers; and because of that fact the military authorities have decided that they are liable to be pressed into the service. If the word "and" be stricken out and "or" substituted, it will accomplish the object I have in view. If any of the pilots on our western rivers who may be pressed into the gunboat service should be so unfortunate as to be killed while piloting these boats neither their wives nor children would receive the benefit of the laws of the United States providing for bounties or pensions. This, it seems to me, is a sufficient reason for exempting them.

Mr. DAWSON moved that the committee rise. The committee refused to rise.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ELIOT. I move to amend the twelfth section by inserting after the words "master-at-arms," in the second line, the words "acting master, acting ensign, or acting master's mate."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I was about to move that the committee rise; but if there is any gentleman who has any other amendment to offer to this section I will wait until it is presented.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I move to strike out the whole section. The reason of my motion is that there is nothing in the provisions of the section which guards against abuses. A man may be in the service a day or a week, and yet by the provisions of this section we exempt him from the draft. There are other provisions which, in case a man is permanently in the service, will protect him against the liability of being drafted.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am opposed to the amendment.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the section by striking out the words "having an appointment or acting appointment," in the second and third lines.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a point of order. It is that we have refused to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment applies to only a part of the section, and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. It will be remembered that the Committee of the Whole have added quite a number of persons besides those enumerated in the section as it was reported by the Military Committee. Not only are pilots, engineers, and masters-at-arms to be exempt, but we have enumerated other persons who are to be exempt by having an appointment or acting appointment, without their being in actual service. The effect of my amendment is to provide that only those persons enumerated and who are in the actual service of the country when the draft takes place shall be exempt.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am opposed to the amendment.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I move to amend the section in lines two and three, by striking out the words "having an appointment or acting appointment," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "or other persons."

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a point of order. It is that the words he proposes to insert have already been voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not so understand, and therefore he overrules the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have said to gentlemen upon the other side, and to those who are impatient to have the committee rise, that as soon as we get through the twelfth section, and read the thirteenth section, I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. HOLMAN. The trouble is over the twelfth section, and we want the opportunity to amend it. I call for tellers upon my motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ASHLEY and Mr. DAWSON were appointed.

The committee divided; but before the result was announced,

Mr. HOLMAN said: As there seems to be a desire to pass this section, I will withdraw my motion.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HIGBY. I move to amend the section by inserting after the word "engineer," in the second line, the word "or."

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is not in order, it having already been rejected.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAWSON reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the Senate (No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and had made progress therein, but had come to no conclusion thereon.

INTERNAL REVENUE BILL.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the internal revenue bill, that it may be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object. I am not opposed to taking it from the Speaker's table, but I am opposed to referring it to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to suspend the rules for that purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly (at forty-five minutes past four o'clock p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 9, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Treasurer of the United States, transmitting copies of his accounts with the United States for the third and fourth quarters of the year 1862 and the first and second quarters of the year 1863; which was ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HOWE presented the petition of Gustavus A. Balzer, asking to be remunerated for losses sustained by him by the capture and destruction of his stores by the rebels, while acting as sutler of the seventy-fifth regiment Pennsylvania volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TEN EYCK presented a memorial of members of the bar of the District of Columbia, praying that the salary of the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia may be increased; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HALE presented the petition of Moses Kelly, administrator of Major W. W. Russell, deceased, late paymaster in the United States marine corps, praying for certain allowances in the settlement of the accounts of Major Russell; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSON presented papers relating to the claim of George C. M. Roberts; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

Mr. CLARK presented a petition of citizens of Auburn, New Hampshire, praying for the abolition of slavery throughout the United States, and for the adoption of such measures as will forever prevent its existence in any portion of the country; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I offer a petition which is now lying on the desk before me. It is too bulky for me to take up. I need not add that it is too bulky for any of the pages of this body to carry.

This petition marks a stage of public opinion in the history of slavery and also in the suppression of the rebellion. As it is short I will read it:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The undersigned, women of the United States above the age of eighteen years, earnestly pray that your honorable body will pass at the earliest practicable day an act emancipating all persons of African descent held to involuntary service or labor in the United States.

There is also a duplicate of this petition signed by "men above the age of eighteen years."

It will be perceived that the petition is in rolls. Each roll represents a State. For instance, here is New York with a list of seventeen thousand seven hundred and six names; Illinois with fifteen thousand three hundred and eighty; and Massachusetts with eleven thousand six hundred and forty-one. But I will read the abstract with which I have been furnished:

These several petitions are consolidated into one petition, being another illustration of the motto on our coin—E pluribus unum.

This petition is signed by one hundred thousand men and women, who unite in this unparalleled number to support its prayer. They are from all parts of the country and from every condition of life. They are from the sea-board, fanned by the free airs of the ocean, and from the Mississippi and the prairies of the West, fanned by the free airs which fertilize that extensive region. They are from the families of the educated and uneducated, rich and poor, of every profession, business, and calling in life, representing every sentiment, thought, hope, passion, activity, intelligence which inspires, strengthens, and adorns our social system. Here they are, a mighty army, one hundred thousand strong, without arms or banners, the advance guard of a yet larger army.

But though memorable for their numbers, these petitioners are more memorable still for the prayer in which they unite. They ask nothing less than universal emancipation; and this they ask directly at the hands of Congress. No reason is assigned. The prayer speaks for itself. It is simple, positive. So far as it proceeds from the women of the country, it is naturally a petition, and not an argument. But I need not remind the Senate that there is no reason so strong as the reason of the heart. Do not all great thoughts come from the heart?

It is not for me, on presenting this petition, to assign reasons which the army of petitioners has forborne to assign. But I may not improperly add that, naturally and obviously, they all feel in their hearts, what reason and knowledge confirm, not only that slavery is the guilty origin of the rebellion, but that its influence everywhere, even outside the rebel States, has been hostile to the Union, always impairing loyalty, and sometimes openly menacing the national Government. It requires no difficult logic to conclude that such a monster, wherever it shows its head, is a national enemy, to be pursued and destroyed as such, or at least to be abated as a nuisance to the national cause. The petitioners know well, that Congress is the depository of those supreme powers by which rebellion, alike in its root and in its distant offshoots, may be surely crushed, and by which unity and peace may be permanently secured. They know well that the action of Congress may be with the cooperation of the slavemasters, or even without their cooperation under the overruling law of military necessity or the commanding precept of the Constitution "to guaranty to every State a republican form of government." Above all they know well, that to save the country from peril, especially to save the national life, there is no power, in the ample arsenal of self-defense, which Congress may not grasp; for to Congress, under the Constitution, belongs the prerogative of the Roman dictator to see that the Republic receives no detriment. Therefore to Congress these petitioners now appeal. I ask the reference of the petition to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I beg leave to delay that motion for a moment by a single remark. We have heard the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts on this petition. He has evidently presented it with a view that it shall have some effect upon the legislation of Congress. The petitioners, doubtless, have sent it here with that view, and the length of the petition and the large number of signers to it will be paraded in the papers of the country as evidence not only that the judgment of the country requires that the prayer of the petitioners should be granted, but as evidence also that there is a disposition in Congress to listen to a popular appeal. Sir, I was a member of this Senate only three years ago, before the hand of brother was raised against brother, before civil war trod this land as with the crushing step of a giant, before one single drop of blood had been shed in this unnatural war, at a time when the hearts of the people of this country were palpitating, when they were filled with alarm lest the consequences which now unhappily afflict the country should come to pass. I recollect, sir, that one of the connecting links of the great men of the past with the present proposed in this body measures to allay agitation, to preserve the Union, to keep off civil war and to keep it off forever. I recollect that a Senator from New York, now holding a distinguished place in the Cabinet, on one occasion presented a petition from that State signed by twenty-eight thousand citizens, and at another time a petition signed by over thirty thousand citizens, and I recollect that a distinguished Senator from Kentucky now dead, (Mr. Crittenden,) presented a petition signed by seventeen thousand five hundred citizens of Massachusetts, and when other Senators loaded your tables with petitions calling upon the majority of Congress to listen to their prayers, and to do something to prevent civil war; and what was the effect of their petitions then upon this body?

They were scouted, spurned; a deaf ear was turned to the supplications of an agonized country; and rather than listen to those petitions coming up from every section of the country, and more numerous signed than this bugbear of a petition to-day, they were disregarded. No compromise then; no heeding by Congress of the importunities of the people then. But now, lo and behold, this petition is presented, and it is sent as the voice of the country: "Heed ye the voice of the country!" Sir, it becomes gentlemen who disregarded that voice in the past, who would not listen to the petitions of the American people when the clouds of war were gathering in darkness over this land—it becomes them now, after having treated those petitions as of little worth, to parade this as the evidence of the sense of the country, and say, "Heed it and be governed by it."

But, sir, I will not detain the Senate. My object was simply to show that the Senate had disregarded heretofore petitions more numerous signed under other circumstances, and to say to the country that this petition, whatever may be the object of presenting it, is not to be considered as having any very great effect, or to meet with any great respect I apprehend from this body, because they have heretofore rejected petitions more numerous signed, and under circumstances which were calculated to command the attention of the Senate more favorably.

Mr. HALE. As this statement has been made, I want another statement which is strictly true to go with it to the country. Those petitions were presented here by an honorable and honored member of the Senate, now deceased, in favor of a series of resolutions submitted by him. I have nothing to say about them or of them; but I will mention this fact, and I should like it to go out to the country with the eloquent tribute of the Senator from Delaware to the petitions of that day. The report, accompanied by what was mainly called the Crittenden compromise, failed in this body because the party that the Senator from Delaware acted with, associated with, counseled with, and voted with, voted against it. The Journals of the Senate will show that those resolutions were defeated by the leading members of the party associated with the honorable Senator from Delaware.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not wish to continue this debate, because I know it is not regularly in order; but in answer to the Senator from New Hampshire I wish to make one statement. The Senator is well aware that the propositions of Mr. Crittenden were proposed amendments to the Constitution of the United States, which would require, in order to pass them, a two-thirds vote of both branches of Congress. On every proposition to take up and consider those resolutions, as I believe, every member of what was then the dominant party voted uniformly in favor of taking them up and considering them. On one occasion, when the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CLARK] proposed a substitute for them, there were five or six Senators from the Gulf States who sat in their seats and refused to vote; I think wrongly refused to vote; but if they had voted on that substitute it could not have accomplished any practical purpose, because if every member of the then dominant party had voted for the passage of the Crittenden compromise resolutions, it being necessary to have a two-thirds vote in order to pass them, they being propositions to amend the Constitution of the United States, they could not have been constitutionally passed in this body. Sir, no member of the then dominant party ever voted against the Crittenden propositions or against taking them up for consideration, or said that he would not accept them as a settlement of sectional differences.

Another word, sir. The Senator says they were defeated on that account. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire, because I believe he is a frank Senator, whether at any time there was a single Senator of his party who voted for the Crittenden propositions in any stage of them; and whether every other member of the Senate, whether he was a Democrat, or what you might call a Bell and Everett man, or American, did not consistently and uniformly, whenever they were presented, and in all stages vote in favor of the consideration and the passage of those resolutions? Does it then become the Senator from New Hampshire to say that they were defeated because of the fact that those four or five gentlemen from the Gulf States, Mr. Sidel, Mr. Benjamin, Mr. Iverson, I think, and some two others, perhaps, when a proposition was made to substitute another resolution for them, refused to vote on that proposition? I ask the Senator as a frank man, does it become him to say that the resolutions were defeated because those five gentlemen refused to vote on that occasion, when no member of his party on any occasion voted in their favor but uniformly voted against them? Will he answer? Could the entire vote of the then dominant party have constitutionally passed the Crittenden propositions without the aid of some votes from the Republican party? Was there one Republican Senator under these circumstances that gave them his support? Will the Senator answer?

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I rise to thank the Senator from Delaware for saying on the floor of the Senate to-day that those of us who were here then when the Crittenden proposition was made steadily voted against it. I do not raise the question who defeated that proposition; but I do say that it was a proposition the most wicked that was ever proposed in the deliberative body of any Christian or civilized country on the globe. It was a proposition to recognize, establish, and protect slavery south of 36° 30' in all territory now in our possession or that might hereafter be acquired. It was a proposition forbidding this Christian nation to abolish slavery in the national capital without the consent of the slavemongers of Virginia. It was a proposition to allow slave-traders to take their slaves through and all over the free States and hold them as slaves. It was a proposition to take away from colored men the right of citizenship and the right of voting that they had enjoyed from the Declaration of Independence to this hour in several of the free States. It was the most wicked and devilish proposition ever proposed on earth, unworthy the support of a Christian people or any man professing to revere God or love man. I think the time has gone by forever in this country when anybody is to be reproached for having voted against a proposition that every man ought to glory in trampling under his feet. I denounced it then, I denounce it now. I thank God that I was permitted to utter my voice and give my vote against incorporating into the Constitution of my country amendments so barbarous, wicked, and inhuman. God in His abounding grace might have pardoned such a crime, but humanity would have reproached us forever.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall enter into no discussion with the Senator from Massachusetts as to the wisdom or folly, the virtue or contrary characteristic of the Crittenden resolutions. It is not possible for the Senator from Massachusetts or for any other Senator on this floor, or for any man in this country, whatever may be his opinions of those measures, to make the American people believe that John J. Crittenden, of world-wide fame, whose patriotism was evidenced by every act of his life and in his dying moments, and whose character is dear to every American heart, would ever present a proposition to the American Senate unbecoming a Christian gentleman or a lover of constitutional liberty.

Sir, seventeen thousand five hundred citizens of Massachusetts, if I mistake not, of the city of Boston, sent a petition here and placed it in the hands of John J. Crittenden, asking this Senate and this Congress to pass measures of compromise and conciliation. A large majority of the people of this country at that time, in my judgment—I may be mistaken—were honestly in favor of the adoption of those measures; and there is no man living now, I presume, but what believes that had they been adopted, civil war would have been averted and we should have been united and at peace.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petition is referred. Petitions are still in order.

Mr. POWELL. I should like to say a single word on that petition before it is referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the opinion of the Chair it has gone from the Senate. Before the Senator rose, the Chair announced that it was referred.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope that by common consent the Senator may have leave to express his views. There has been rather a free discussion, and I should be sorry to have any Senator cut off from saying what he wishes to say on the subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be regarded as before the Senate if there is no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President, I do not propose to say a word in regard to the petition presented by the Senator from Massachusetts, but I will make a remark in reply to his colleague [Mr. WILSON] in defense of my late colleague, Mr. Crittenden. That Senator has chosen to denounce the Crittenden resolutions as unworthy of any Christian man or any Christian people. He reflects very harshly, too, upon the memory of Mr. Crittenden. Allow me to tell that Senator that those propositions that were presented by my late colleague, and which were rejected by the Republican party, in my judgment were eminently wise, eminently just, and eminently proper. They were worthy of the high reputation of the illustrious Senator who presented them; and I know that no assault that can come from the Senator from Massachusetts will impair the just fame and the high reputation of that illustrious man. He was an elevated statesman and a Christian gentleman; and I know that when those propositions were under consideration the most illustrious and distinguished gentlemen from Massachusetts were here desiring their adoption. I remember having interviews with such men as Edward Everett and other distinguished men from that State. The people throughout the length and breadth of this land, in my judgment, desired the adoption of those propositions. If they had been adopted we should now be a united and happy people. We should not have witnessed the horrid scenes that we have seen in consequence of this unfortunate civil war.

One word, sir, as to those who rejected those propositions. The Senator from Massachusetts seems to congratulate his party that they did reject them because they were monstrous, unchristian propositions. The Senator from New Hampshire desires to throw the onus on certain gentlemen from the Gulf States. Allow me to say, Mr. President, that those resolutions were rejected by the Republican party. They, and they alone, are responsible. The Senator from Massachusetts glories in it, but the Senator from New Hampshire desires to throw the blame upon others. I was a member of the committee of thirteen to whom all those measures were referred, and I speak what the journals of that committee will attest when I say that no Republican upon that committee voted for the Crittenden propositions, while every Senator on that committee who was not a Republican voted for them. Upon one or two propositions Mr. Toombs and Mr. Davis finally changed their votes, but they declared that they were ready to take the Crittenden propositions and to stand by them. Mr. Toombs declared it in open Senate.

I well remember the day when Mr. Johnson, the Senator from Tennessee, made a speech in reply to the Senator from Delaware, who has just taken his seat, in which he declared that they were defeated in consequence of four gentlemen from the Gulf States sitting in their seats and not voting. Such was not the fact. The question came up between those resolutions and the substitute of the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CLARK,] and it was upon that question that those gentlemen, I think wrongfully, refrained from voting. It required only a bare majority to substitute the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire for the Crittenden propositions, but it required a two-thirds vote to pass the Crittenden propositions. We afterwards did get a vote upon them, and the Republican party caused their defeat. There never was a Republican who voted for the Crittenden propositions either in the committee of thirteen or in the Senate. The members of that party, and they alone, are responsible for their defeat, as the journals in the committee and the Journals of Congress will show. There was no Senator on that side of the Chamber that I remember who ever cast a vote for the Crittenden propositions.

I know the statement has gone out which has been made to-day by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE.] It has been stated in the newspapers over and over again, but it is not true. If the Republicans had given their support we could have carried the Crittenden propositions, and they would have averted civil war and saved the Union. I have no question on that fact. I believe the people of Massachusetts by an untold majority were in favor of the Crittenden propositions. There was every evidence before the Senate of that, but the Senators from Massachusetts stood out as we on this side thought against the will of their constituents.

The Senator from Massachusetts did not at that time denounce those propositions in such terms as he has now used. He opposed them, I admit, but he indulged in no such denunciations as he has uttered to-day. When that pure, just, and elevated man, Mr. Crittenden, occupied a seat on this floor, the Senator did not assert that he could be the author of propositions so damnable as the Senator has characterized them. He is out of the Senate; he is in his grave, respected and honored by all virtuous and intelligent men. Now it is that the Senator comes forward and makes his assault. When the reputation of the man and the circumstances are considered, it does look to me like an atrocious assault upon one of the most pure and elevated statesmen that this or any other country has ever produced. The virtues and eminent public services of John J. Crittenden will live embalmed in the hearts of his countrymen; and no assault from the Senator from Massachusetts will dim the luster of his fame.

Mr. WILSON. I desire simply to say, sir, to the honorable Senator from Kentucky and to the honorable Senator from Delaware that it was not my purpose to cast any reflection upon the memory of John J. Crittenden. I entertained for him, while living, sincere regard; and, sir, I am not here to reproach his memory. He was an old statesman, an old man, and under the pressure of the times he stepped forth with the proposition he miscalled a compromise. I characterized the proposition just as I characterize now the acts of men—of personal character that I regard disloyal—acts against liberty, humanity, and Christian civilization. Honest, sincere men may be deluded, may be deceived. I choose to judge men with charity, but to speak of the acts of men and characterize those acts as they are. The Senator says that I did not speak of these resolutions when they were before the Senate as I have to-day. If the Senator will read a speech of mine made upon the resolutions he will find that I characterized them quite as severely as I have to-day. I spoke fully upon the subject, and expressed the fear that if we dared to vote for those resolutions we should sink, when life's duties were performed, into dishonorable graves, with the curse of God and the scorn of mankind upon us. I believed it then; I believe it now. I believe that an overwhelming and uncounted majority of the people of the country to-day would reject with unutterable scorn those unchristian propositions. I have no doubt of it. I am glad that Senators rise in their places to-day and acquit all of us of the Administration of ever having stained our souls by voting for a proposition so abhorrent to the sentiments of mankind.

MR. SUMNER. Mr. President, before the debate closes I desire merely to add one word. The proposition known as the Crittenden resolutions and all the petitions in its support were in favor of the crime of human slavery. On that there is no doubt. Every petitioner in favor of that proposition petitioned for the crime of human slavery; the proposition itself was to establish the crime of human slavery. The petition which I have had the honor to present to-day, signed by one hundred thousand men and women of the United States, is for human freedom.

MR. POWELL. One single word. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] has stated that these petitioners who were in favor of the Crittenden compromise were petitioners in favor of human slavery. I do not think there was any such thing mentioned in the petitions. There was nothing in the Crittenden compromise measures that put the shackles upon a single slave. They left that matter precisely where it is under the Constitution. They did not attempt to do it; but there was a proposition in them that gave a large portion of territory and dedicated it to what the Senator would call freedom. All that the resolutions did in that direction was to give further guarantees and securities to the protection of property in the southern States. That was all; nothing more; nothing less; and I am astonished to hear the Senator speak of those petitioners coming up here in favor of human slavery. Such is not the fact, and if you look at the petitions they will attest what I say to be the truth.

MR. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of stating that I do not see that any profitable result can be the consequence of such a debate as this. Whatever may have been the causes which have brought us into our present condition, we are in it; and it is a part, as I think, becoming the statesmen of the day to devise any and every measure to get us out of it happily and prosperously. To deal in harsh epithets against those who have preceded us, to deal in such epithets to those who are here and who have participated in the deliberations of the past can do no possible good. Whether they have in fact done or whether they have been willing to do what in the sight of God would be a crime, is a matter that perhaps can best be settled between themselves and Heaven; and when the day shall come when the hearts of all shall be disclosed it may be found possibly that those who sustained what are called the Crittenden propositions and those who were anxious either by sustaining them or by sustaining others to avoid this war, will stand at least an even chance of mercy at the throne above with those who think proper now—I was about to say to vilify them. Slavery in my opinion is what I have heretofore said of it; but there are men wiser than I am, more patriotic than I can pretend to be, men who have served their country in spheres infinitely higher than any to which I aspire, who have not thought it a sin. The Father of his country held in bondage his slaves up to the last moment of his existence on earth; and can either of the Senators from Massachusetts suppose for a moment that at that great day when we are to give an account of our deeds in this life his chance of mercy will be less than theirs?

MR. SUMNER. I have simply to say in reply to the last remark of the Senator from Maryland, that George Washington appeared before his Maker as the emancipator of his slaves.

MR. CONNESS. Mr. President, I do not propose to enter into this debate, which is somewhat irregular at best; but as it appears to have taken almost entirely the direction of a review of the past I wish to add a single word. If the Republican party prevented the adoption by their acts and votes of what was known as the Crittenden proposition, I wish to say to that party that I honor them for it; and leaving the question of slavery or what was involved as the protection of slavery contained in the Crittenden proposition, it is enough for me to base the honor that I now bestow upon the Republican party for that transaction upon the fact that the Crittenden proposition was brought forward at a period of time when a traitor Cabinet and a traitor President were organizing war against this Government in the South. Sir, when a single individual may retire orderly and properly with a clenched fist in his face, and make an apology to the party that aggresses him, then a great nation may retire or accept a proposition while war is being organized against it even by the participation of the constituted authorities. I honor the Republican party or whoever put their feet upon that proposition at that time. I had not the honor then to have a seat in this body or in Congress; but I was honored by a constituency in my own State with a seat in the Legislature of that State. The Crittenden proposition came up there for indorsement, and I am very proud to have to say to-day that, consistent with my own ideas of personal and national honor, I gave not only a vote but all the action that I could give to prevent that indorsement by the State of California.

I am one of those who believe that the propositions contained in the Crittenden compromise could not have been received without eternal dishonor to the American people, and I glory in the spirit of the men who refused to adopt it; and I equally glory in the period that has finally evolved and developed the movement represented by the action of the Senator from Massachusetts this morning. I thank God, sir, that the day is coming, and that we are here as its ministers in part, when our country shall be relieved of that curse, that crime, and that treason which are contained in African slavery. I will hail the day when we can rise up and say that it exists no more in our land.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The petition will be referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

MODE OF ELECTING A PRESIDENT.

MR. POWELL. In pursuance of notice given yesterday, I present to the Senate and ask leave to introduce a joint resolution proposing certain amendments to the Constitution of the United States. I am not prepared to say that the amendments proposed all meet my approval. They were drawn by one of the most eminent and distinguished citizens of Kentucky, Judge Nicholas, of Louisville, who is one of the first lawyers and statesmen in the valley of the Mississippi, a gentleman of worth and eminence and patriotism. The object of these amendments is to provide the mode and manner of electing the President of the United States. Judge Nicholas thinks that his proposition, to which he has given very grave thought, will be calculated to allay party and sectional strife, and do away with the "spoils" system. Coming from the source they do, I think I can without fear of contradiction state that they are worthy of the calm consideration of the Senate. They touch upon a matter that has received the earnest thought of many eminent statesmen since the organization of the present Government. I ask that the resolutions be read, printed, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Leave was given to introduce the joint resolution (S. No. 26) proposing certain amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and it was read twice, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Constitution of the United States be amended as follows:

ARTICLE NO. —.

SEC. 1. Congress shall at its first session after the adoption of this amendment, and from time to time thereafter, apportion among the several States the electors of President and Vice President according to the following ratio of population in Federal numbers: One elector to each State having less than a million; two to each State having one but less than two million; three to each having two but less than three million; four to each having three but less than four million; five to each having four but less than six million; six to each having six but less than eight million; and seven to each having eight million of population. Each State having but one elector shall be an electoral district, and each of the other States shall be divided by Congress into districts equal to the number of its electors, to be composed of coterminous territory, and as near as may be the districts to have equality of population.

SEC. 2. The voters of each district, qualified to vote for members of the most numerous branch of its Legislature, shall elect an elector.

The elections for electors shall be held during the month of October next preceding the commencement of any presidential term.

The several State Legislatures shall prescribe the time and manner for holding those elections and making returns thereof; also, for deciding them when contested, and making new elections therein; but Congress may discharge this duty, in whole or in part, when deemed necessary.

SEC. 3. The electors shall convene in the Senate Chamber at the seat of Government, at noon of the first Monday in February next preceding the commencement of the ensuing presidential term, and form an electoral college.

Two thirds of all the electors elected shall be a quorum of the college.

The Chief Justice of the United States, or in his absence the President of the Senate, or in the absence of both, the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall be the presiding officer of the college.

The presiding officer shall cause all the electors elected, whether present or not, to be listed in the alphabetical order of their names, and in that order divide them into six classes of equal numbers, distributing by lot separately among the several classes such electors at the bottom of the list, if any, as are left out in the division.

He shall by lot, under the supervision of one from each class, designate the several classes by numbers from one to six.

When a quorum is present he shall announce that the college is formed, and note the time at which the enunciation is made; but, when necessary, the enunciation shall be postponed until after the verification, by a majority of the electors present, of the returns and qualifications of members.

SEC. 4. After the college is formed the electors present of each class shall choose an elector from the class next succeeding it in number, except class six, which shall choose from class one.

In open session of the college the presiding officer, under the supervision and control of the six so chosen, or a majority of them, shall cause two of those six to be designated by lot.

From those two the college shall choose one, who shall be President for the next ensuing term of four years, and the other shall be the Vice President for that term.

The voting by class or college shall be viva voce in open session of the college.

In cases of tie, the casting vote shall be given by the presiding officer, who, if he be also an elector, shall not vote except in cases of tie.

The college may adopt rules for expediting a decision by the several classes, and to prevent more than two persons from receiving an equality of votes on the final vote of a class.

If there be a failure to choose one of the six from any class within the time prescribed by the college, the members of that class shall themselves make the choice.

There shall be no reconsideration of a vote given.

SEC. 5. If the college fail, except from exterior violence or intimidation, to make an election of President and Vice President within twenty-four hours from the time when the college was formed, it shall be dissolved, and the offices of its electors vacated.

Thereupon the presiding officer shall order a new election of electors on any day, not less than thirty from the date of his proclamation, and at least thirty before the next month of June, which election shall be held, and the electors chosen shall convene at the time and place designated by the proclamation, and proceed to the election of a President and Vice President as before directed, within twenty-four hours from the time of their formation into a college, and under like penalty for their failure.

Should the failure to elect be caused by exterior violence or intimidation, the functions of the college shall not cease, but it shall reconvene when and where a majority of its members shall by proclamation direct, and make or complete an election as before directed, within the time specified, under like penalty.

SEC. 6. Should no election of President and Vice President be made by an electoral college before the 1st day of June next ensuing the commencement of a presidential term, the Senate of the United States shall convene in its Chamber at noon of the first Monday in July next thereafter, constitute all its elected members, whether present or not, into an electoral college, as though each Senator had been elected an elector, and proceed in all respects as before directed, within twenty-four hours, to choose a President and Vice President to fill the vacancy.

Should the Senate fail to elect, the discharge of the duties of President and Vice President for the residue of that term shall devolve upon such officers of the Government as Congress shall have theretofore directed.

SEC. 7. No office shall be incompatible with that of an elector except the office of Chief Justice of the United States.

SEC. 8. An act or resolution passed by Congress, which shall be returned by the President with his objections, shall be valid without his signature, if repassed by each House of Congress by a vote equal to a majority of all the members elected thereto.

SEC. 9. It shall not be deemed compatible with the duty of a President habitually to use the patronage of his office for the special advantage of any particular political party, or to suffer the patronage of any subordinate officers so to be used.

SEC. 10. Should a vacancy occur in both the office of President and in that of Vice President while there are two years remaining of the then presidential term, the Chief Justice of the United States, or in his absence the Secretary of State, shall convene the electoral college after thirty days' notice by proclamation, who shall fill the vacancies for the remainder of the term in all respects as if it were an original election.

SEC. 11. Every elector before entering on the duties of his office, shall, by oath or affirmation, promise to support the Constitution of the United States, and declare that he has not, and will not, pledge his vote as an elector in favor of any person or toward aiding any political party.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

MR. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of E. F. and Samuel A. Wood, praying for an issue of duplicates of certain Oregon war bonds and coupons attached, amounting to the sum of $7,350, destroyed on board the steamer Golden Gate, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 105) for the relief of E. F. and Samuel A. Wood.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Berendt A. Froiseth, praying for the payment to him of fifty dollars which he alleges to be due him as assignee of Charles Colter on a voucher dated May 10, 1861, against the Government of the United States, issued by the quartermaster and approved by the colonel, W. A. Gorman, of the first regiment Minnesota volunteers, to Charles Colter, ask to be discharged from its further consideration, the claim having arisen under a contract, and therefore being cognizable by the Court of Claims.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 86) to authorize the appointment of a warden of the jail in the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 26) reviving the grade of lieutenant general in the United States Army, reported it with amendments.

Mr. FESSENDEN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 156) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, reported it with amendments.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. CLARK, it was Ordered, That James Pool have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The joint resolution from the House of Representatives (No. 39) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General W. T. Sherman, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill providing for extending the Leavenworth and Galveston railroad and telegraph line to intersect the Hannibal and St. Joseph railroad at Cameron, in the State of Missouri.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 106) prohibiting speculative transactions in gold, silver, and foreign exchange, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 107) to establish an additional judicial district in the State of New York; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JOHNSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 108) relating to acting assistant paymasters in the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 109) to expedite the settlement of titles to lands in the State of California; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 110) for the relief of John H. Shepherd and Walter K. Caldwell, of Missouri; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

PRIMARY SCHOOLS.

Mr. GRIMES. I submit an amendment which I intend to propose to the bill (S. No. 26) to provide for the public instruction of youth in primary schools throughout the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, without the limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and I move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MANAGEMENT OF HOSPITALS.

Mr. NESMITH. If it is in order, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by me yesterday.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should like to know whether the resolution will lead to debate.

Mr. NESMITH. I think not. It is a resolution calling on the Secretary of War for certain information relative to the management of hospitals, and the reception, treatment, and transfer of patients. I do not apprehend that it will lead to any debate. If it does, I shall withdraw it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to procure and transmit to the Senate the record of proceedings of a court-martial, convened in New York city by virtue of special order No. 118, December 7, 1863, for the trial of Assistant Surgeon Webster, for refusing to permit a dangerously wounded soldier to be removed from the McDougall general hospital, in a cold storm of rain, without permission of the medical director of the department, together with the defense of the accused read at the trial, the finding of the court, the recommendation of its members in respect to a remission of the sentence, and the decision of Major General Dix thereon. Also, that the General-in-Chief of the Army be requested to report in detail what authority, if any, subordinate military commanders have, by existing regulations, independent of the medical department, over general hospitals; what distinction, if any, there is in that respect between field or post hospitals and general hospitals; what orders or decisions have been made by the Secretary of War, General-in-Chief, or Surgeon General on the subject; and whether the interests of the service do not require that all orders relating to the management of general hospitals, and the reception, treatment, and transfer of patients, should pass through the Surgeon General or his immediate representative, the medical director.

Mr. WILSON. I asked yesterday to have this resolution laid over. I thought there were some expressions in the resolution that ought not to be there; and I think now it would be better that they should not be; but I do not object to its passage. I think the object sought for is an excellent one. The information asked for we ought to have.

The resolution was adopted.

ENLISTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 28.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will it give rise to debate? If it does not, I have no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I was not aware that the Senator from Wisconsin was entitled to the floor on another bill. If he desires to go on with his remarks, of course I will withdraw my motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The special order is before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 41) to promote enlistments in the Army of the United States, and for other purposes; the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. HENDERSON, in section three, line five, after the word "he," to strike out the words "his mother, and his wife and children," and after the word "notwithstanding," in the seventh line, to insert:

And his mother, his wife, and children shall also be free, provided that by the laws of any State they owe service or labor to any person or persons who have given aid or comfort to the existing rebellion against the Government since July 17, 1862.

So that the whole section will read as follows: That when any person of African descent whose service or labor is claimed in any State under the laws thereof shall be mustered into the military or naval service of the United States, he shall forever thereafter be free, any law, usage, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding; and his mother, his wife, and children shall also be free, provided that by the laws of any State they owe service or labor to any person or persons who have given aid or comfort to the existing rebellion against the Government since July 17, 1862; and all laws and parts of laws inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, war and not peace is our real situation. It is war—

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator allow me just a minute? Before he proceeds with his remarks I will observe that it is my desire to say something on this bill. I do not feel physically able to perform that task to-day; but as there does not seem to be a great deal of particular interest felt in this bill, if he will allow me I will make this suggestion to the Senate: when he and other gentlemen who wish to address the Senate on the subject shall have concluded their remarks, I will take it kindly of the Senate to make the subject the special order for some particular day that will least interfere with the working hours of the Senate. My object is to consume as little of its valuable time that could be devoted to labor and to business as practicable. If the Senate would have an understanding that this subject should be made the special order for Friday next for the purpose of accommodating me I would be obliged to them for their courtesy. But whatever the Senate may do in relation to the matter of course I will cheerfully submit to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If there is any desire to take up another bill I am perfectly willing that this subject shall go over until to-morrow; but there is a habit growing up here which does not seem exactly proper. The moment a gentleman takes the floor there are half a dozen who desire to say this and say that, or make some suggestion, until we are constantly interrupted. It seems to me it is hardly within the rules of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the Senator will excuse me. I did not intend to interfere with his remarks by the request that I made, and I hope the Senator will be permitted without interruption to continue his remarks at the present time.

Mr. DOOLITTLE addressed the Senate. [His speech will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] who has just taken his seat has asserted over and over again, read extracts from the speeches of others, and resolutions of public meetings to show that slavery is dead. If that is so let it be buried, and we can turn our attention and invoke the coöperation of the other departments of the Government in the work to restore peace, and with it union, harmony, confidence, prosperity, security, and happiness to our national Republic.

I propose to refer for a few moments to the remarks of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in his speech delivered here last week. I will not detain the Senate long.

That Senator and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] I understand now to occupy precisely the same ground, though they arrive at their positions by different roads. I propose now to examine for a short time some of the positions taken by the Senator from Ohio. He said:

"Have we this power, and if so whence is it derived and to what extent can we execute it? The power to emancipate a slave by Congress or the President certainly does not exist in time of peace. This is an axiom in American politics. The Second Congress, upon the petition of Benjamin Franklin, declared that the national Legislature had no power over slavery in the States. The declaration has been repeated by almost every Congress since that time. No political party that has ever been organized in this country has claimed the power of interfering with slavery in the States. At the very last session of Congress before this war broke out the House of Representatives, by a unanimous vote, declared that Congress had no power to emancipate slaves, and no power over the subject of slavery in the States. It was so declared by the President; it was so declared in the Chicago platform; it is, as I have said, an axiom in American politics that Congress has no power over slavery in the slaveholding States, that slavery is simply a local institution protected by local law, having existence commensurate only with that local law, that Congress has no power over it whatever except as that power grows out of the enforcement of the provision of the Constitution of the United States for the recapture of fugitive slaves. This, I believe, is admitted on all hands. If, therefore, we have power to emancipate, we must derive it from some other source, and not from the ordinary powers of Congress in time of peace.

"It is equally clear that the existence of a mere insurrection in our country will not justify interference with slavery. This has been settled now by many cases in our courts."

The Senator has at least made a fair statement of the case. I do not understand that Congress has any power in time of war that it has not in time of peace. Since our national existence we have passed through two wars, and no party, no department of the Government, no man in the Government, no court has ever held that Congress had more power in time of war than it has in time of peace. The power of Congress in both cases is derived from the same source—the Constitution of the United States. It can draw no power from any other source. The claim that the President or Congress has power derived from war above the Constitution is of recent origin.

But, Mr. President, extraordinary as it may seem, the Senator from Ohio says that we are engaged in a war, that this is not an insurrection which we are putting down, that the war is being carried on between belligerents, and that Congress derives its power from the law of nations governing war. Sir, let me ask what power Congress can derive from the law of nations? Is there any additional power whatever it can derive which is not granted by the Constitution? Can Congress change the law of nations in any particular? Of course we must be governed by the laws of civilized warfare, but how can Congress derive any authority from the law of nations?

If the Senator from Ohio is right, if his position is correct, I maintain that there are but two things which can be done in reference to this matter. If this is a war between belligerents all we can do is to treat or conquer, and no law that Congress may make will have any influence or power on our enemies so long as they are belligerents. I shall not trouble myself to hunt up the writers on the law of nations and read long extracts, but I lay down the proposition, and I invite the Senator from Ohio to discuss it.

The Senator from Ohio says there is nothing in the Constitution preventing the course which he proposes. I do not state his precise language, but that is the substance of what he said. Sir, that statesman in search of power for Congress who is driven to this argument is argumentless. It cannot be supported by precedent; it cannot be supported by reason; it cannot be supported by principle. I do not propose to amplify on these propositions; I merely state them. I am speaking without notes and with very little preparation.

But the Senators, however much they may differ in reference to the point from which they derive the power, all seem to concur in the proposition that it is necessary in order to bring this war to a successful issue that you shall dispose of the question of slavery. I concur to some extent with those who say that the institution of slavery is gone; but I say you may wipe it from existence to-morrow, and you advance no step toward the putting down of the rebellion, if it is a rebellion, or the ending of the civil war, if it is civil war. We have tried that for three years, and how far has it advanced our cause? Your proclamation of emancipation gave to Jeff. Davis fifty thousand bayonets when his cause was sinking. Your acts of confiscation gave to him armies when he could not have got armies by any other means. You have pursued this line of policy, this course of legislation, and it has accomplished nothing. All the interests of the country, the interests of the white race, demand that we should bring this war to a speedy close, preserving the integrity of the Union and the rights of the States.

Now, Mr. President, I differ from some of my own friends on this side of the Chamber. In the army of the confederacy they have not to-day over two hundred and fifty thousand men; they had not during last year over three hundred thousand; they have never had over four hundred thousand men at any time during the progress of the war. We have to-day seven hundred thousand, that is we are feeding and paying that many. The President has called for five hundred thousand more. We have never had less than six hundred thousand in the field, often eight hundred thousand.

The credit of Mr. Davis's government is worthless. The people inside of their lines are suffering for many of the necessities of life, and the supplies both of materials of war, ammunition, and the like, and food are scarce and difficult to be obtained for their army.

Why is it that this civil war has been permitted to linger so long? You have all the departments of the Government and such an army as the sun has never shone upon. Why did you not end it last year? Why do you not do it now? You have armies and resources, credit and money. Why don't you end the war?

I will tell you why you cannot. Your thoughts are turned upon the negro; your legislation is directed for his benefit; your ideas all float in and around him, from your Executive down. Instead of turning your attention to putting down the rebellion, to enforcing the laws of the Union under the Constitution, which you have the right to do, you are legislating for the benefit of the negro. That white man who has borne civilization so far, you have lost sight of and ignored. Sir, you are responsible before the American people to-day for the continuance of this war. You have made no call for troops that has not been answered. You have had the resources of the country with you. Any other country on the face of the earth with the blunders of this Administration would have been destroyed and utterly ruined. It shows the immense resources of this country and its great powers of endurance, when it can stand so many blunders and so much mismanagement. But, sir, suppose we adopt a little different policy; suppose that instead of pursuing this policy that has done so much mischief we turn our attention to another. We have the lights of history thrown along our path. Let us be instructed by them. Let us proclaim to these people real amnesty—not such as has been proclaimed by Mr. Lincoln—and give them six or nine months to accept it, and limit the time of its operation. Do that, and this difficulty will be settled very speedily. Open some door to those men who have gone into rebellion by which they can escape from the position which they are in, and they will retire from it very soon. My opinion is that if the President of the United States had proclaimed universal amnesty at any time within the last eighteen months, this war would now be over.

But an objection is urged that we shall soon have back all the leaders in political positions. There is no fear of this. The leaders in unsuccessful rebellion cease to lead when their cause declines.

But, sir, I agree there is justice in the proposition that the men who originated such a war as this should be punished. The proclamation of amnesty by the President is more for the negro than ending the rebellion. He excludes from his amnesty all officers above the grade of colonel in the army, besides others. It is very easy to give amnesty to all except the leaders.

If I understand the relation between the citizen and his Government it is that, while the citizen owes to the Government the duty of support, the Government on the other hand owes to him the duty of protection; and where the Government permits a de facto government in opposition to its own authority to be raised up, and the citizen has no courts to appeal to, no armies to protect him, he has nothing left but to lend acquiescence and support to the de facto government that exists and claims his obedience. Apply that principle here. There are many men in the southern country who held out to the last, who refused to have anything to do with this rebellion, as we once called it; but this Government had no forts there; it had no courts there to which they could appeal; they had no tribunals in which their rights could be protected. They had then necessarily to give in their acquiescence to the de facto government. There may be many such men that have risen to be colonels or brigadier generals, and the President says he will not pardon them, he will not forgive them. By the terms of his proclamation the most mischievous of all the men that were in the southern country may be included within the amnesty, while those least guilty may be excluded.

Now, Mr. President, that we may avoid all this difficulty and escape from all this embarrassment, suppose Congress, as it has the power to do, should pass an act of amnesty to every man now engaged in the rebellion or living in the rebel States who would lay down his arms and lend his support to the Government, excluding from the provisions of that amnesty all those who engaged in the rebellion prior to April 15, 1861, for that was the day on which Mr. Lincoln issued his proclamation calling for seventy-five thousand troops, which was a concession on the part of this Government that we were not able to lend our protection to citizens living in the rebel States. That would exclude all the leaders.

Suppose Congress should embrace in a bill a provision like this: that amnesty be tendered to those who have engaged in rebellion against the United States upon condition of submission by them to the Constitution and laws, excluding from its protection only those who took part in said rebellion before the 15th day of April, 1861, as being the prime movers of the insurrection, originating it, and leading it on before the usurped governments in the several States had established an authority to compel citizens to enter the ranks of the army, giving the color of law to its violence. If they do, in six months the rebellion will be over.

But, Mr. President, I do not feel very much like discussing the rights and privileges, the benefits and glories of the negro, while there is denied every guarantee of the Federal Constitution to the white man if he happens to differ in opinion from the Executive. I would rather discuss with these gentlemen—and I invite them to that discussion—where is your habeas corpus, where is your due process of law, where is your trial by jury, where is your right to bear arms, where is your free ballot, where are your free speech and free press, where are all those great privileges and rights for which our ancestors fought during the American Revolution, and which have been our boast from that time up to this? They are stricken down; they are gone. If gentlemen suppose they can amuse or interest us with the negro, while these inestimable rights are menaced or when they are lost, they are simply mistaken.

The Senator from Ohio, speaking of the case of a citizen of his own State whom the military seized and transported beyond our lines, said the people of Ohio sat as a jury, and a majority of them decided that he ought to have been banished. What is liberty worth in this country if it is to be decided by a popular majority? It has been the boast of our English ancestors, and it has been ours, that the humblest citizen in the land, as well as the most eminent, could appeal to the courts of his country and get security for his rights by that means. The Senator from Ohio says the citizens may be tried and punished by military power, and that all that is necessary to make it right is to pass a sentence at a popular election in the State sustaining the military. Sir, the Constitution of the United States guarantees, in time of war as well as peace, indictment for a criminal offense, trial by jury, to confront his accusers, and due process of law to any man who is not in the Army or Navy of the United States. The Senator says that Mr. Vallandigham was clearly guilty. Guilty of what? There is a slight difference between him and the President of the United States. The President declared that he was guilty of no offense; that juries were made to try criminals who had committed offenses; that that was too slow a process in that case, and he was afraid the person would commit some offense, and hence he was tried and punished in the manner which was adopted.

We have heard that eloquent Senator's voice proclaim again and again in favor of universal freedom to the negro, universal rights to the negro; but when it comes to the white man, he is not entitled to quite so many rights, and the provisions of the Constitution made for his benefit are to be trampled under foot; and he is to be oppressed if he differs from him in political opinion. Sir, it is more important to me, it is more important to those who are to come after me, it is more important to Christianity and civilization, that the white race should be preserved than any other. Sir, you may turn back in history and you will find that wherever they have been, they have borne along with them civilization, improvement, and advancement. In the search of knowledge they have traversed all the earth. What have the other race done? What improvement have they made? What advancement have they made? Sir, I would preserve the superiority in this country of the white race.

I will not now discuss the question of slavery. I will not be provoked into its discussion. Gentlemen say it is dead or dying. Let it die. But while Senators are struggling for the rights of the negro they forget the white race—the race that has made this country so great and so glorious, that has upheld your flag in triumph on every ocean, and has carried your commerce to all the civilized ports of the earth. I maintain that that race is entitled to the protection guaranteed to them by the Constitution and laws.

Sir, the gentleman from Ohio is progressing very fast. It is among the dangers that threaten us at the present time when we find one who has heretofore thought so correctly and been so moderate throwing the weight of his influence in favor of the most extreme measures and leading the van of those who support them.

While speaking of this subject of amnesty there was one point that I had almost forgotten. Senators say they do not want to forgive the leaders in this rebellion. There was flourishing around here the other day a man by the name of Gantt, from Arkansas. When a portion of the convention in Arkansas refused to sign the ordinance of secession this Gantt and Hindman, as I have heard, with violence and threats forced them all to sign it except one man who had the courage to refuse. You have forgiven him, and yet you tell me that you will not forgive the men who, under his influence, were driven out of the Union.

There is another gentleman, who comes from the State of Tennessee, whom you have not only forgiven but have given him a profitable office. I do not question his patriotism. I do not doubt his devotion to the country; but he has taught some very bad doctrine heretofore, calculated, from his high position, to mislead very many men who are now unfortunately not in a position to receive this amnesty.

The President of the United States, in 1861, called upon the Governor of Tennessee for some troops. Harris refused to give the troops. An address was issued by some thirteen gentlemen indorsing the position of the Governor, and laying down for future conduct the position which Tennessee should hold. I will read from that document. The gentleman, R. J. Meigs, is clerk, I believe, to a court made at the last session of Congress, where you turned out the judges of the old court because you doubted their fidelity to the Government:

"Tennessee is called upon by the President to furnish two regiments, and the State has, through her Executive, refused to comply with the call. This refusal of our State we fully approve. We commend the wisdom, the justice, and humanity of the refusal."

Why, sir, if I had said anything of that sort before this rebellion broke out you would have expelled me from the Senate. To differ with you makes us disloyal; to agree with you now wipes out all former offenses.

"We unqualifiedly disapprove of secession, both as a constitutional right and as a remedy for existing evils; we equally condemn the policy of the Administration in reference to the seceded States. But while we, without qualification, condemn the policy of coercion as calculated to dissolve the Union forever and to dissolve it in the blood of our fellow-citizens, and regard it as sufficient to justify the State in refusing her aid to the Government in its attempt to suppress the revolution in the seceded States, we do not think it her duty, considering her position in the Union, and in view of the great question of the peace of our distracted country, to take sides against the Government. Tennessee has wronged no State or citizen of this Union."

"The present duty of Tennessee is to maintain a position of independence, taking sides with the union and peace of the country against all assailants, whether from the North or the South. Her position should be to maintain the sanctity of her soil from the hostile tread of any party."

"We do not pretend to foretell the future of Tennessee in connection with the other States, or in reference to the Federal Government. We do not pretend to be able to tell the future purposes of the President and Cabinet in reference to the impending war. But should a purpose be developed by the Government of overthrowing and subjugating our brethren of the seceded States we say unequivocally that it will be the duty of the State to resist at all hazards, at any cost, and by any means, any such purpose or attempt. And, to meet any and all emergencies, she ought to be fully armed, and we would respectfully call upon the authorities of the State to proceed at once to the accomplishment of this object."

"NASHVILLE, April 18, 1861."

I find this paper signed by a number of gentlemen, and among the rest by R. J. Meigs.

The evil, as I have attempted to point out before, is this: that while those who planned and aided in bringing about this revolution, this rebellion, this civil war, or whatever it is, are forgiven, those who have been misled by the high position of the gentlemen who signed the address that I have read, and by the high position of Mr. Gantt, are left to suffer the consequence of their advice; no amnesty being extended to them.

Mr. President, I ought to apologize for the disjointed manner in which I have submitted these remarks. I do not think any gentleman ought to submit to the Senate remarks that he has not prepared with more care than I have done these; but, sir, they are my sentiments and my views on this subject. I do not know how soon I may be called home, and have therefore availed myself of this occasion to give my views without reservation or preparation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois has made one or two remarks to which I desire very briefly to reply. He quotes with approbation a portion of what I said the other day with regard to the powers of Congress in time of peace; but he seems to imply from what I said that I was in favor of exercising extraordinary powers to remove slavery. I am happy to inform the Senator from Illinois that the powers of Congress which I would exercise to remove slavery are those that he himself confesses to be proper. In my remarks the other day I was very careful not to state what in my view was the best plan to abolish slavery in this country. The object I seek to accomplish I boldly affirm. Reflection since that time has further convinced me that it is absolutely indispensable to the peace of our country that we should remove every vestige of slavery. I did not the other day, nor shall I now, enter into a discussion of the various propositions as to the mode of removing slavery, except that I affirmed then, and now affirm, that it is within the undoubted power of Congress to employ slaves in the military service, to emancipate those slaves as a consequence of military service, and as a necessary consequence to emancipate those persons who are connected by domesticities with the slaves thus employed. To that extent I proceeded, and that was the extent of my argument.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I certainly understood the Senator, and I so read his speech now, that he thought the power in Congress to abolish slavery, this being a civil war, was derived from the law of nations. Am I mistaken?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt that in all those States in which the rebellion has assumed the power and magnitude of a civil war, where by the decision of the Supreme Court they are regarded not only as rebels but as enemies, that by the laws of war we may emancipate every slave within the limits of those States. I think no gentleman can read the history of the world which forms the laws of war without coming to this conclusion. Nor do I think the gentleman from Illinois has himself contested that point. It is true he denies that Congress may enlarge the laws of war. I never claimed that Congress had the power to enlarge the laws of war; but I claimed that Congress in prescribing regulations for our Army may authorize our Army, and the President, as Commander-in-Chief of that Army, to wage against these rebels all the laws and usages of war, emancipation of slaves included.

But, Mr. President, there is an easier road through all this difficulty, a road that is now being indicated by public sentiment, a road that is as plain as noonday, a road which I trust the gentleman from Illinois will tread with me. He says, and he makes the significant declaration, that slavery is dead in this country. How dead? Destroyed by the civil war; not by our acts. He tells us that our acts, our legislation, and the proclamation of the President have had no effect in destroying slavery; and yet he says slavery is dead.

Mr. RICHARDSON. No.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understood him to say so.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I repeated what the gentleman from Wisconsin and what the gentleman from Ohio had said. It was not what I said, but what they said. They said slavery was dead, and I say if it is dead let it alone.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understood the Senator to go further than that, and to say that slavery was dead. Well, sir, he does not deny the proposition. Then I come to the main point. Why cannot he and those with whom he acts politically join with us in removing slavery by a constitutional amendment?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Wait until the vote is taken.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator asks us to wait until the vote is taken. I will, in the sincere hope that then we may vote together.

And, sir, this is the simplest, plainest way to get rid of slavery. Various propositions have been introduced to that effect at this session. I have not heretofore debated them. The first proposition was introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] to get rid of slavery by a constitutional amendment. I hope that after this subject is fairly discussed and deliberately considered that there will be found the requisite majority in both Houses of Congress in favor of a proposition abolishing, by constitutional amendment, slavery in all the States. I believe that if that proposition is submitted to the States, disconnected with all other propositions to amend the Constitution, it will be adopted by the requisite number of three fourths of all the States. There is not a non-slaveholding State in this Union but would eagerly embrace the opportunity of wiping out all that is left of the institution of slavery, and I believe that all the southern States as they come back into their old places in the Union will one by one adopt that policy, and in this way we can get rid of this whole trouble. It is an obvious and plain way; but until that plan can be considered and acted upon I am in favor of any other means to get rid of slavery.

There was another remark made by the Senator from Illinois in which he evidently misapprehended what I said the other day. He said that I treated these rebels simply as enemies subject only to the laws of war; and he says, if that is their relation, there is no way for us but to conquer them or to treat with them. Why, sir, this question has been decided already by the Supreme Court. That court has, in so many words, said that we may treat these rebels both as enemies and as rebels. We may wage against them the laws of war, and we may enforce against them the municipal laws; we may punish them as traitors and we may treat them as enemies. The laws of war are but the modified rules practiced among civilized nations as between public enemies. They do not prevent us from punishing the leaders of this rebellion as traitors. It is true that while their military power exists, while they are recognized by us as belligerents, while they hold the position of being at war with us, we cannot hang them according to our civil law; but the very moment that resistance is borne down by our superior strength, then we may treat them as rebels and punish them as such.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not desire to do the Senator from Ohio injustice. I certainly understood him the other day to go to the full extent that this was war. I understood him to assume that if we were to capture Jeff. Davis we could not do anything with him except what was authorized by the rules of war.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator, if he will read what I said, will find I said expressly that if we captured Jeff. Davis to-day, we could not hang him until we subdued the opposing military power. That is the decision of the Supreme Court, if I correctly apprehend it. That court, in so many words, say that as against this rebellion or those enemies we may wage the laws of war, and after we have overthrown their military power then we may treat them as rebels, and punish them in the mode prescribed by our law. That is precisely what I said. We cannot try Jefferson Davis under our civil law until we have broken down the military power of the rebels which makes them belligerents. These distinctions and these principles are obvious.

But the Senator brings into the Senate the argument that is so often heard on the stump, that while we desire to deprive white men of their rights, we are very anxious to secure freedom to the negro. No man is more sensitive of the rights of an American citizen than I am, nor than I think I have shown myself to be; but, sir, as against an enemy, or a man who in time of war aids the enemy, no treatment can be too severe. What I said about Mr. Vallandigham the other day grew out of this very position. Mr. Vallandigham, by the decision of a military tribunal, sanctioned and sustained by the highest United States judge in our State, had placed himself in the position of a public enemy. It was not simply as a man who talked as a certain party talk in our State, and, indeed, all over the country, who could find occasion to denounce everything that was done by the Government, and to exonerate everything that was done by the rebels, who could find no good at all in those who are compelled to administer the Government, and no harm in those who are waging war against the Government. The motive of such opposition may be harmless or justifiable, or may be but the latitude granted to free discussion; but in the case of Mr. Vallandigham it exceeded these limits. It was found by the decision of a military tribunal that that gentleman had committed such acts in the State of Ohio as placed him in the category of a public enemy. I say that by the laws of war he may be seized even in a loyal neighborhood, and may be punished according to the laws of war. Mr. Vallandigham in his position was not less a public enemy because he carried on his enmity within the State of Ohio. If he had been seized in the State of Tennessee, or within the lines of military operations, every one would have said that he would be subject to court-martial, and might be tried and hung or shot. He was not the less a public enemy because he was carrying on his active opposition to the Government in the State of Ohio, than if carried on in the State of Tennessee.

Mr. President, I do not think that any party in this country desires to deprive the white men of our country of any of their constitutional rights. This is an allegation that is very often made; but there is no foundation for it. The Administration party, the Union party that now controls the Government, are as anxious to preserve the rights of individuals as the Senator from Illinois. This talk about the desire of the President, or the desire of the party to protect the rights of the negro at the sacrifice of the rights of the white man is, to say the least of it, empty declamation. If that idea could be instilled into the American mind, you would make rebels of the whole American people, because we are proud and sensitive. Senators ought to be cautious before they lend the weight of their names to such a proposition.

The President of the United States is not an especial favorite of mine, and yet I will say this: I have seen nothing in his conduct to show that he would desire to trample upon the rights of a single American citizen. He has been kind and lenient and forbearing, yielding sometimes when he ought not to have yielded. I have never known a case in the history of this war where he has willfully trampled upon the rights of an American citizen; nor do I believe he will do so. If he was actuated by bad motives, if he was a dangerous man using his vast authority for the purpose of overthrowing the liberties of the people, I would be ready to step to the side of the Senator from Illinois and resist him even to the extent of war; but I do not believe there is any such case. There is no man within the limits of the United States who has reason to believe that the President of the United States desires to overthrow this Government and deprive the white men of the country of their liberty; nor do I believe the Senator from Illinois really in his heart thinks so; and yet these constant reiterations of this statement that the President and his party are endeavoring to subvert the rights of the white men of the country in some way or other will have a very injurious effect, and I think it ought not to be repeated here.

Mr. President, I have said all I desire to say in correction of some of the statements made by the Senator from Illinois. I again repeat what I said the other day, that I believe it is our duty at this session of Congress, by some carefully considered act, to do all we can to wipe slavery out of existence in the United States; that the best, plainest, and broadest road is by proposing to the States amendments to the Constitution; that besides that we may authorize the employment of negroes in our Army and secure them their emancipation. We may, to the extent of our power, in other ways aid in the abolition of slavery. I believe that it is our duty to close up this troublesome controversy at this session, and I think the Senator from Illinois ought to join with me in doing it.

What would be the effect of a broad act of emancipation? Suppose we had no slavery in this country. Where then would be this angry excitement, this angry turmoil that for years has disturbed our party politics? The occupation of many who have been exciting the people of the country both North and South on this subject would be gone. The time has arrived when we should reap the great fruit which springs out of this civil war; when we may make our institutions more harmonious, when we may remove from our Government that feature which has been obnoxious to every just mind from its foundation; that feature which was denounced by all the framers of the Government. If by the sacrifice of thousands of lives and millions of money we can not only preserve the Union but can remove from our system this incongruous element, it will be money wisely spent and lives nobly sacrificed.

I would not have entered into this war nor would I have waged it for the purpose of freeing the negroes of the country; but since we are in it, since these rebels have themselves by their act of war given us the power to strike at slavery, I, for one, am in favor of doing it. Since they are at open war with us I would avail myself of this action of theirs by a constitutional amendment to wipe out every vestige of slavery. Then the States that are now acting harmoniously in the Government and the States that shall hereafter come in with us and take their places by our side, both new States to be formed out of the Territories and the disloyal States of the South that shall return, will give us the requisite consent by a majority of three fourths of the States, and then this problem and controversy will cease and determine. I believe it will never cease until the cause of the war is ended by a great act of emancipation.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The Senator from Ohio does not answer the question I propounded to him in reference to Mr. Vallandigham. There is no dispute about the facts in his case. We all understand what was done. Where did they get the authority? The Senator says that if Mr. Vallandigham had done inside of our lines, in the State of Tennessee, what he had done in Ohio, a military court-martial could have tried him; and why? There was no law in Tennessee but military law. But while the courts were open in Ohio, if he was a public enemy, contributing to this rebellion, he was guilty of treason, and ought to have been tried by the laws.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If my friend from Illinois will pardon me, I should like to make this inquiry: what did Mr. Vallandigham do in Ohio which, if done in Ohio or anywhere else, would give the Government power to court-martial him?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not desire to get into any collateral controversy on this point. I do not myself admit even that he did anything of the sort. But even admitting it, the courts were all open in Ohio; there was no pretext for the exercise of military power at all; he was neither in the naval nor military service of the United States; and where did you get your authority to do what was done? Sir, it was a clear violation of the Constitution.

The Senator says in reference to the President of the United States, and probably I will make some admission on that point, that he is kind-hearted and has allowed a great many men to go free whom he ought not to have let go free. I do not know how that is. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. POMEROY] says it is so, and the Senator from Ohio says it is so; and I suppose they have examined the subject. But I will tell you what he has not done. He has not restrained his subordinates in striking down the guarantees of the Constitution of the United States which were thrown as a broad panoply around every American citizen wherever he may be. That is my reply, so far as the President may have done those acts himself. It is his duty to restrain his subordinates. They have done the oppression; they have violated the law; they have trampled upon the Constitution; and he being the only power that could restrain them, and not doing it, he is responsible for their acts.

I will say to the Senator from Ohio, in reply to his observation in reference to the constitutional mode which he now points out of amending the Constitution on the subject of slavery, that I do not know what objection there is to submitting that question to the States and allowing them to act upon it; but I was replying to the heresies, the dangerous and monstrous doctrines, that I find in the speech of the Senator from Ohio. I did not intentionally misrepresent the Senator. I certainly understood him most clearly and positively to take the ground that this being a civil war, the parties to it being belligerents, the laws of nations conferred upon Congress the power to abolish slavery without any other enactment whatever. I so stated at the time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I again repeat that in those States which are recognized as belligerents I think there is no doubt on that point; and the gentleman can scarcely controvert that by the laws of war the Government of the United States have the right to emancipate their slaves and employ them in their armies, and that as Congress prescribes the mode and manner in which our armies shall be used Congress may direct the application of that Army.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am not discussing the question of what force Congress may employ and what it may not.

The Senator referred to precedents in history the other day to show that nations in all time had employed their slaves in war. I shall enter into no discussion in reference to that point. That is not the question in issue between the gentleman and myself. The question in issue between us is this: can you legislate upon the property of a belligerent, your enemy, before you have conquered him? I say you cannot. The gentleman has not controverted that point. What you may do after you have conquered him is another question. I am not discussing that question. I have not investigated it. I have not thought about it. When the time comes to think about it and to discuss it I shall do so.

This controversy, therefore, Mr. President, leads us to precisely where it found us, I imagine. I certainly did not intend to misrepresent the gentleman in any particular in any position he has taken. It was not my purpose to do so. I thought I made a fair statement, as I certainly endeavored to make a fair statement, of his position.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to.

EXAMINATION OF OFFICERS.

Mr. WILSON. I now move to take up the bill (S. No. 85) to provide for the examination of certain officers of the Army.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs that every quartermaster and assistant quartermaster, and every commissary and assistant commissary of subsistence, and every paymaster and additional paymaster, shall, as soon as practicable, appear for examination as to his qualifications before a board to be composed of three officers of the corps to which he belongs, of recognized merit and fitness, which board shall make a careful examination as to the qualifications of all officers who may appear before them in pursuance of this act, and shall also make a full and true record of the examination in each case.

Boards of examination are to be constituted, under the direction of the Secretary of War, by the Quartermaster General, the Commissary General of Subsistence, and the Paymaster General, at convenient places, and general rules of examination and a standard of qualifications are to be prescribed by those officers, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, and are to be published in general orders.

After the board shall be constituted, and after the general orders shall have been published for a period of ninety days, none of the officers mentioned in the first section of this act are to receive any pay, allowances, or emoluments, until they shall have appeared before the proper board of examination; but if any officer shall be unable to appear before such board by reason of sickness or wounds, he shall, upon the certificate of a medical officer of the Army, or of a practicing physician, when a medical officer of the Army is not accessible, be entitled to receive the usual and lawful pay and allowances until such disability shall cease to exist, unless sooner discharged or dismissed from the service, and thereafter he is to receive no pay or allowances of any kind until he shall have appeared before the proper board of examination.

If the board of examination shall report that any officer does not possess the requisite business qualifications, they are to forward the record of the examination of such officer to the head of the bureau to which he may belong, and if the head of such bureau shall approve the finding and report of the board, the officer so failing in his examination shall, if commissioned, be dismissed from the service with one month's pay, and if not yet commissioned his appointment shall be revoked. If the board shall report that any officer fails to pass a satisfactory examination by reason of intemperance or vicious habits, and if the head of the bureau shall approve the finding and report of the board as to his lack of the requisite business qualifications, then such officer is to be dismissed from the service without pay, and is not to be permitted to reënter the service as an officer; but such dismissal is not to relieve him from liability, under existing laws, for any offense he may have committed.

The boards of examination are to forward all their records of examination to the heads of the bureaus to which they appertain, and such records are to be filed in the proper bureaus with a suitable index, and any officer who may desire it is to be entitled to receive a copy of the record in his own case upon paying the cost of copying the same.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill with two amendments. The first amendment was in section one, line eleven, after the word "also" to insert the words "keep minutes and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of the first section the following words:

And all members of such boards of examination shall, before proceeding to the discharge of their duties as herein provided, swear or affirm that they will conduct all examinations with impartiality, and with a sole view to the qualifications of the person or persons to be examined; and that they will not divulge the vote of any member upon the examination of any officer who may appear before them.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

PAY OF THE ARMY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill (S. No. 7) to increase the bounty for volunteers and the pay of the Army is the first bill on the general orders, and is now before the Senate for its consideration.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the bill lie on the table. It is a subject on which there should be further consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 9, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. Dr. FURNESS, of Philadelphia.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

TREASURER'S ACCOUNTS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Treasurer of the United States, transmitting copies of his accounts with the United States for the third and fourth quarters of the year 1862, and the first and second quarters of the year 1863, as adjusted by the accounting officers of the Treasury; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

RAILROAD GRANT.

Mr. HOTCHKISS, by unanimous consent, and in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill granting lands to aid in constructing the Lake Superior railroad, and providing for the use of the same by the United States free of charge; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CONFISCATION.

Mr. STILES. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to record my vote on the joint resolution explanatory of the confiscation act.

Mr. STEVENS. I object.

Mr. STILES. I was necessarily absent. If I had been present I should have voted "No."

LOUISIANA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to have the patience of the House for a few moments this morning to dispose of the Louisiana election case. The gentleman who claims the seat desires to be heard, but he will be brief, and then I propose to move the previous question. I therefore call up the case.

The House accordingly proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution, reported from the Committee of Elections:

Resolved, That A. P. Field is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the State of Louisiana in the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

Mr. FIELD, (claimant.) I regret very much indeed, Mr. Speaker, that I am compelled to ask the indulgence of the House for the short time which it will take me to conclude the remarks which I commenced the other day. Business of more importance has since occupied the time of the House and demanded the attention of members. I design, however, to present to the consideration of the House, in the conclusion of my remarks, some documents which bear upon the claim of Louisiana to be represented upon this floor. I have submitted to the House the correspondence between the committee representing the people of that portion of Louisiana loyal to the Government of the United States and the military authorities or the military governor. That committee also, in order to act in harmony with the military authorities and to do nothing which could be complained of, addressed a communication to the commanding general of that district. On the 19th of September of last year, after having addressed a communication to the military governor of the State of Louisiana, the committee also addressed a letter to General Banks, commanding the department of the Gulf, a copy of which letter I hold in my hand now and ask to have read.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, September 21, 1863.

GENERAL: In conformity with a resolution unanimously adopted at a meeting of citizens of the first and second congressional districts of the State of Louisiana, convened for the purpose of taking measures for the reestablishment of civil government in Louisiana, we have the honor herewith to transmit you copies of all the proceedings.

In fulfilling this duty we indulge the hope that the success which you have achieved in the cause of our national unity will speedily be followed by a restoration of civil government in Louisiana, under the Constitution of the United States.

We subscribe ourselves, with great respect, your obedient servants,

J. L. RIDDELL, President.

ROBERT J. KERR, Secretary.

General NATHANIEL P. BANKS.

Mr. FIELD. The Committee of Elections maintain, in their report, that I am here without a constituency. It will be remembered from the documents which I have presented to the House that in our unfortunate divisions in Louisiana a portion of the loyal men—because I will call them loyal—contended that the State was out of the Union, that we were a conquered territory, and that, therefore, we could not rightfully hold any election in the State under any circumstances whatever.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FIELD. I will if it is not to be taken out of my time.

The SPEAKER. It will come out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman speaks of his having been uniformly loyal. I desire to ask him one question. I ask him if he did not in May, 1862, publish a card in the New Orleans Delta stating in substance that "some persons had slandered him by saying that he had gone on board a Yankee gunboat, a part of Farragut's fleet then lying in the river, but that his known character for loyalty to the South should forbid the imputation from being believed by any person who knew him?" Such a card was published over the signature of a person bearing the same name as the claimant, and I want to know if he was the author of that card?

Mr. FIELD. I desire to know the author of the communication from which the gentleman has read.

Mr. STEVENS. The author is Major General Butler, whose name is signed to this paper.

Mr. FIELD. So far as any charge upon my loyalty is concerned—

Mr. STEVENS. I would like an answer to my question.

Mr. FIELD. I deny having been anything but a loyal man from the commencement of this rebellion.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the gentleman from Louisiana will give way to me for a moment.

Mr. FIELD. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. I think it due to the gentleman from Louisiana that I should state that he brought letters to me from gentlemen well known to this House, and especially from Hon. Michael Hahn, who, although he differs with Mr. Field as to his right to a seat here, takes pleasure in certifying his loyalty and his support of the Government. I am glad of this occasion to bear testimony to the character of the gentleman from Louisiana in this respect, after the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] who believes in foreign nations rather than in sister States. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. That is a very poor answer to my question. I asked a question, and I should like to have an answer to it.

Mr. FIELD. Mr. Speaker, I must return my thanks to the distinguished chairman of the Committee of Elections for having made this communication to this House. I am prepared upon this floor, or anywhere, to vindicate my loyalty to the country. I have had no feeling in my life unless it was that of loyalty and devotion to this great and glorious Government. Some men who have communicated with the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] may have distrusted my loyalty because I could not subscribe to the doctrine contended for by a certain portion of those who opposed my election.

Mr. Speaker, I was going on to say, when interrupted, something in reply to the statement of the report of the Committee of Elections, that I am here without a constituency. Let me read one resolution of the party in Louisiana that maintains the same doctrine that the gentleman from Pennsylvania does. In answer to the communication of the people of Louisiana to join them in holding an election, they resolved—

"That, in the opinion of the committee, the constitution and the government of Louisiana were and remain overthrown and destroyed by the rebellion and subsequent conquest of the State, and that until a new constitution shall have been adopted by the loyal citizens of the State no elections for a member of a State Legislature can or ought to be held."

Here is a large party sustaining the very views of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Certainly those gentlemen were of the belief that our Government had been overthrown, our Constitution destroyed, and our land virtually gone, and they could not of course enter into any effort to bring the State into the Union except upon their own terms.

I will now read from the National Intelligencer. Men of that party have taken pains to write letters here assailing the commanding general—General Banks—who is now in charge of that department. Here is what I find in the National Intelligencer under the heading of "Reconstruction in Louisiana:"

NEW ORLEANS, January 9, 1864.

DEAR SIR: President Lincoln has started a Missouri case in Louisiana, and has made Banks our master; and Banks is another Schofield, only worse than he. Our mass meeting last evening was a complete success; but its object will be defeated by Banks, who, under orders direct from the President, declares his purpose to order an election for a convention; thus playing into the hands of Cottman, Riddle, and Fields, and their crew. The Union men—the true Union men—are thunderstruck by the course of the President in this matter.

We were not informed of the President's orders to General Banks until the hour of the meeting last night, and the meeting was not informed at all. General Shepley, who is generally liked, and who has done all he could to promote the free State cause, and to organize a free State government, will resign, and the election ordered by Banks will be purely at military dictation, and will be so regarded.

I know not the secret spring of all these acts of the President, and think the President has probably been deceived by interested and base men. His true friends, and the friends of his measures, are much grieved by the course he has authorized. It is certain that Banks has the unchanged confidence of Mr. Lincoln. Here he is regarded as another Schofield, without the military talent of that officer. Is it not possible to get the President to countermand his orders to Banks immediately, and let the people manage matters as they have begun to do?

Mr. Speaker, it will be now seen by the House that the President nor any other in charge can please a certain portion of the people of Louisiana who call themselves loyal. Unless the President conforms his plans precisely to their plans, or if he happens to charge some man in the department of Louisiana with control of the reconstruction of the State, they are shocked at it. They call upon the President to displace him, and they denounce him worse than was General Schofield who had charge of the department of Missouri.

So you see, Mr. Speaker, that every effort on the part of the people of Louisiana who are desirous of a return to the Union was made for the purpose of harmonizing all of the elements to bring the State back at the earliest period possible. She ought to have been brought back more than twelve months ago. More than twelve months ago she would have been in the Union and represented here if the people of Louisiana had been allowed to pursue the course which they desired in reference to that election.

It is contended on the part of gentlemen in this House that we had no authority to hold an election, that we were in a condition which forbade an election to be held in Louisiana. I ask those gentlemen to look at the State of Arkansas. She has gone to work in the proper way. She has inaugurated a mode of bringing the State back into the Union less objectionable than any other. The loyal people entitled to vote have assembled in convention. I believe that they have also elected a member of Congress from one of the districts, who, I understand, is here and will present his credentials. I further understand—I do not speak from authority—that the proceedings of the people of Arkansas, all independent of the military authority, have been approved by the authorities here, or at least sanctioned to some extent by the President of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, after the address to General Banks in September last by the convention of loyal people of Louisiana, they proceeded to publish an address calling upon the people of New Orleans to assemble on the day of election for the purpose of holding an election. They proceeded to publish election notices, one of which I will read:

ELECTION NOTICE.

State of Louisiana, Parish of St. Bernard.

Notice is hereby given to the electors of the parish of St. Bernard that an election will be held, according to law, on the first Monday in November next for the following officers, namely: Governor, Lieutenant Governor, Secretary of State, Treasurer, Auditor, Attorney General, Superintendent of Education, one member of Congress for second congressional district, one member of Congress for State at large, State Senators for senatorial district, and members of State Legislature, &c., &c.; and that the polls will be open on the aforesaid Monday, the 2d day of November next, from nine o'clock a. m. to four 4 p. m. at the several places designated by law, being the usual places where elections are held in said parish, as follows:

Here is another notice which I will read:

ELECTION NOTICE.

State of Louisiana, Parish of St. Bernard.

Notice is hereby given to the electors of the parish of St. Bernard that an election will be held, according to law, on the first Monday in November next for the following officers, namely: Governor, Lieutenant Governor, Secretary of State, Treasurer, Auditor, Attorney General, Superintendent of Education, one member of Congress for first congressional district, one member of Congress for State at large, two State Senators for first senatorial district, one member of State Legislature; and that the polls will be open on the aforesaid Monday, the 2d day of November next, from nine o'clock a. m. to four 4 p. m. at the several places hereafter designated, being the usual places where elections are held in said parish, as follows:

In the first district, the first poll to be held at the house of Francisco Asvedo, lately known as the Battle-Ground Coffee-House, under the superintendence of MM. Victor Debouchel, jr., Francisco Asvedo, and Guillaume Watrigny as commissioners.

The second poll, at the coffee-house of Mr. Francisco Arteta, under the superintendence of MM. Francisco Arteta, I. Meunier, and William T. Price.

In the second district, at the coffee-house of Mr. Santiago Pendas, under the superintendence of MM. Antoine Chilaire, Joseph R. Serpas, and H. Turner.

In the third district, at the coffee-house of Mr. H. Gutierrez, under the superintendence of MM. Pierre St. Germain, jr., Adolphe Estopinal, and Francisco Estopinal.

In the fourth district, at the house of Mr. Pablo Felian, under the superintendence of MM. Manuel Serpas, Melcior Bienville, and Cyprien Serpas.

For the fifth district, first poll at the coffee-house of Mr. Dominguez Florez, under the superintendence of MM. Augustus Nufiez, Leon Nufiez, and Vincent Morris.

Second poll, at the grocery of Mr. B. Gutierrez, at the Island, Lake Lery, under the superintendence of MM. Bernard Gutierrez, Joseph Des Grains, and Louis Serigny.

For the sixth district, at the house of Mr. Pierre Ruiz, at the Chiboula, under the superintendence of MM. Edgard Ruiz, Pierre Thiel, and P. A. Roussau.

The said elections to be held and the returns made agreeable to the constitution and the laws on that subject, and triplicate returns to be made by the commissioner for each district according to law.

PARISH OF ST. BERNARD, 20th of October, 1863.

It will be perceived by the notice I have read to the House that everything was done which could be done under the state of things which existed in Louisiana. No order having been made by the military authorities, and they declining to order any election, we thought it eminently proper that the people should assemble for the purpose of expressing their views and voting for their officers. They being the source of all power, being interested in this matter, being desirous of returning to the Union, we thought it eminently proper that that mode should be pursued by which they could as speedily as possible return to the Union.

Those who were opposed to us in all these plans, who declared we were a Territory, would not have united with us in an election, even if an order had been made by the military governor. They had determined that we were out of the Union, and that they would not participate in any election for members of Congress, Governor, or members of State Legislature. If these were their doctrines, they could not have participated in any election under any order that may have emanated from either Washington or from the military authority.

Those who were opposed to the election maintain that doctrine now, notwithstanding an order has been issued by General Banks, under direction of the President of the United States, for holding an election there. We are satisfied with that. I am satisfied with it, because if I cannot get the State back into the Union in one way, I am not opposed to getting her back into the Union in some other way which I might not think quite so proper.

Upon what principle will they require that a gentleman shall present himself to this House, claiming to be a member of Congress elected from Louisiana? The committee say he has no constituency. How many votes do you demand he shall have to make his claim here valid? In the district I represent there were but twenty-four hundred voters. The election was not held in the city of New Orleans, or in that portion of the district in which I reside, by reason of the interference of the military authorities. Is it not reasonable to suppose that that portion of those people who are opposed to the State coming into the Union would not have gone into the election anyhow, even if they had been permitted by the military authorities to do so? The people in the two parishes below the city assembled and voted. Now, would you require thirteen hundred votes—that would be a majority of twenty-four hundred—to entitle a man to a seat? According to the President's plan of reconstruction only one tenth of the number of the voters is required. Then suppose that one tenth of the loyal people of that district voted for me, upon what principle will it be contended now that because they voted prior to the President's proclamation of his plan of reconstruction they should be deprived of their representation and this election be declared void? I can see no reason in it.

Besides this, let me inform the House that the city of New Orleans has furnished to the Federal Army, as I am assured by two paymasters who have paid the troops there, seven thousand men, as good soldiers as ever shouldered a musket and marched to the battle-field. Since the election twelve months ago we have furnished upward of five thousand fighting men from that city, who have gone into the Federal Army; and consequently our voting population has been greatly decreased thereby.

But it is said by some gentlemen that we do not know whether these men are loyal who voted then. Sir, I can tell you that nobody but loyal men, those who have taken the oath, and that is the only standard by which we can determine loyalty, voted at that election. If they took the oath they were entitled to their rights, and their property was exempt, according to the President's proclamation, from seizure and confiscation.

It is said that we are not all of us loyal men, and that probably some disloyal men voted. I can tell gentlemen that by an order issued long ago all men who did not take the oath of allegiance and who were not considered loyal by the authorities were sent beyond the lines, and there are no disloyal men there now excepting those who have taken and subscribed an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and to observe strict loyalty to this Government. That is my answer to the charge of disloyalty. I contend that the people of that region are more loyal in proportion to their numbers than are the people in any of the States called loyal. I do not wish, sir, to be invidious, but I traveled through some of your loyal States in coming here, and I heard expressions from men which, if made in Louisiana, would have sent them to Ship Island or Fort Jackson. It costs a man nothing to be loyal here, but in my country it costs a man his property, and perhaps his life. I believe that a majority of the people of Louisiana have always been loyal, and that if the Administration that preceded this had done its duty faithfully my adopted State would not have been dragged out of the Union by traitors. If instead of withdrawing all the United States forces from our forts and arsenals they had supplied us with arms, the loyal people of Louisiana would have rallied to your standard, and the blood of the valiant men from Massachusetts and Illinois and other States, would not have stained the soil of Louisiana; she would have remained true to the Union.

Mr. SMITH. I hope that by unanimous consent the gentleman will be allowed to proceed with his remarks.

Mr. FIELD. I want only about fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can proceed only by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. FIELD. I had designed, Mr. Speaker, submitting an affidavit from a very prominent Union man, and a large slaveholder, from the Red river country, who traveled on here with me, and who had been in the swamps for six weeks, to show his feeling and that of his neighbors. Many of these men have voluntarily given up their property of every species, including their slave property. I can give the instance of a gentleman of the name of Dr. Duncan, one of the largest slaveholders in Mississippi or Louisiana, who has fought this rebellion from the beginning to the end, and who is now in Philadelphia. This gentleman declares to me that he is in favor of the abolition of slavery throughout the country if necessary to save this Government. These men are willing to sacrifice all their property and all their means for the salvation of this country.

Sir, the question of slavery never was in my way. I owned but few negroes; but if I had had a thousand I would not have hesitated to sacrifice them upon the altar of my country rather than see one single star blotted out from that bright galaxy that floats above you; I have never had any difficulty upon that point.

And now, Mr. Speaker, it becomes me to tell you that I know the decision of the House will be against me. I shall submit to it without complaint or murmur. I shall return to my adopted State with my loyalty undiminished. I shall battle there with what little ability I have to sustain this glorious Union; and though the star of Louisiana has been obscured by the hands of traitors it will yet shine forth as brightly as that of any of her sister States.

And furthermore, if I had a seat in the convention that is to amend our constitution I would perpetually disqualify every man who has been a leader in this rebellion from ever holding office under this Government. I would never let the soil of Louisiana be polluted by the footsteps of Sidel, Benjamin, or any of that fraternity as long as I could raise my voice against it.

There is my loyalty, and there is my Unionism; and I ask gentlemen if any man could go further. I have no sympathy with traitors. They have desolated our firesides; they have ruined our people; they have brought mourning to almost every hearth and every fireside in our country. That, sir, rests upon them, and with my consent never shall they be permitted to return to that country which has been made a wreck of by their treason and traitorism.

I designed to say one word to the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] who I regret not to see in his seat. I however feel compelled to make the remark.

A MEMBER. He is here.

Mr. FIELD. When my credentials were presented to this House and my name was placed upon the rolls of the House at the commencement of the session, the gentleman from Pennsylvania rose in his place and remarked that the members from Louisiana had already at the time he was speaking gone to the Sergeant-at-Arms for the purpose of getting their pay.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman will allow me to correct him, I said one of these members.

Mr. FIELD. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I do not know the Sergeant-at-Arms, I have never seen him, nor did I dream of any such thing. Poor as I am, and poor as my people are, I would scorn in these times of peril and danger, in these times when the Government wants money so urgently, I would rather endure my poverty in silence than to ask for one dollar unjustly. I am not amenable to that charge. Thank God, I am not.

I have made sacrifices to come here. I am poor, and it is no crime to be poor. What little I had was swept away by this rebellion. All that was left to me was my little practice as an humble lawyer. That I have given up for the purpose of coming here to see if I could not do some good in favor of unfortunate Louisiana.

And now, Mr. Speaker, as I am about to take my leave of you and of the House, let me implore you to look kindly upon poor Louisiana. Guard her rights if you can. Protect her people who have been under military law for nearly two years, who have had no voice either here or elsewhere in their own government. Look upon her kindly, protect her if you can, and give her at least some

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 35.

right to be heard, if not now, at least in some future time, upon this floor. Remember, I say, Louisiana; remember Chalmers, the glorious battle-field of the immortal Jackson; remember that we marched side by side with you upon the plains and mountains of Mexico. The bones of her sons lie mingled on that soil with those of glorious Massachusetts, of Vermont, and many of the other States; they lie there side by side, and they will rise together.

Remember all these things, and remember, too, that she has always been open, frank, and generous. It is said that we hate the North. It is false. I have scarcely ever voted for any other than a northern man. Our city, in the election when Mr. Fillmore was made a candidate, gave forty-two hundred majority in favor of him. No, sir, we know no distinctions. A Massachusetts man is as much a brother to me as if he were born upon my native soil of Kentucky, and I glory in his patriotism as much. Never let it be said that we dislike the North. We buy from them almost all we consume. We do not make even a plow, a wheelbarrow, or a carriage. We get them from Massachusetts, from Connecticut, or from Pittsburgh. All our machinery, everything of the kind, we have heretofore willingly bought of you, and we will do it again whenever this rebellion ceases and our channels of commercial intercourse are again open.

One word, and I am done. I cannot close my remarks without returning my profound thanks to the chairman of the Committee of Elections, as well as to each and every member of that committee, for the impartial, able, and patient manner in which they heard all I had to say in favor of my claim to a seat in this House. They have my profound gratitude. I will not say that they have been wrong in reporting against me. They have reported according to the dictates of their own consciences and judgment, and it is not for me to complain.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to call for the previous question on the resolution at this moment. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GANSON] desires to be heard. Under the rule I am entitled to an hour after the main question has been ordered to close the debate. I do not propose to occupy an hour, and I will, with the consent of the House, permit the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GANSON,] a member of the Committee of Elections, to occupy a portion of my time.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I also want to be heard for a moment.

Mr. DAWES. I do not feel at liberty, as chairman of the Committee of Elections, to call the previous question when members of the committee desire to be heard.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The attention of the House has been called to a card said to have been published in New Orleans by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Field] about the time of the surrender of the city. I have not seen that card, but I desire to bear a word of testimony in regard to the gentleman who claims a seat here from Louisiana. He was formerly a respected and patriotic citizen of Illinois, long and well known for his patriotism and ability. I have known him for nearly a quarter of a century, and it affords me pleasure to speak from my personal knowledge in this regard. I received a letter from a distinguished citizen of Illinois, who has been long in New Orleans, in relation to this claimant. He states that he was always one of the most loyal men in that State to the flag and the Union. He commended him to me for devotion to the Union under the most trying circumstances. That is all I desire to say. I have made the statement in justice to the claimant for a seat upon this floor, and what I believed to be due to truth and justice.

Mr. DEMING. Mr. Speaker, when the loyalty of the claimant to this seat was brought into question the chairman of the Committee of Elections appealed to me, and I am unwilling that he should labor under an imputation and suspicion of disloyalty which my silence under such an appeal might possibly create. I entered the city of

New Orleans with the Federal forces on the 1st of May, 1862. We found all the machinery of justice broken up; the courts were closed; and one of the first necessities which the emergency brought upon us was to organize some means by which justice might be administered. One of the first orders of the commanding general was to organize a provost's court. We had long known the claimant in the city. He was a distinguished lawyer in that municipality. He was the first man who came forward under these trying circumstances to take the oath of allegiance; and he commenced to practice in the courts which the commanding general had created. From that time forward he was not only regarded as a loyal man, but as an exemplar of loyalty—"faithful among the faithless found."

This, sir, was at a time when a profession of loyalty had its inconveniences, its perils, and its dangers. We were there with a feeble force. The enemy was at no great distance. We were apprehensive that we could retain possession of the city but for a few weeks. None of the gentlemen who have been since loud in profession of devotion to the Union ventured to come forward to take the oath of allegiance, because they did not suppose that we had a sufficient force there to protect them. He came forward and continued to practice in the courts during my sojourn in the city.

But that is not all. Shortly after we went there he was the nucleus around which the Union sentiment of the city gathered. Public meetings were held in various wards, and the claimant was among the most prominent speakers at those meetings in his profession of unconditional attachment to the Union, and I have heard him present remarks to these meetings which I would have hesitated myself to present. I have heard him avow, before the proclamation of the President was issued, the necessity of issuing a proclamation of emancipation for the purpose of crippling this rebellion. He avowed in New Orleans very similar principles to those the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] has avowed upon this floor; and during our continuance in the city I never heard his loyalty questioned for one instant. He took the same position with Mr. Hahn, and the same position with Mr. Durand; and was one of the leading Union men in that city.

I know in these days it is exceedingly difficult to define loyalty; but according to any definition I can understand of it, I can say to this House that I believe him to be as loyal a man as I am myself, or any member upon this floor.

I should not have obtruded these observations upon the House had not the loyalty of that gentleman been called in question. I supposed that this question would turn upon the legal merits of the election; and as I am now convinced, I shall be disposed certainly to vote against the claim of the gentleman to a seat; but I was unwilling to sit still here when I was appealed to by the chairman of the Committee of Elections and not present to the House the evidences in my possession that the claimant is a thorough-going and unconditional Union man.

Mr. DAWES. I only desire five minutes myself, but it is well known I cannot call the previous question against the members of my own committee, and therefore I yield the floor to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GANSON.]

Mr. GANSON. It was my intention to say nothing upon this occasion; but since the disclosures which have been made to this House by the applicant from the first congressional district from Louisiana relative to the condition of the people of that district, and the treatment they have received at the hands of the military governor of that district, I deem it not only right, but suitable, as a member of the Committee of Elections, that I should state very briefly the considerations which induced me to cooperate in recommending to the House the adoption of the resolution reported by the committee; and also to express my regrets, if the recommendation of the committee is sustained by this House, that the action of that military governor will result in disfranchising as loyal a district in my judgment as there is in the Union.

As has been stated by the applicant, and as it also appears by the report of the committee, the 2d day of November, 1863, was the day designated by the laws of Louisiana for the regular election. A year ago an election was permitted in the first and second congressional districts of Louisiana by this same military governor, and he supervised that election. It resulted in sending two Representatives to the Thirty-Seventh Congress, and they were admitted by a vote of this House to their seats, and they participated for the remainder of the session in the legislation of the country. There had nothing occurred since to change the loyal character of that people. Patriotism and loyalty had been increasing there more and more daily; people had resumed their peaceable avocations; the courts were opened, and justice was unobstructed. An election of this character having taken place under the supervision of the military governor a year ago, the people, the rightful source of all power, thought they would take upon themselves to initiate an election. And I wish the House to bear in mind that this was an election not only for Representatives in Congress, but also for State and local officers. A convention was called; it assembled; they appointed a committee of nine to wait upon this military governor. They did wait upon him; they respectfully asked him to cooperate with them in their efforts to initiate a popular election; and he not only declined to do that, but absolutely forbade the people to hold an election within his jurisdiction. That jurisdiction extended over this congressional district, save two parishes, which were outside of the lines of the city. The polls, by reason of this arbitrary, unwarranted action of this military governor, were not opened within the limits of the city of New Orleans. They were opened in the two precincts outside. The people attended the polls according to the laws of the State of Louisiana, cast their votes, and in one parish, as appeared before the committee, the applicant received one hundred and fifty-six votes; and those are all, so far as the committee knows, that he did receive within his congressional district. As a member of that committee I could not conscientiously recommend that the gentleman should be admitted to a seat upon the floor of this House as a Representative. I therefore, simply and solely upon the ground that the gentleman had not, in my judgment, a sufficient constituency to entitle him to a seat upon this floor, concurred in recommending the passage of the pending resolution. But, sir, while I do that, I desire at the same time to express my decided disapproval of the usurpations of this military governor.

It may be said by some gentlemen, and the idea has been thrown out, that the reason why an election was not held was that the State had not been redistricted. I ask the House to bear in mind that these persons who called upon this military governor for permission to hold an election not only desired to hold an election for Representatives in Congress but also for State and local officers, and if the military governor had given as a reason that the State was not redistricted, it would have been a mere subterfuge, and therefore he did not place himself upon that ground. I do not subscribe to the doctrine that an election, even for Representatives in Congress, would have been illegal without redistricting the State, because it should be borne in mind that under the old apportionment the State of Louisiana was entitled to only four Representatives in Congress, and under the new apportionment to five; and if the people of the State saw fit to send only four Representatives when they were entitled to five no other State could complain, and their four Representatives would be entitled in my judgment to their seats. But it is enough for me to know that this military governor did not base his refusal to allow the election to be held upon that ground. The record shows that he had become, between the date of the election which he permitted and that which he prohibited, a convert to this new, pernicious, and revolutionary doctrine that by reason of the rebellion the relations of the State of Louisiana to this Union had been changed, and that she stood in the attitude of a conquered province.

Now, sir, I state this upon proof which is entirely satisfactory to my own mind. The House will recollect that this military governor has an attorney general, "the law officer of the crown" in that locality. This attorney general was president of the State Union association of the city of New Orleans, and was the president of the meeting which passed resolutions to this effect:

"Resolved further, That in the opinion of the committee the constitution and government of the State of Louisiana were and remain overturned and destroyed by the rebellion and subsequent conquest of the State, and that until a new constitution shall have been adopted by the loyal citizens of the State no election for members of a State Legislature can or ought to be held.

"Resolved, That we approve a registration of loyal citizens with the view of providing for the election of a constitutional convention; that in our judgment this is the only true and just path to the restoration of civil government in the State, and that no unauthorized body of men should be permitted by the military governor to supersede and set at defiance his orders.

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the military governor, and his action on the subject earnestly and respectfully requested."

This same Attorney General Durand was also the commissioner of registration, and, under the rules and regulations which he prescribed for voting, any person who had been a resident of Louisiana for six months was entitled to vote, although the constitution of the State prescribes that no person shall vote who has not been a resident for twelve months. This position was officially approved by the military governor. Well, now, we see why it is that this military governor would permit an election in 1862 and would not permit one in 1863. It was because he had become a convert to this revolutionary and pernicious doctrine that the constitution and laws of the State of Louisiana had been abrogated by reason of the rebellion, and that that State stood to the Union in the attitude of a conquered Territory. But, sir, if that were so, admitting it to be a Territory of the United States, what clause is there in the Constitution of the United States which confers upon Brigadier General Shepley the power of determining whether or not the loyal people of Louisiana shall exercise the elective franchise? The committee say in their report that they were unable to ascertain whether General Shepley's action was authorized by any superior power or has been subsequently sanctioned by his superiors. I care not whether any superior authority undertook to give him power to do that which he did. If any superior should so undertake it would only present a case of higher wrong. And, sir, I hope that this House, if they sustain the action of the committee in this case—and I hope they will not sustain that action unless they are bound in conscience to do it—I hope they will not permit the action of this military officer to go unrebuked. For one I will not silently acquiesce in any such action.

Sir, I believe that the Union is to-day, in view of the Constitution, unbroken, and that the constitution and laws of each and every one of the rebellious States stand unimpaired, and that the ordinances of secession are null and void, and that neither Congress nor the Executive nor any military officer can abrogate the constitutions of such States, and that they stand beyond and above every other power, save that of the loyal people of the States respectively, who alone can change the fundamental laws of the several States in convention convened for that purpose.

I have always, at all times and under all circumstances, advised and advocated the prosecution of this war until the rebels will bow their necks to the yoke of the Federal Constitution. I propose to continue to do that. But whenever the rebellion is suppressed within any State or portion of the State, and the people become loyal, so that the civil authorities can resume their sway, I propose to treat them as citizens belonging to the Union, having the rights of citizens which are guaranteed to them by the Constitution, that whenever they will submit to the Constitution and the enforcement of the laws all contention and strife should cease. I do not believe it is the proper purpose or object of this war to propagate ideas by the sword. I would leave that to the march of morality and of civilization, and not to the sword and to the tread of armies.

I believe that whenever any portion of the country that has been in rebellion will submit to the Constitution and the laws the people thereof should have their constitutional rights restored to them; and if there are any institutions in that portion of the country which the people desire to remove it should be done by a change of constitution in a peaceable and proper way.

I am in favor of giving a cheerful and cordial support to the Administration in bringing every foot of our territory within the jurisdiction of the Constitution; and when we have done that I am opposed to the suffrages of the people being subjected to the control of the military power.

It is for the reason that the people within the first congressional district of Louisiana were forcibly prohibited from voting, and that solely, that I believe this applicant should be excluded from a seat in this House. I desire at the same time to protest most earnestly against the action of this military governor. But I should be sorry to see this applicant, whom I believe to be a truly loyal man, sent to his home to bear the tidings to the loyal people of Louisiana, who have been subjected to everything, suffered everything, and lost everything by reason of their adherence to the Union, that he was not only by this Congress excluded from a seat as their Representative, but that the arbitrary action of the governor, which resulted in disfranchising them, had met the approval of the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

Mr. SCHENCK. For the purpose of bringing to a conclusion this matter, which now stands in the way of the House going to the consideration of what I believe to be more important business, I now demand the previous question.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw that demand, to enable me to make an explanation of my course in giving my assent to the report of the Committee of Elections.

Mr. SCHENCK. I should be as willing to yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin as to any other gentleman in this House, but I cannot, in consistency with what I believe to be my duty, withdraw my demand for the previous question.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his motion to enable me to offer a merely verbal amendment to the resolution reported by the Committee of Elections.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentleman has a merely verbal amendment to offer which will meet with the approval of the Committee of Elections, I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. MALLORY. My amendment is simply to strike out the word "not" in the resolution. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. That would just reverse the resolution of the committee. I insist upon my demand for the previous question.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw his demand for the previous question, to enable me, as a member of the Committee of Elections, to make an explanation.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentleman desires to make an explanation personal in its character, and the gentleman from Massachusetts is willing that it shall come out of his hour, he can make his explanation during his time after the previous question has been seconded.

Mr. DAWES. I do not want five minutes, and I am willing to yield the gentleman from Wisconsin a portion of my time if the House has no objection.

No objection was made.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman from Wisconsin does not wish to occupy too much time I will now yield to him.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I do not think I shall occupy more than from five to ten minutes at most. I wish simply in justice to myself to explain the process by which I arrived at the result set forth in the resolution reported by the Committee of Elections.

In the first place I shall dispose of the legal objections that arose against this election in Louisiana. I believe all the members of the committee, certainly as far as I heard an expression of opinion, concurred in the idea that the State of Louisiana had never been out of the Union, and that by her own act she could not go out. They regarded the time during which the rebellion held its sway over the State as so much time practically annihilated, and that when the jurisdiction of the United States was reestablished she stood precisely as she did prior to the act of secession.

The United States were bound to protect every loyal citizen of Louisiana against this very rebellion; they were bound to prevent the oppressions and exactions of which the rebel authorities were guilty. This, however, the United States had been unable to do, and thousands of loyal citizens of that State had suffered in consequence. But for us not only to fail in that duty of protection, but, taking advantage of our own wrong, to make that failure an excuse for robbing them of their property or their rights as citizens of a State, would be in the highest degree unjust.

There was the further legal objection that, although the right of electing members of Congress remained, still, by the utter destruction of the State organization, the machinery for conducting elections and making returns was wanting. This is easily answered. The right to elect a member of Congress grows out of the Constitution and laws of the United States. It is proper for State Legislatures to regulate elections, and to provide some safe mode of determining who has the majority of legal votes. But regulations of this nature are at all times mere matters of convenience, and Congress have always in cases of disputed elections looked to the actual majorities, and admitted members not only without the regular certificates of State officers but against such certificates. I conclude, therefore, that if by any competent proof it had been established that Mr. Field had actually received a majority of votes in his district there is no legal impediment growing out of want of State organization to giving him a seat.

The next objection is scarcely more tenable. It is that by the apportionment of the last Congress Louisiana was entitled to one additional Representative, and having failed to redistrict cannot have even her original four. This additional Representative was assigned to her not as a burden, but as a right which she had, and of which she might avail herself. If a State refuses to acknowledge her right to the full number awarded by Congress I can hardly see upon what principle you can say that she forfeits her right to send the smaller number.

In this instance, the failure or refusal of her Legislature to redistrict was an affirmation in the law of the old districts, and although under the apportionment of Congress each district was entitled to more in the way of representation, still it did not lose what was assigned to it. The greater right always contains the less.

I base my assent to the resolution solely upon the ground that there was, in fact, no election; that the arbitrary order of the military governor, enforced by bayonets, had prevented the vast majority of the legal and loyal electors from voting; and therefore the claimant was not entitled to his seat.

I dissented from the mild language in which the conduct of that military official was censured in the report. This was not the case of a military interference under pretense of regulating the election; it was not the administering of an oath of loyalty; but it was the arbitrary exercise of brute power to prevent citizens avowedly loyal from being represented in this Congress. It was done in violation of the Constitution, in violation of the rights of an independent State, and in utter and wilful contempt of the wishes and interests of a large body of loyal citizens, who had suffered all and braved all for their country.

Only about five hundred persons were allowed to vote, but the greater part of the district was absolutely coerced from voting; there therefore could have been no election, and the claimant is not entitled to his seat.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to occupy more than a few moments of the time of the House. The Committee of Elections were unanimous in the resolution which they reported. No gentleman has ventured to object to the adoption of that resolution. I beg pardon, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] did. With that exception no member has objected to the resolution.

Mr. MALLORY. I learn from the chairman of the Committee on Elections, if I understand his report correctly, that the committee object to the admission of Mr. Field only for the reason that he did not receive the number of votes sufficient, in their estimation, to entitle him to a seat upon this floor. The legality of the election is unquestioned. The only objection the committee urges is that he did not receive votes enough. Now, I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts what number of votes that committee has decided to be sufficient to entitle a man to a seat upon this floor?

Mr. DAWES. I was saying that the committee were unanimous in the conclusion they came to; that they were unanimous in the resolution they agreed to report. But in reference to the report, no member of the committee, except the gentleman who made the report, is responsible for the statements contained in it. The committee were entirely unanimous upon the resolution; the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. UPSON] having one reason therefor, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWN] having another, and my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. GANSON] holding perhaps still another reason. But they all agreed that the resolution should be reported, and by no process of reasoning could they come to the conclusion that the gentleman from Louisiana was entitled to a seat upon this floor. This covers the whole merits of the case, and it is quite unnecessary for me, or for any member of the committee, in the full discharge of the duty imposed upon him, to go further than to show that that gentleman is not entitled to a seat here.

The reason why the gentleman is not entitled to a seat seems to be briefly this: he has neither law nor a constituency to sustain him. He has not law to support him for this reason: the Constitution of the United States has provided, in article one, section four, that the Congress of the United States may prescribe the mode of holding an election for Representatives in Congress. The Congress of the United States has prescribed the manner of holding this election. That manner has not been conformed to in any respect in the State of Louisiana, and therefore thus far and to that extent the claimant has no law upon his side. Neither did the election conform to the statute of Louisiana, for the reason that the votes were not cast in conformity to law, nor were they counted or canvassed in conformity to law. So, then, the law, so far as that prescribed the manner, the method, and the requirements of an election, is totally against this gentleman. Now, he had no constituency. By that I mean that there was no election, even in that which the claimant calls his district, which can be considered by any sort of rule a proper and just election—a choice by the Union voters of that district, admitting that the old first congressional district was the proper district in which the election should have been held.

In order to show that this gentleman was the choice of the legal voters of that district, you must show that the legal voters of that district had an opportunity to express their choice. I do not mean to say that a man may not be elected to Congress, under some circumstances, with only one hundred and fifty-six votes, the total number polled for this claimant. But when a man in a congressional district of one hundred and twenty-three thousand inhabitants, and ten thousand legal voters, actually receives only one hundred and fifty-six votes, there are almost ten thousand who have not expressed their choice. If they choose to stay away from the polls they are taken to acquiesce in what the one hundred and fifty-six men do at the polls. Under such circumstances it is right and proper to take the vote actually cast as the vote of the district. But when nearly ten thousand of the voters are found to have been prevented from appearing at the polls, and you can bring no charge against them that they voluntarily remained away, they cannot be held to have acquiesced in what one hundred and fifty-six men may have done. Their mouths were stopped, and they were not permitted to protest.

Without stopping for one moment to discuss the propriety or right of military interference here, I have to say that the evidence was abundant that armed men prevented nine thousand eight hundred and forty-four voters in that district from expressing their choice at the polls. By what process of reasoning, then, can it be said that one hundred and fifty-six men who were permitted in one corner of the district, in the parish of St. Bernard, a fraction of the district, to go to the polls and express their choice, expressed the choice of the remainder of the district, and that that remainder acquiesced in what the one hundred and fifty-six men did?

'This is the state of the case, and this is all I desire to say.

The question being on the resolution reported by the Committee of Elections,

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOLMAN called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to; there being, on a division—yeas 85, noes 48.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SMITH. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That A. B. Field be allowed the mileage and pay that he would have been entitled to had he been a member of this Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee of Elections. [Cries of "Oh, no; withdraw it."]

Mr. SCHENCK. The resolution being objected to, I must insist on my motion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I submit that this is a question of privilege, and has been so held by the House on former occasions.

The SPEAKER. Such a resolution, at the close of a contested-election case, has not been held to be a question of privilege.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am willing that the resolution should be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. COX. I hope my colleague will allow the matter to be disposed of now.

Mr. SCHENCK. Well, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is received, and referred to the Committee of Elections.

CONSCRIPTION BILL.

The question was then taken on Mr. SCHENCK's motion, and it was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWES in the chair,) and proceeded as a special order to the consideration of Senate bill No. 36, to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863.

Mr. STROUSE. I move to amend the thirteenth section by adding after the words "United States" the words "and of the State courts of record;" so that it will read:

That the following persons be, and they are hereby, excepted and exempted from the provisions of this act, and shall not be liable to military duty under the same, to wit: such as are rejected as physically or mentally unfit for the service; the Vice President of the United States, the judges of the various courts of the United States and of the State courts of record, &c.

I desire to say but a few words in support of this amendment. In the section of the original bill the exemptions are very few, including the Vice President of the United States and the judges of the courts of the United States. My amendment adds to the exemption list the judges of the State courts of record. In my opinion it is necessary that the amendment should be ingrafted on this bill. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, speaking yesterday of the subject of exemptions, gave as a reason why the Vice President and judges of United States courts should be exempted that in some cases great public inconvenience might arise from their being drafted.

Well, Mr. Chairman, we are in the midst of a great war. We know that, at present, everything must give way to the demands of the military service; but I think that this committee will concur with me in saying that notwithstanding the fact that we have a tremendous rebellion on our hands we still believe in the old and, I trust, never-to-be-forgotten doctrine, that in this Republic the military must ever be subordinate to the civil power. We are here the Representatives of loyal States and Commonwealths, sovereignties in themselves, having their own constitutions and laws, and their courts of justice where matters are adjudicated, involving large amounts of property as well as the lives and liberties of citizens. The power to decide these questions rests in the judiciary. I believe that the judiciary of the country should be, and is, above suspicion, and that it should not be annoyed or interfered with by anything like a conscription or draft.

I offer this amendment because it is my firm conviction that to take away the judges of courts of record or even to make them pay commutation money would be something of a degradation to them, and would have a tendency to bring our judiciary into contempt.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understand the amendment now offered to exempt the judges of the various courts of record in the various States. It has been impossible for me to hear the remarks of the gentleman who proposed it. This Hall is so miserably adapted for hearing, so much worse than the old Hall of the House of Representatives, that it is almost impossible to ascertain what is going on in it. Without having heard the remarks, therefore, in support of the amendment, yet understanding the amendment to be as I have stated, I have a single remark to make in reply.

A great many very plausible reasons and a great many specious arguments may be adduced in support of amendments of this kind; but if the House listen to such arguments and begin to ingraft them upon this bill it is impossible to say where they will end.

It will be observed that this bill does not exempt the heads of the several bureaus of the Departments of the Government. It does not exempt members of Congress, either in the House or the Senate; it does not exempt the sheriffs of counties in the States, nor the prosecuting attorneys, nor any of the various official personages whose services at home are necessary for carrying on the various branches of the State and Federal Governments.

Now, sir, if you begin to exempt these officers on the ground of the inconvenience of their absence from their offices, if you listen to the many specious reasons that may be urged in favor of the exemption of all these various classes of persons, you will have rendered the bill, like the present law, worthless almost for the purpose of raising troops to meet the enemy. Such is the character of the existing law that it has been found almost a failure in its practical operations in consequence of the large number of exemptions provided for.

We have cut off a large class contained in this so-called humanitarian section of the existing law; and we have done it with as much regard as we properly could to making this bill as stringent as possible, and as effective for the purpose of raising men to fill our armies, of raising a force sufficient to put down this rebellion, which, without some such stringent provision, we shall not succeed in.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The thirteenth section was read, as follows:

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That section two of the act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863, shall be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out all of said section after the word "enacted," and inserting the following, to wit: that the following persons be, and they are hereby, excepted and exempted from the provisions of this act, and shall not be liable to military duty under the same, to wit: such as are rejected as physically or mentally unfit for the service; the Vice President of the United States, the judges of the various courts of the United States, the heads of the various Executive Departments of the Government, the Governors of the several States, and all persons actually in the military or naval service of the United States at the time of draft, or who have been in such service for the term of two years during the present war, and been honorably discharged therefrom; and no persons but such as are herein excepted shall be exempt.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move to amend section thirteen by striking out, commencing in line ten, the words, "the Vice President of the United States, the judges of the various courts of the United States, the heads of the various Executive Departments of the Government, the Governors of the several States." I understood the chairman of the Military Committee a moment ago to say that all the able-bodied men who can be obtained are wanted to put down this rebellion, and that exemptions should be suspended as far as possible. Well, sir, it is as much the duty of the Vice President of the United States, the judges of the various courts, the heads of the Executive Departments, and the Governors of the several States to aid in the work of suppressing the rebellion as it is the duty of the private citizen. I am opposed to the discrimination.

When Senators and members of Congress are not exempted from the draft why is it that the Vice President and these other officers are exempted? They are holding high positions under the Government, and they are as able to pay their $300 for the support of the armies of the United States as any other set of men in the country. They receive their employment and pay from the Federal Government, and why should they not contribute to the putting down of the rebellion?

Now, sir, take a different class of society. When the farmers, the mechanics, the merchants, the lawyers, the physicians look over this law, will they not have good cause to complain that these men holding high offices and receiving large salaries are exempt? When I look over this body I see that perhaps two thirds the members here are not exempt by reason of age.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move to amend the amendment by striking from it the judges of the courts of the United States. My object in moving this amendment is to limit down the exemptions to the smallest possible number consistent with the good of the Government. I suppose the amendment just offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania will hardly carry in this House, because it seems to me to be inconsistent with the requirements of the public service to say that the Vice President and the various heads of Departments should be compelled to go into the military service, but I see no good reason why the judges of the several courts of the United States should not be compelled to go into the military service of the United States, if drafted, or pay their commutation, as well as the judges of the State courts. I therefore offer the amendment I have submitted.

Mr. ROSS. I am opposed to the amendment to the amendment, and in favor of the amendment as originally offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CORFORD.] I have been unable to learn any good reason why the Vice President of the United States, heads of Departments, and the judges of the several courts of the United States should be exempted from the performance of military duties under the provisions of this bill. It is said that there is but one Vice President of the United States, and that it is inconvenient for him to leave his duty to enter the military service. There are two provisions in this bill of which these individuals may avail themselves. In the first place they may procure a substitute, and in the second place they may pay the $300 commutation. I want to know whether the poor man, who is unable to raise $300, shall be torn ruthlessly from a helpless family and forced into this war whether he is willing to go or not when these individuals who are receiving high salaries shall be exempted from furnishing a substitute or paying the commutation money. I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, so that all citizens shall stand upon a dead level in regard to this matter.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected. The amendment was then rejected.

Mr. KERNAN. I move to amend section thirteen, line seventeen, by adding after the word "therefrom" as follows:

And ministers of the gospel of every denomination who devote themselves exclusively to their profession, and who do not engage in any trade, secular business, or profession.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that that amendment will commend itself to the committee. I trust that it will meet with no opposition from members of the Committee on Military Affairs. I submit that it is right in itself that the avocations and duties of ministers of the gospel are inconsistent with those of soldiers; that their avocations and duties are to reconcile differences between individuals, to make all men more charitable, to inculcate peace, and that their character should not be associated with that of men who take part in war.

Again, sir, I submit that this bill, unless we adopt this amendment, will put us in an improper position before the world. It will not give us many men or much money, and yet it makes us stand before the world as declaring that we are so pressed for men to carry on this war that we are compelled to draft ministers of the gospel; that we are compelled, although we are a civilized people, to make them take part in a war, and that a civilized people believe that heathen nations have not been accustomed to take their priests, or those who occupy the same position that ministers of the gospel do in Christian countries, and compel them to go to war. I believe that they do not allow them to go to war. The practice has been in all civilized nations that those who minister at the altar of God, and whose duty is to inculcate peace and good will, shall not take part in war; that they shall not stain their hands with human blood.

Mr. Chairman, this is not a party question. I do not want this House to stand where this bill would have them without my amendment. And when the war is successfully closed I trust that we shall have churches and ministers useful instrumentalities in again bringing about a proper state of feeling between the citizens of the various portions of the Union, and that we shall not have upon our statute-book a law compelling these men to take part really, practically, in this war, or theoretically by furnishing substitutes.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am opposed to the amendment. In the first place, a minister of the gospel really useful to his congregation or society will find no difficulty in getting the commutation money provided for by this bill to exempt him from being drafted.

I am perhaps more fortunate than some members upon this floor in this respect, that not a single minister in my district has ever written to me a line or said to me a word intimating a wish to be exempt from liability, with his neighbors, to be drafted to go into the Army during this rebellion. The ministers of my district believe that this war is a Christian war, and that it is the Christian and religious duty of every good Union man, every God-fearing man, although he may carry the Bible in one hand, to take the sword in the other, and fight this hellish rebellion until it is crushed. The chaplain of my old regiment, a most godly man, and a man of great dignity, has resigned his chaplaincy and gone into the fighting line, and he is now a major in a new regiment which I had the good fortune to raise recently. He is a fair type of the godly ministers in my district, and I think of my State. It is a religious duty they take upon themselves, and which they believe is resting upon them, to engage actively in this war.

It seems to me it comes with ill grace from that side of the House, who have been moving to strike out the exemption of the Vice President and the judges of courts, to now seek to ingraft upon this bill a provision which shall exempt the whole class of ministers of the gospel in the United States from this draft. Why, sir, what will their poor constituents, those God-fearing and excellent men down on the Five Points in the city of New York say to them when you announce to them that you have exempted all the ministers of the United States and have not exempted them?

Mr. THAYER. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment. I move the amendment for the purpose of offering a few observations upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York. In my opinion the proposition of the gentleman from New York is eminently just and proper. If we are to make a law which is to be susceptible of execution and which shall carry with it that moral force which shall render it effective, we must make a law the discrimination of which shall be apparently just to the people. I think it highly proper that clergymen should be exempt from bearing arms, not that they have a right, as a class, to claim any such privilege, but because, as I believe, it would be for the interest of the community and promotive of public morality that that class of men who are actually engaged in the discharge of ministerial and religious duties, whose principles and practices are opposed to the shedding of human blood, should not be compelled by law to take up arms and engage in actual warfare. We all know that this class of persons in the loyal States are among the most loyal and among the truest citizens of the Government. I know no one of them who would not make any sacrifice which is necessary for the preservation of this Government, and the putting down of this rebellion; but I know there is a unanimous sentiment among a large class of people that the interests of religion demand their exemption.

It is a false notion which is suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, that this exemption is claimed upon any personal ground. I know of no respectable clergyman who would refuse to go into the ranks if that were necessary to vindicate the authority of their country. Their opinion is founded upon the highest and holiest ground, upon the necessity of retaining at home that small class of individuals who are engaged in bringing up the youth of the land, in celebrating the ordinances of the churches, and in all those various religious duties which are of so much importance to the preservation of a sound state of religious opinion and the foundations of society. For one I believe in that opinion; for one I believe, if you refuse this exemption, you will not get out of all the clergymen of the United States an additional corporal's guard in the Army. If this amendment is refused it will be the first time, I say it confidently, in which any nation on the face of the earth has ever made a conscription law which included the clergymen of the country in the classes who are to bear arms.

Now, sir, I do not stand here to plead for clergymen as a class; but I do stand here to express my opinion in favor of the proposition to exempt clergymen, in favor of public morality and of religion. We should not disregard their claims. Let me say to members of this committee that they are claims which, in our present position as a nation, we cannot afford to disregard. We should remember while voting on this question the high character of these claims. We should remember who it is that has said, "Them that honor me I will honor, and they that despise me shall be lightly esteemed."

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to exempting ministers of the gospel from their share of the duty of putting down this rebellion. It is a general belief among a large part of the people of this country, both North and South, that the most pestiferous class of human beings—those who have fomented secession at the South and disunion at the North—have been the clergymen. And they are still fomenting hate, ill will, and unkindness among the people. And now gentlemen come here and say that their profession forbids them to engage in the shedding of blood, and that therefore they should be exempt from military service. Sir, I cannot recognize that as any argument for such exemption.

Mr. GRINNELL. I ask the gentleman from Ohio whether the proposition to exempt clergymen did not come from his own side of the House, from a Democratic Representative from New York, the gentleman from the Utica district?

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman suppose, Mr. Chairman, that I care what side it came from?

Mr. GRINNELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. It does not make any difference to me, Mr. Chairman, if a proposition be right or if it be wrong, where it came from. I stand upon the intrinsic merits of the proposition itself. "Is it right or is it wrong?" is the only question that I ask.

Mr. GRINNELL. A new-born saint!

Mr. COX. I am opposed to this class legislation. I cannot recognize any difference between ministers of the gospel and men belonging to any other profession. After all it is nothing but a business, and in the matter of allegiance every man, whatever may be his business, owes his allegiance to his country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KELLEY. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last two words. I oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KERNAN,] but for reasons very different from those which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] has assigned. I am against exempting clergymen from liability to military service. I do not want to put into this bill an insult to their patriotism. No class of men in my State has been more free or prompt to respond to the call of the country than clergymen. I remember one instance that will serve to illustrate this. At the close of the three months' term of service the lieutenant colonel of a Pennsylvania regiment was invited by our Governor to reorganize his regiment. In response to the invitation he said, "No; but I will name a man for the colonelcy, and will be glad to aid him and serve under him as lieutenant colonel. Give us our little chaplain as colonel. He was at the head of the regiment in every hour of danger and in every fight."

The clergymen do not ask to be exempted. I have not had a letter from a single one in the State of Pennsylvania asking that his class shall be exempted from draft. I have, on the other hand, had a letter from the good and pious bishop of the Episcopal church of my diocese asking that the $300 commutation clause be retained, so that those clergymen whose conscientious scruples may prevent them from entering the active arena of war may be honorably exonerated from service. Beyond the wish for the retention of that clause no Pennsylvania clergyman has made known his wishes to me on the subject.

I remember that during one of the midnight debates of the last session of the last Congress a ribald attack was made upon the clergymen of the country, and a note was sent to me from the gallery by a Pennsylvania clergyman, Rev. J. Addison Whitaker, stating the number of clergymen who had left their prosperous churches and large congregations to serve as privates and non-commissioned officers in the cavalry brigade to which he was attached. It was, if my memory serves me, five who were then on duty.

Let us not, Mr. Chairman, by incorporating such a clause as this in the bill, give to the other side of the House the chance to appeal to the prejudice of those who live by manual labor by saying: "True, the proposition was made by a member of our party, but they were in the majority; they controlled the legislation of the House; and they exempted this petted class." Nor am I willing to fling into the face of the clergymen of the country a taunt by expressing in the body of this bill a doubt of their courage, manhood, or patriotism. Some of them now command Pennsylvania regiments; others have done so; and all have proved themselves brave and able soldiers. Let our laws recognize their services, and not disparage them by treating them as less than men who recognize and are willing to perform their duty to a bleeding country.

Mr. KERNAN. I do not desire, Mr. Chairman, to say one single word on this or on any other measure to that small class of gentlemen who, in legislating on questions like this or on any other question looking to the welfare of the country, can only see what side of the House it came from, who are afraid that they will be caught voting for something proposed by some gentleman who does not agree with them on all questions. I think that if we are true to our duty we should come here to consult with one another, and, so far as we can, to agree on that which is wisest and best, no matter from what side of the House the proposition comes. I recognize the fact that there are many questions on which we are divided into parties, and that party prejudices and party views will control on them. But I trust that when the question is whether we shall stand forth the only Christian people who ever in this world made it the legal duty of their ministers of the gospel to march to the battle-field, while we are not short of men, I trust that when that question is before us there will be men enough to vote, as the gentleman from Ohio says, on the intrinsic merits of the proposition, and not on the circumstance of what member proposed it.

Mr. KELLEY withdrew his amendment.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to any amendment of this bill that shall relieve clergymen, or any other class of men, from the service of their country, when the welfare of that country demands their services. I agree with the eloquent gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] that we would be libeling the virtuous and patriotic clergymen of our country if we were to give this taunt to the world, exempting them from the draft. So far as regards the clergymen of my parish, I distinctly enter a protest against any such exemption; and I say to you that if a clergyman should object to standing the draft with his fellow-men I would suspect his piety as well as his patriotism.

Now, sir, in regard to the charge which fell from the lips of my colleague [Mr. Cox] I have simply to observe that I think Dr. Olds' church will rectify all the difficulties of which he complains. The clergymen of the country are charged by him with exciting to rebellion. Is that so? I direct the attention of that gentleman to a gallant colonel of an Ohio regiment—the brave Colonel Moody—one of the most pious as well as of the most patriotic citizens of our patriotic State, who never quails in the presence of an enemy, who is always proud to follow the standard of his country in the thickest of the fight, as his prayers, I trust, are as sincere as those of any other man on the altar of his God. Sir, I believe the voice of a majority of our clergymen would not be heard in this Hall claiming this paltry exemption. I protest against it, and I shall individually vote against it in whatever shape it comes.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to amend—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] withdraw his amendment to the amendment?

Mr. SPALDING. I withdraw it with a good deal of reluctance.

Mr. COX. I object to its being withdrawn. I oppose the amendment. Mr. Chairman, my colleague the other day made a speech in my absence, in which he impugned my loyalty and patriotism; and now he makes a slight attack upon me, and then withdraws his amendment, so as to cut off the chance of a reply. I submit to my colleague that that does not come up to that high courtesy which should distinguish him. My colleague thinks I am mistaken when I say that rebellion has been fomented by ministers of the gospel, South and North. My colleague said in his speech the other day that he had shaken hands with rebels on Johnson's island, and that he would rather shake hands with such rebels than with some men on this side of the House.

Mr. SPALDING. They were not clergymen.

Mr. COX. You referred, no doubt, to some gentlemen, your colleagues, on this side of the House.

Mr. SPALDING. I did, sir. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. Yes, I know you did. You were at home shaking hands with rebels. I was not here when you made that reference or I could have given you something more than mere words about loyalty and patriotism. I would have proved you to be a seditious man.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio will address the Chair.

Mr. COX. Yes, sir; I am coming to that, coming right to the preaching. [Laughter.] My colleague has been himself engaged, along with ministers of the gospel in his own district, singing anthems and glorifying old John Brown's sedition. [Laughter.] More than that, sir, my colleague was engaged again and again in Ohio in trying to break down the laws of the United States, and I can prove him from papers in my desk to be a seditious and revolutionist. He is a conspirator against the Federal Government.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to his colleague?

Mr. COX. Of course I cannot do so, in a five minute speech. He would have cut me off from reply to him. This is the first opportunity I have had to repel the assault of my colleague.

I can prove, Mr. Chairman, by papers in my hand, if I had time to do it, that the gentleman, along with these ministers who would now be exempted, have for years persistently rebelled against the Federal Government, have striven to stir up hate and revolution between the States, to imbroil them in conflict, and by violence to overturn laws which had been decided to be valid by the Supreme Court of the United States. You presided over a convention called for that purpose, and you are not the man, sir, to impugn my loyalty! I stood here fighting against secession and revolution, while you, in Ohio, during all that time, were alienating the sections and producing civil war by your insurrectionary and rebellious conduct.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. ARNOLD. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word of it; and I do it for the purpose of enabling me to say a word to the committee in regard to the importance of immediate and efficient action in regard to this bill. We are on the eve of the last and decisive campaign. While we are wasting time in this House in these discussions, in these attacks upon each other, and replies, I submit whether it is not better that we should perfect this bill and fill up the Army? Within less than thirty days a draft is ordered. It has been already twice postponed to await the action of Congress on this bill. We are about to enter upon a new campaign, the most important and decisive of all the campaigns since the rebellion broke out, a campaign which I trust is to end the rebellion. I wish I could impress upon the minds of the members of this committee the importance of adopting immediately the most efficient and stringent enrollment law which the ingenuity of the committee can devise for the purpose of speedily filling up the depleted ranks of the Republic. If disaster should befall our Army, in consequence of a failure to fill up the ranks, the responsibility will rest largely on this House.

I beg both sides of the House to allow these personal discussions to pass by until this bill is perfected and shall have been placed upon the statute-book, so that when our soldiers meet the rebels again we may have the means of making our victories decisive. Let us have a campaign like the last. One more campaign like the last and this rebellion is ended, and when it is ended we can meet and discuss these questions of difference between gentlemen and sections. Do not let us endanger our triumph by a failure to fill up our ranks.

Sir, my own State, I am proud to say, will fill up its quota without resort to the draft. No call has ever been made by the Executive of the United States for troops upon the State of Illinois that she has not immediately responded. I hold in my hand a statement showing that in every call that has been made during the present war, from the first call for seventy-five thousand men down to the late call of the President, Illinois has been in excess of her quota; at one time thirty thousand in excess, at another time over forty thousand in excess. I offered a resolution the other day which I was sorry the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] objected to, calling on the Secretary of War to furnish a statement showing what States have been in excess of and what behind their quotas. I have had prepared a statement showing the conduct of Illinois in that regard. She has always responded to more than was required of her, as she will continue to respond until this rebellion has been crushed out. The following is the statement to which I refer. I am proud to place it on our records:

Call.	Whole number.	Class.	Quota of Illinois.	Troops furnished.			Strength.

* Filled under the call of July 6, 1862.

Statement of Troops furnished by the State of Illinois under the several Calls.

Not counting enlistments in the Mississippi militia, and allowing for credits due from Illinois to other States, it is safe to adopt the above figures as a calculation upon the draft. This calculation, however, does not include returns of the recruiting service done in the past six months.

Upon the quotas of July and August, 1862, the Secretary of War allowed for an excess at that time of 16,978, although a much larger excess has since been found to have existed. And yet both these quotas—to an excess of 5,000 over the original total of both of them—were filled with three years' troops; which, by the rule of equivalents, would give 70,636 as the relative value of "three years' men" supplied where "nine months' men" were called for, or 110,000 as the whole product of those two calls, one three years' man being equal to four enlisted for nine months. When the quota for the late draft was made up, Illinois was found to be over 43,000 ahead of her quota.

Mr. GRINNELL. I oppose the amendment to the amendment, as I am not in favor of the exemption of clergymen from the draft; yet perhaps I ought almost to distrust my own judgment when I find myself advocating the same proposition as the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox,] although from different reasons, whose ethics and politics I most thoroughly abhor.

The gentleman from Ohio has seen fit to stigmatize the clergymen of the country as a class of pernicious instigators of sedition and revolution. Sir, I should like to inquire if there is a clergyman in this broad land, who has not hitherto abjured the obligations of religion and the claims of patriotism, who is opposed to standing in his place like a man and taking his chance under a conscription bill? I have no such acquaintance. Rather, to include them is regarded as a compliment to their patriotism, manhood, and religion.

I have no doubt the gentleman from Ohio may have found very uncomfortable friends among the clergymen of the West, and why? For the reason that many of them have most conscientiously apportioned their time and ministrations, giving one day in the week, the Sabbath, to the destruction of the devil and his works, and the other six days to the pestilent doctrines of pro-slavery sham Democracy. [Laughter.] This is the secret of the gentleman's ire against clergymen; that is the reason why he considers them pestiferous instigators of sedition; they do not belong to his party. No, sir, the clergymen of this country who are imbued with the pure spirit of Christianity are not second to any class of men in the land in their patriotism, and they ask no exemption from the draft. They joyfully take their chance with the rest of their countrymen in fighting to put down this rebellion.

Again, there is no clergyman whose ministrations are highly valued by his congregation who would not find parishioners ready to purchase his exemption should he be drafted and he would consent to remain at home. I speak for the clergymen of the West, with whom I have been more nearly identified, when I say that they have regarded fighting to put down this rebellion not alien to, but as a part of their Christianity. The bones of many of them who were beloved pastors now repose alongside of those of the private soldier beneath the soil of the South. Many of them are to-day immured in rebel prisons. Their children have gone into the Army by tens of thousands with the warm paternal benediction. Their sermons begin and end with the patriotism of the prophets, and when tried by a higher tribunal than this there will be found nothing inconsistent with the religion they profess; and so ardent is their love of country that they pray unceasingly in the ears of their congregation to the God of battles for success, and shout, "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon." [Laughter.]

Mr. ARNOLD withdrew his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to amend the amendment by adding the following:

Provided, Such ministers have not heretofore and will not in future preach politics.

Mr. Chairman, that seems to involve the only question of division in the committee. I believe, myself, with the gentlemen who have spoken on this question, that there are some ministers of the gospel that I would be willing to exempt from the draft. I respect a godly minister who makes preaching the gospel his whole duty; but I have no respect for that class of clergymen referred to by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox.] We have them in our community, intermeddlers, stirrers-up of strife and mischief. They ought to go to war; they are fitted for war; they are not fitted for peace; they are not proper men to preach the peaceful doctrines of the Christian religion; they are fighting men, and the Army needs them. The country and the Government are at stake, to use the cant expressions of the other side of the House, and these gentlemen ought to be willing to go and give some evidence of their fighting disposition against the enemies of the country for the purpose of restoring the Union. They are loyal men—they claim to be loyal men—and it is a fact that in every argument where we beat gentlemen on the other side they always turn around and say that we are disloyal men. That is the argument they resort to in every case where they are worsted in debate. These ministers preach in the same way. I want to see the ministers who are fighting men go to war, and that those who preach peace and good will shall remain at home.

Mr. GARFIELD. For the purpose of cutting off debate, which has wandered from the subject before the committee, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAWES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the Senate (No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and had made progress therein, but had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. GARFIELD moved that when the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union resumed the consideration of the bill the debate on the pending section shall be closed in one minute. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD moved that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWES in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of Senate bill No. 36, to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863.

The CHAIRMAN stated the question to be upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KERNAN.]

The amendment to the amendment was rejected; and then the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. DAWSON. I move to add the following:

Provided, That in assigning the quotas of troops hereafter to be raised by conscription credit shall be given to States and counties for such of their citizens as may have enlisted in the military organizations of other States for a period of three years or during the war, the same to be ascertained and determined by the Secretary of War.

Mr. Chairman, this provides that the counties and States furnishing troops which have entered into the military service from other States shall be credited to the States and counties from which they went and enlisted for three years or the war.

On a division there were—ayes 50, noes 64.

Mr. DAWSON demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. DAWSON and ORTU were appointed.

The amendment was disagreed to; the tellers having reported—ayes 65, noes 71.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I move to amend the thirteenth section by inserting, in line seventeen, after the word "therefrom," the following:

And all persons who from conscientious disbelief in the humanity, necessity, or eventual success of this war, are opposed to its further prosecution until an effort has been made and failed to end it by negotiation.

Were it in order to discuss this proposition—

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a point of order. Debate has been closed upon this section by order of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. The amendment explains itself.

Mr. BRANDEGEE called for tellers on the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. FERNANDO WOOD and Mr. SLOAN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 23, noes 103.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I move to amend this section, in line seventeen, by inserting after the word "therefrom," the words "and husbands of insane wives."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. COX. I move to amend by inserting after the word "therefrom" the following:

Any person having children under twelve years of age, and a wife so afflicted as to be unable to provide for herself and children and depending entirely on her husband for support.

Mr. ASHLEY. I demand tellers upon that amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. Cox and Mr. ELDRIDGE were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 39, noes 57.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. ROSS. I move to amend the section by adding thereto the following proviso:

Provided, however, That any poor person unable to pay $300 commutation who has a large family entirely dependent upon his daily labor for support shall not be forced against his will to enter the service.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by striking out of line sixteen the words "two years" and inserting "eighteen months."

The amendment was not agreed to.

No further amendments being offered to the thirteenth section, the Clerk read the fourteenth section, as follows:

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That section third of the act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863, and so much of section ten of said act as provides for the separate enrollment of each class, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and it shall be the duty of the board of enrollment of each district to consolidate the two classes mentioned in the third section of said act.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move to strike out that section.

Mr. ANCONA demanded tellers on the motion to strike out.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. A. MYERS and Mr. ANCONA were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 45, noes 60.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move to amend the section by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That the boards of examination of enrolled or drafted men are required to hold their examinations within each county in their respective enrollment districts.

Mr. A. MYERS. I suggest to the gentleman that he insert after the word "county" the words "at the county seats, where practicable."

Mr. COFFROTH. I accept the modification. I desire to say a single word in favor of the amendment. Under the last draft the provost marshal of the sixteenth district of Pennsylvania held his examinations where he resided; and I expect that was the case in almost every district. In my district the examination was held at Chambersburg. In my own county six hundred and eight persons were drafted, and most of those men had one hundred and twenty-five miles to travel to reach the place of examination. We had no railroads leading through the county to the place where the men were bound to report. They had to travel that distance in October over the bad roads which existed in the mountains, and the expense to the Government amounted on an average to seven or eight dollars a man. The expense of that single county in the district was over five thousand dollars. If the amendment is adopted the expense of holding the examinations in the different counties will not be more than one tenth what it would be by compelling the men to report at the place where the examinations are now held by the provost marshal.

Mr. GRINNELL. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to accept this modification: "in all counties where there are not less than five thousand inhabitants."

Mr. COFFROTH. Certainly I will accept that modification. Now, sir, as a general thing in Pennsylvania outside of the cities, drafted men have to undergo the hardship, fatigue, and expense of traveling long distances, sometimes from seventy-five to eighty miles, to appear before the board of enrollment. My own district is about two hundred miles in length, running west nearly to the Monongahela river, and down to the State of Maryland, at Carroll county. Some of the drafted men of my district have to cross five or six mountains in order to reach Chambersburg; whereas if the examinations had been held in the county towns it would have been accommodating to them and would have saved money to the Government.

I claim this out of justice to the people. We are legislating here not to impose greater burdens than are absolutely necessary upon the masses of the people. We are here to make the burden as light as possible upon their shoulders. This we can do by the adoption of the amendment which I have offered. At the same time it will effect a saving of expense to the Government. As a matter of justice, therefore, I ask the other side of the House to consider this amendment, and to adopt it.

Mr. STEVENS. May I ask my colleague to modify his amendment by making it read "authorized" instead of "required"?

Mr. COFFROTH. I would yield to my distinguished colleague, but I am afraid that if we used the word "authorized" the object would not be accomplished.

Mr. STEVENS. The great difficulty before was that the Secretary of War considered he was not authorized to order this to be done. I think my colleague had better accept the modification.

Mr. COFFROTH. Then I will accept my colleague's suggestion, and modify my amendment so as to make it read "authorized."

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend the amendment by inserting as a substitute for it the seventeenth section of the House bill, as follows:

That the Secretary of War is authorized, whenever in his judgment the public interest will be subserved thereby, to permit or require boards of examination of enrolled or drafted men to hold their examinations at different points within their respective enrollment districts, to be determined by him.

The Committee on Military Affairs was satisfied that there was much reason in asking that the law should be amended in this particular. The committee had the whole subject before it, and, after consideration, adopted this as the best form in which that authority or requirement could be placed. At first it was thought of providing that these sessions of the boards of enrollment should be held in the several districts, at the county seats, but there was found to be a difficulty about that.

There are States—Missouri and Kentucky, for example—where it might be impossible, or at least dangerous, to hold the sessions of the enrollment board at the county seats; and yet they may be within districts of country the greater part of which may be occupied by our troops or by loyal citizens. Then there are districts in which the county seat would not be the best place for the sessions of the enrollment board. This was felt to be the case in regard to the State of Michigan, a member from which State is on the committee. And yet there are large districts over which men must travel a great distance if the board is to sit in only one place. It was therefore thought advisable that instead of requiring absolutely that the sessions of the enrolling boards should be held at the several county seats it should be left to be determined, under the administration of the law, by the War Department, whether they are to be held at particular points, of such a prominent character, of such accessibility and convenience, as make them the most proper points. There are places where it may be well to hold sessions at more than one point; and on the other hand there are places where sessions at one point may do for two counties. I think the committee has put the matter in the best shape, all things considered; and therefore I hope the substitute will be adopted.

Mr. WINFIELD. I think that the question presented to the committee by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and by the substitute proposed by the chairman of the Military Committee, comes before us in this light: while it is conceded that perhaps some reformation of the evil complained of by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COFFROTH] is necessary and important, the question arises whether the local boards of enrollment are not better judges of the necessity of affording this relief than the Secretary of War can possibly be. It appears to me that the Secretary of War in the midst of his multifarious duties would not desire to assume the responsibility and trouble of determining with reference to each of these congressional districts where this authorization to change the place of holding the sessions of the board of enrollment is necessary. While I believe that he would act with as much impartiality and fairness as it would be possible for any officer to exercise with the vast amount of labor and responsibility which is resting on him, yet I have no idea, Mr. Chairman, that he desires to assume the increase of labor which the determination of these applications would devolve upon him; and I submit that the local boards, having a better knowledge of the localities and the interests of each particular community, are entirely competent to determine this question if it shall be left as a matter of choice or determination with them. I therefore prefer the original amendment.

The question being on the amendment to the amendment,

Mr. COFFROTH demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. COFFROTH and SCHENCK were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 57, noes 52.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was then adopted.

Mr. A. MYERS. I understand the section has been amended by incorporating the seventeenth section of the House bill into it. I now move to amend that section by adding the words "preferential county seats where practicable."

The amendment was disagreed to.

The fifteenth section was read, as follows:

SEC. 15. And he it further enacted, That any person who shall forcibly resist or oppose any enrollment, or who shall incite, counsel, encourage, or who shall conspire or confederate with any other person or persons forcibly to resist or oppose any such enrollment, or who shall aid or assist or take any part in any forcible resistance or opposition thereto, or who shall assault, obstruct, hinder, impede, or threaten any officer or other person employed in making or in aiding to make such enrollment, or employed in the performance of or in aiding in the performance of any service in any way relating thereto, or in arresting or aiding to arrest any spy or deserter from the military service of the United States, shall, upon conviction thereof in any court competent to try the offense, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both of said punishments in the discretion of the court. And in cases where such assaulting, obstructing, hindering, or impeding shall produce the death of such officer or other person, the offender shall be deemed guilty of murder, and, upon conviction thereof upon indictment in the circuit court of the United States for the district within which the offense was committed, shall be punished with death.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. I move to amend the section in the thirteenth line by striking out the words "competent to try the offense," and inserting the words "of civil jurisdiction." The object, Mr. Chairman, I have in offering that amendment is to test the sense of the committee as to the proper tribunal before which to try offenders under this section. It is well known among lawyers that the line of demarcation between the jurisdiction of courts which exercise military authority and those which by law have civil jurisdiction is not very clearly defined.

Mr. THAYER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether it is customary in his State to try criminal offenders before courts having civil jurisdiction.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. I will say to the gentleman that in Illinois our civil courts have criminal jurisdiction. They do there try men for criminal offenses in courts having civil jurisdiction. It is customary and it is law, if common law and common right are respected. We have no criminal courts there as contradistinguished entirely from civil courts, except such as have been created by recent legislation.

Mr. THAYER. It is entirely different in my State. Our courts having criminal jurisdiction have no civil jurisdiction.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. That is very likely. What I want to get at is to test the sense of the committee whether or not these cases arising for offending against this section shall be tried by the civil courts of the country as contradistinguished from the military, self-constituted courts.

Let me say, Mr. Chairman, that there is a growing distrust in my section of the country of the exercise of unwarranted and despotic authority by military courts. It is believed that they are trenching upon the authority of the civil courts of the country, that they have neither the learning nor the honesty of heart of the civil tribunals.

Now, sir, all strictly military offenses the military courts or authorities, in my opinion, should have jurisdiction of; but for all offenses not exclusively military in their character the civil courts having criminal jurisdiction ought to have exclusive jurisdiction. My object, therefore, is to prescribe by this amendment the duties devolving upon these several courts respectively. I want military courts to try military offenses, and I want civil courts (and that is the term I desire to use) to try offenses not exclusively military.

It will not be contended by anybody in reference to this section that the offenses defined in the section are military offenses. It is merely the citizens' opposition to the enrollment act because of deeming it wrong. It is not a military offense in any sense whatever.

Mr. Chairman, don't use your gavel for the present, for under the rule I am done.

The question being on the amendment,

Mr. W. J. ALLEN called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. GRINNELL and W. J. ALLEN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 48, noes 68.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend that section by striking it out, and inserting section fifteen of the House bill, as follows:

SEC. 15. And he it further enacted, That any person who shall forcibly resist or oppose any enrollment, or who shall incite, counsel, encourage, or who shall conspire or confederate with any other person or persons forcibly to resist or oppose any such enrollment, or who shall aid or assist or take any part in any forcible resistance or opposition thereto, or who shall assault, obstruct, hinder, impede, or threaten any officer or other person employed or aiding in making such enrollment, or employed or aiding in the performance of any service relating thereto, or in arresting or aiding to arrest any spy or deserter from the military service of the United States, shall, upon conviction thereof in any court competent to try the offense, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both of said punishments, in the discretion of the court; but nothing in this section contained shall be construed to relieve the party offending from liability under proper indictment or process for any crime against the laws of a State, committed by him while violating the provisions of this section.

It will be observed that there are some slight verbal alterations made in the section of the Senate bill, but that the sense is in no way changed except in one particular. The only material alteration is in the last sentence. If gentlemen will turn to page 9 they will find in the original section of the Senate bill this sentence:

And in cases where such assaulting, obstructing, hindering, or impeding shall produce the death of such officer or other person, the offender shall be deemed guilty of murder, and, upon conviction thereof, upon indictment in the circuit court of the United States for the district within which the offense was committed, shall be punished with death.

The Senate provided for two offenses: where they commit an offense in resisting the enrolling officer, and where they committed the crime of murder. It is possible that those who resist the draft may commit not only the crime of murder, but arson and other crimes. Therefore we struck out the whole of that and provided that "nothing in this section contained shall be construed to relieve the party offending from liability under proper indictment or process for any crime against the laws of a State, committed by him while violating the provisions of this section." They allow the men engaged in the mob resisting the draft to be proceeded against under the laws of the States for arson or any other crime.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I move the following amendment to the amendment:

Strike out the word "shall" in line twelve, section fifteen, and insert:

And any person who shall resist any draft of enrolled men into the service of the United States, or shall aid or counsel any person to resist such draft, or shall assault or obstruct any officer in making such draft, or in the performance of any service in relation thereto, or shall counsel any person to assault or obstruct any such officer, or shall counsel, aid, or willfully dissuade them from the performance of military duty, as required by law; all such persons shall be subject to summary arrest by the provost marshal, and shall be forthwith delivered to the civil authorities, and provides a penalty for the offenses set forth—a fine not exceeding $5,000 and an imprisonment not exceeding five years. That is for offenses of resistance to the enrollment. I observe by the twenty-fifth section that a penalty is provided for offenses of resistance to the draft of a fine not exceeding $500 and an imprisonment not exceeding two years. I think that the penalty for resisting the draft should be as great as that for resisting the enrollment. Most of the resistance has been to the draft and not to the enrollment. In my district the resistance has been by advising persons to escape over into the British provinces. There are many miles of border there, and drafted men have been induced to escape over them into a foreign country. The penalty in these cases should be as great as that for resistance to the enrollment. Therefore I hope that my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. Chairman, this section as it now stands

Mr. SCHENCK. I am inclined to think that the amendment ought to be adopted. It changes nothing.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope that that amendment will not be adopted. The provost marshal is to be made the judge whether a person counsels or dissuades from the draft. He, of his own caprice, whim, or will, is to imprison for what length of time he pleases. Then he is to turn over to the civil authority the person who, in his judgment, shall dissuade from the draft. Now, the dissuasion may be by a counselor-at-law, or by a father to his child, or by a wife to her husband. It is not an unnatural crime for a wife to dissuade her husband. I beg gentlemen to look at the provisions of this act, which seem to me to be sufficiently penal for any purpose whatever. It provides for punishing for obstructing the draft in the provost marshal's court or in some military court. It provides for another punishment in the civil courts of the States. And here steps in the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. RICE,] who, with the sanction of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, proposes that if a parent dissuades a child, a wife a husband, or a counselor a client to test the constitutionality of the law, he shall be arrested by the provost marshal and punished. I beg gentlemen to be content with the inflictions of this bill as they are. I beg them to stand upon the record as it is, and not add too much for human endurance.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Ohio to accept the amendment?

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The question, then, is upon the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the committee rise, with the view to close debate upon this section.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAWES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the Senate (No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and had made progress therein but had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that when the House again resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union all debate upon the pending section be closed in one minute after the committee resumes the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The House being divided, and there being—ayes 57, noes 73.

Mr. STILES demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWES in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of Senate bill No. 36, to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863; the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. RICE, of Maine, to the amendment offered by Mr. SCHENCK.

Mr. WADSWORTH demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WADSWORTH, and Mr. RICE of Maine, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 50, noes 59.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN moved to amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That arrests for offenses under this section shall be made only upon written authority issued from courts of civil jurisdiction, or upon view, with the liability under the common law for abuse in making arrests.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment being offered to the fifteenth section, the Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend by striking out the seventeenth section, as follows:

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That provost marshals, boards of enrollment, or any member thereof acting by authority of the board, shall have power to summon witnesses and enforce their attendance by attachment without previous payment of fees in any case pending before them, or either of them, and the same witness fees and costs shall be allowed as may be allowed in the district courts of the United States, and they shall have power to administer oaths and affirmations; and any person who shall swear or affirm falsely before any provost marshal or board of enrollment, or member thereof acting by authority of the board, or who shall, before any civil magistrate, swear or affirm falsely to any affidavit to be used in any case pending before any provost marshal or board of enrollment, shall, upon conviction, be fined not exceeding $500, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than twelve months.

And inserting in lieu thereof the eighteenth section, as reported by the committee, as follows:

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That provost marshals, boards of enrollment, or any member thereof acting by authority of the board, shall have power to summon witnesses in behalf of the Government, and enforce their attendance by attachment without previous payment of fees in any case pending before them, or either of them; and the fees allowed for witnesses attending under summons shall be five cents per mile for mileage, and no other fees or costs shall be allowed under the provisions of this section; and they shall have power to administer oaths and affirmations. And any person who shall willfully and corruptly swear or affirm falsely before any provost marshal or board of enrollment, or member thereof acting by authority of the board, or who shall, before any civil magistrate, willfully and corruptly swear or affirm falsely to any affidavit to be used in any case pending before any provost marshal or board of enrollment, shall, on conviction, be fined not exceeding $500, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than twelve months.

The difference between the two sections is to be found, first, in the words inserted in the section of the committee, "in behalf of the Government," after the words "shall have power to summon witnesses." This is for the purpose of enabling the enrolling officer representing the Government to bring before them such witnesses as they think proper on behalf of the Government, leaving the parties to make their own defense. The committee supposed that without this provision parties might examine clouds of witnesses at the expense of the Government, because those witnesses are to be paid mileage for their attendance. The Senate bill provided that such witnesses should not only be paid mileage but be allowed the same witness fees and costs as may be allowed in the district courts of the United States. It has been thought by the Military Committee not advisable to permit these enrollment boards to sit as a court and run up large bills of costs and fees in that way. Every lawyer is acquainted with the fact that the costs and fees allowed and charged in the district courts of the United States are very much above the standard of fees in the several States. It has been supposed by us that such a provision as that contained in the Senate bill would only afford a chance for persons to come before the board and bring up persons for the mere purpose of running up a bill of fees against the Government. We have provided, therefore, simply for paying to witnesses who may be brought before the board travel fees at the rate of five cents per mile.

Our amendment also inserts in lines ten and thirteen respectively, the words "willfully and corruptly swear" instead of the word "swear."

These are the principal differences between the two sections.

Mr. DRIGGS. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio by adding to it the following:

Provided, That in all districts over one hundred miles in extent, and in such as are composed of over ten counties, the board shall hold their sessions in at least two places in such district, and at such points as are best calculated to accommodate the people thereof.

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that an amendment has already been adopted providing that the Secretary of War may cause the boards to hold sessions in different counties, but I wish to say that my district is over eight hundred miles in extent. I am almost as near to my residence now as I would be in the remoter parts of my district. I hope it will not be left optional with the Secretary of War to say whether the board shall hold sessions at one or more points. I desire to compel the boards to hold two sessions in districts which are over eight hundred miles in extent. I have twenty-eight counties in my district, and it is eight hundred miles in length.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to—ayes sixty, noes not counted.

Mr. SCHENCK. At the suggestion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] and to remove all ambiguity, I will modify my amendment by inserting after the word "mileage" the words "counting one way."

Mr. KASSON. I wish to say to the gentleman from Ohio that that would not pay the actual cost of travel in regions of country which are not supplied with railroads; in the region west of the Mississippi, where railroads are not as abundant as they are in Ohio, that would not pay the actual expense of travel.

Mr. SCHENCK. In order to accommodate gentlemen I will modify my amendment so as to make the mileage six cents per mile, counting one way.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, if I understand this section there is no process provided by which the defendant, if you may so call him—the drafted man—can bring his witnesses before the court. It is only in behalf of the Government that subpoenas can be issued; and the drafted man who claims that he has been wronged can subpoena no witnesses. Now, I ask the Committee on Military Affairs if that is intentional?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is intentional.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman says it is intentional. Then I think that a different provision should be made, and that the defendant should have a right to subpoena witnesses also. But, in order that we may have an opportunity to consider this question, and as it is late and we are all very hungry, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAWES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration, as a special order, the bill of the Senate (No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and had made progress therein, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

APPOINTMENT OF A COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER announced that he had appointed the following as a select committee on the question of allowing Cabinet ministers to occupy seats in the House, namely, Messrs. PENDLETON, STEVENS, MORRILL, MALLOY, KASSON, GANSON, and BLAINE.

And then, on motion of Mr. COX, (at twenty minutes past four o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 10, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. JOHNSON presented the petition of Charles Vinson, praying for compensation for extra services as a clerk in the office of the Third Auditor; which, with his papers on the files of the Senate, was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOWARD presented a memorial of the Bay de Noquet and Marquette Railroad Company of the State of Michigan, remonstrating against any further legislation for the benefit of the Peninsular Railroad Company; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a memorial of L. H. Morgan, one of the directors of the Bay de Noquet and Marquette Railroad Company, and also of the Marquette and Ontonagon Railroad Company, in behalf of the directors and stockholders of those companies, praying for an extension of the time for the completion of their roads; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of Hon. Lewis D. Campbell, of Butler county, Ohio, praying for such an amendment to the naturalization laws as to provide that no person who has sought during the present rebellion or who hereafter in time of war may seek exemption from military service on the ground of alienage shall ever be entitled to the privileges of a citizen of the United States or to vote or hold any office or appointment under the Federal Government; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WADE presented a petition of citizens of Grand Traverse county, Michigan, praying for the abolition of slavery throughout the United States; which was referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. SAULSBURY, it was Ordered, That Samuel A. Ward have leave to withdraw his petition and other papers from the files of the Senate.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. CLARK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 111) ratifying and confirming the proclamation of the President of the United States dated January 1, 1863, and giving it the force of statute; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. FOOT, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 43) relating to the office of Commissioner of Public Buildings, reported it with amendments.

Mr. HALE. The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Samuel Chase Barney, praying that inquiry may be made into the causes of his dismissal from the naval service, have instructed me to report it back and to ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration. The committee think they have no jurisdiction of it.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 108) relating to acting assistant paymasters in the Navy, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. NESMITH, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 40) to define the pay of the officers of the Army of the United States, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 42) repealing certain statutes of limitation, reported it with amendments.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Wisconsin, praying for the passage of a law prohibiting members of Congress and other persons holding office under the Government of the United States from acting as attorneys or counselors in any case in which the United States is a party, have instructed me to report it back, and ask to be discharged from its further consideration, a bill being before the Senate on that subject.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 53) to provide for the summary trial of minor offenses against the laws of the United States, have instructed me to report it back to the Senate with an amendment in the shape of a substitute for the bill.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 103) to define the rank, pay, and emoluments of chaplains in the United States Army and volunteer force, and for other purposes, reported it with a recommendation that it do not pass.

ENLISTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, there is a bill made the special order for to-morrow (S. No. 41) to promote enlistments in the Army of the United States, and for other purposes. I should like to offer an amendment to or a substitute for the third section now pending, for the sake of having it laid upon the table and printed, with the consent of the Senate, so that Senators may see it before it comes up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will receive it, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The amendment was ordered to be printed.

COURTS IN INDIANA.

Mr. POWELL. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 100) authorizing the holding of a special session of the United States district court for the district of Indiana, to report it back with amendments, and recommend its passage. It is a matter of very special interest to the people of that district, the late district judge there having died during the term of the court, and a special term is very much desired. I therefore ask that the bill be now taken up and considered.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the holding of a special session of the United States district court for the district of Indiana at the usual place, on the second Tuesday in March, 1864, to continue in session so long as the business may require. All suits and proceedings of a civil or criminal nature now pending in or returnable to the court are to be proceeded with, heard, tried, and determined at the special session, in the same manner as at a regular term of the court; and the judge may order the impaneling of a petit jury for the special session, but not a grand jury; and no case is to be considered which stands continued to the May term by order of the court.

The amendments of the committee were to strike out in section one the words "and continue in session so long as the business thereof may require;" and also to strike out section three, in the following words:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That this act be in force from and after the passage thereof.

Mr. POWELL. These two amendments are merely to strike out what is surplusage in the bill. The court will, of course, have a right to continue its session while there is business before it, and the act will necessarily be in force from its passage.

The amendments were agreed to, the bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred various petitions from different parts of the country, praying for an amendment of the Constitution of the United States so as to incorporate a provision prohibiting slavery in all the States and Territories of the Union, and also a joint resolution (S. No. 16) proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and a joint resolution (S. No. 24) to provide for submitting to the several States an amendment of the Constitution of the United States, instruct me to report back an amendment to the Senate of the joint resolution No. 16, in the way of a substitute. I will state that the amendment, as recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary, provides for submitting to the Legislatures of the several States a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States so that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof a party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction; and also that Congress shall have power to enforce this article by proper legislation. I desire to give notice to the Senate that I shall, at an early day, call for the consideration of this resolution.

COMMITTEE ON MANUFACTURES.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the Senate to take up the resolution which I offered several days ago to amend the 34th rule of the Senate by appointing a standing Committee on Manufactures.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted by Mr. ANTHONY on the 4th instant:

Resolved, That there be added to the 34th rule of the Senate, providing for the appointment of the standing committees, the following, namely: "A Committee on Manufactures, to consist of five members."

The resolution was adopted; and on motion of Mr. ANTHONY, the Vice President was authorized to appoint the committee.

Mr. ANTHONY. I desire to state that I do not wish to be upon the committee.

EXCLUSION OF COLORED PERSONS FROM CARS.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be directed to consider the expediency of further providing by law against the exclusion of colored persons from the equal enjoyment of all railroad privileges in the District of Columbia.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. POMEROY. I wish the Senator would so amend his resolution as that it might prevent the difficulties which colored men have in getting out of this District. They cannot go on a railroad car or get out of the District.

Mr. SUMNER. The first question is on taking up the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution is now before the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. My special motive in offering this resolution is to call attention to a recent outrage which has occurred in this District. I do it with great hesitation. At one moment I was disposed to keep silence with regard to it, believing that upon the whole the good name of our country required silence; but I notice that it has already found its way into the journals, and I think therefore it ought to find its way into this Chamber.

An officer of the United States with the commission of a major, with the uniform of the United States, has been pushed off one of these cars on Pennsylvania avenue by the conductor for no other offense than that he was black. Now, sir, I am free to say that I think we had better give up railroads in the District of Columbia if we cannot have them without such an outrage upon humanity and upon the good name of our country. An incident like that, sir, is worse for our country at this moment than a defeat in battle. It makes for our cause abroad enemies and sows distrust. I hope, therefore, that the Committee on the District of Columbia—I know the disposition of my honorable friend the chairman of that committee—in the bills which we are to consider relative to the railroads in this District will take care that such safeguards are established as will prevent the repetition of any such outrage.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Let the resolution be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) It will be again read.

The Secretary read it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Let us have the yeas and nays on that proposition.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have not heard the resolution. Is it a resolution of inquiry only?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a resolution directing the committee to inquire into the subject named.

Mr. WILKINSON. I saw in a New York newspaper the other day an account of a transaction similar to the one alluded to by the Senator from Massachusetts. I was in hopes then, and indeed I thought, there was some mistake about it, because I did not know that any colored persons were commissioned with the rank of major by the President of the United States; and I was in hopes, for the honor of the country and for the honor of the capital, that there was some mistake in regard to it.

Mr. SUMNER. He was a surgeon in the military service.

Mr. WILKINSON. It appears that he was a surgeon in the Army; I suppose a surgeon of a colored regiment.

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. WILKINSON. Sir, I hope this reference will be made; and that the Committee on the District of Columbia will see to it that no corporation shall hereafter commit such an outrage.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I would have given a silent vote on this resolution, indeed, I should not have cared to vote any way, except for the explanations that have been made by the Senator who introduced it and the Senator from Minnesota. It seems to be considered a great outrage that the negroes in the District of Columbia are not allowed to take their seats in the same cars with the white men and women who travel on the railroads of this city. If I were to express any opinion on the subject, I should say the outrage would be the other way. But perhaps it is due to the company to say that I have observed the fact, as I suppose other Senators have observed it, that there are cars furnished for the colored people of the District, and those cars are plainly indicated, so that there can be no mistake.

I do not understand from the Senator who has introduced this resolution that any negro has been denied the right to ride in the cars which, at the expense of the company, have been provided for their accommodation; but the difficulty, I suppose, has arisen because the negro declined to ride in the cars that are provided for persons of his color, and claimed the right to ride in the cars that are provided for the white men and women who travel on these railroads. I am perfectly willing that upon all questions the committees shall investigate and report what their investigations require them to report to the Senate, and this being a mere resolution of inquiry there can be no objection to it, perhaps, except for the meaning that is given to it by the explanations of Senators, and therefore I shall vote against the resolution.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, I have no objection to this inquiry, and I am in favor of it, although I hope and am inclined to believe that there must be some mistake about the facts. I saw a telegraphic dispatch that had been sent through from this city to one of the New York papers, making this statement, and that the matter had been referred to General Martindale, who is the military governor, I believe, of this District. I had supposed, situated as I was, that if there was any occurrence of this kind it would be brought to my attention by somebody, or in some manner other than through a New York newspaper, but I have never heard any allusion to it by anybody either before I saw it in that paper or since. My friend from New Hampshire says it has been mentioned in the papers of the District, but it escaped my observation.

I think the Senator from Indiana is right in saying that there were or have been cars for colored people, but I doubt whether there are any now. At any rate no one has attracted my attention for some weeks.

Mr. CARLILE. I saw several yesterday.

Mr. SHERMAN. I rode in one a day or two ago.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that very recently, without observing it, I found myself crowding on the colored population in one of their own cars, and as I did not choose to press upon their rights I of course gave them the car. It was their right; it was provided for them, and of course I did not question that right. So I am sure that provision has been made for their accommodation.

Mr. GRIMES. I have found myself in some of the cars, and I did press myself upon their attention and rode with them, and I did not consider myself disgraced by riding to the Senate Chamber in a car with some colored people.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I am sure that the Senator from Indiana is mistaken in regard to the provision for colored persons. There may be here and there, now and then, once in a long interval of time, a car which colored persons may enter; but any person who traverses the avenue must see that those cars come very rarely, and if any person takes the trouble to acquaint himself with the actual condition of things he will know that there are great abuses and hardships, particularly among women, growing out of that outrage. I use plain language, sir, for it is an outrage; it is a disgrace to this city; it is a disgrace to this Government which sanctions it under its eyes. It is a mere offshoot of the slavery which happily we have banished from Washington.

But now go back to the facts on which I predicated my motion. The Senator from Iowa has referred to the case of the colored officer. I have in my hand the letter of that officer addressed to his military superior making a report of the case, and as it is very brief I will read it:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 1, 1864.

Sir: I have the honor to report that I have been obstructed in getting to the court this morning by the conductor of car No. 32, of the Fourteenth street line of the city railway.

I started from my lodgings to go to the hospital I formerly had charge of to get some notes of the case I was to give evidence in, and hailed the car at the corner of Fourteenth and I streets. It was stopped for me and when I attempted to enter the conductor pulled me back, and informed me that I must ride on the front with the driver, as it was against the rules for colored persons to ride inside. I told him I would not ride on the front, and he said I should not ride at all. He then ejected me from the platform, and at the same time gave orders to the driver to go on. I have therefore been compelled to walk the distance in the mud and rain, and have also been delayed in my attendance upon the court.

I therefore most respectfully request that the offender may be arrested and brought to punishment.

I remain, sir, your obedient servant.

A. T. AUGUSTA, M. B.,

Surgeon Seventh U. S. Colored Troops.

Captain C. W. CLIPPINGTON, Judge Advocate.

I believe that the writer of this letter had just as much right in that car as the Senator from Indiana, and I believe that it was just as great an outrage to eject him from the car as it would be to eject that Senator. I go further and I say—I merely take him for illustration—that the ejection of that Senator from a car would not bring upon this capital half the shame that the ejection of this colored officer from the car necessarily brings upon the capital, or any other Senator, for I do not mean of course to make the remark personal; but as the Senator from Indiana has entered into this discussion and chooses to vindicate this inhumanity, I allude to him personally.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I saw this statement in the New York papers, and I supposed, of course, it was true; for we all know that a very large quantity of the knowledge we get of what is going on, not only in the city, but in Congress, is obtained from the New York papers; but, as is suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, I have also seen it in the Washington papers. It is a case that I think calls for the action of Congress. I know no right that this company has to make these distinctions here in the capital where all persons are free and equal before the law.

But, sir, this is not the only place that needs reform. There are other portions of the country that need reform also where, perhaps, the matter is not under our control. On our own cars that we are running on our own military roads these outrages are committed. The other day a friend of mine came up from the Army, and with him two colored men, and they were forced into a cattle car while he rode alone in a freight car over that road, forced there by the persons exercising the control under the authority of the United States.

The truth about it is, sir, that slavery has had its corrupting and malign influences upon the country. The country will yet, however, be abolitionized and civilized and humanized, but it must be abolitionized before the high civilization or the high humanity will come. It is all going well and right. I hope that some action will be taken in reference to this matter, and I hope the Federal Government will correct these outrages that are perpetrated by persons employed by them on some of our own military roads.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to add a single remark to what I have felt it my duty to say. And first I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts who has just taken his seat if he has not heard of tens of thousands of cases where white soldiers have been compelled to ride in cattle or burden cars. I know that nothing is more common in the pressure upon the railroads of the Northwest than for that very thing to occur.

Mr. WILSON. In reply to the question of the Senator I will say that there is no doubt that it is true. That, however, I take it was a matter of necessity. I have no idea that any soldiers in any part of the country have been driven into the cattle cars while other cars used for carrying freight and being clean and neat go without passengers. In this case these persons were forced into the cattle car, and the gentleman told me he rode nearly all the way alone, when there was room for a large number of other persons in the car. He inquired about it of two officers, and the answer was that the cattle cars were for "the niggers."

Mr. HENDRICKS. During the very cold winter weather toward the commencement of this session, under the very eye of Senators, the veterans from the Potomac and the Rapidan came into this city in cars that were not at all fit for white people, in which they suffered extremely for the want of fire; and yet neither that Senator nor any other Senator felt that the cause of humanity and right required them to call the attention of the Senate to the circumstance.

I am satisfied, sir, that the Senators have now declared the end to which we are to come, and that by the action of the Federal Government the social as well as the political equality of the negro is to be forced upon the white race. If that be the judgment of the country we shall have to accept it. The people that I represent in this Chamber have not yet adopted that sentiment. The distinction between the two races is yet maintained in Indiana. How much longer it will be maintained I am not able to say.

The Senator says that abolitionism is to do its work, and one of its works, as I understand from him, is to bring about social equality. I presume he means also political equality. I think that we will not consent to that very readily in the State of Indiana. Indiana has not been for a great number of years in fact or in law a slave State. At one time there were a few slaves in that State, but it has been substantially a free State since 1816, the time of its admission, and yet, sir, accustomed as we are to white labor there, and to none other, we are not content that equality, social and political, of the black race shall be forced upon us; and I am glad now that in plain terms the two distinguished Senators from Massachusetts and the Senator from Minnesota have told the country that this is the end we are to come to, that this war is not only for the freedom of the negro but for the equality of the negro socially as well as politically, and the country can now appreciate the issue that is before it.

Mr. POMEROY. I think, Mr. President, the Senator is mistaken in saying that Indiana is a free State. I never heard of that, because I have noticed that white men in Indiana are not free. There is a law in that State which prohibits white men from employing colored men unless they were in the State at the adoption of the constitution. Colored men who happened to live in Indiana at the time the State constitution was adopted can be employed as laborers; but if any white man in that State employs a colored man who has gone in since, he is subject to a fine and also to a forfeiture, and I believe imprisonment. If that makes Indiana a free State it is not such a free State as I would make if I were to make one.

Mr. CLARK. I think the Senator from Indiana has mistaken the resolution. I understand him to characterize this as a resolution to force the negro into the cars. I understand it to be a resolution to prevent you from forcing him out—not to force social equality, but to prevent an outrage upon him.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I did not intend to say another word, and I should not now say anything except for the remarks of the Senator from Kansas in respect to the policy which Indiana has seen fit to adopt. In this Chamber, sir, it is not a part of my labor to defend the policy that the people of that State see fit to adopt; but I will simply say this: we lie alongside of the State of Kentucky, and free negroes were constantly coming into our State, and our people thought we would have the negro there neither as a free man nor as a slave, and they decided in favor of that policy by the largest vote that was ever given in the State upon any question submitted to the people—by a majority, I think, of ninety-three thousand. That has been the policy of Indiana; and in this connection I will simply add that under that policy the colored population of Indiana between 1850 and 1860 increased but about one and a half per cent., while in the adjoining State of Ohio, in which they had no such protection to free white labor, the negro population increased, I believe, about forty-one per cent.

Mr. WILSON. A single word, Mr. President, in regard to what the Senator from Indiana has said of our soldiers and how they are carried. I never learned that over the military road of the Government between Alexandria and the Army any abuses were made of our soldiers. If I had learned such a fact in any form I think I should have been likely to refer to it. I am sure of one thing, that if ever I saw any conductors on that road drive soldiers from the freight cars which had carried freight to the Army, into other cars that had carried cattle to the Army, while the freight cars were empty and were retained for some privileged or favored persons to ride in, I should have denounced it here and elsewhere.

I will say further, as we are speaking to-day in regard to the management of these roads, that I have no reason to complain of the management of the railroad in the city of Washington, or of any of its conductors toward myself. I believe the most of them are men who do their duty, and do it faithfully, but I have seen cases where I have remonstrated with them, not for driving black men out of the cars, because I have never seen that done, although I have seen black men, and women forced on to the front part of the cars to ride in cold and stormy weather; but I have seen soldiers traveling in this city in some cases slighted and abused by conductors on this road. I have remonstrated with them for such conduct; and I know other persons who have witnessed the same thing.

What I mean to say about this matter is this: I do not want to force on the Senator from Indiana or anybody else any class of men with whom he does not choose to associate, but I think the true policy is to let men stand equally before the law, to let men win their own positions, let them have the privilege of making out of themselves all that God and nature intended they should be.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 30, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Col-lamer, Comess, Cowan, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Pomerooy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Harding, Hendricks, Nesmith, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Van Winkle—10.

So the resolution was agreed to.

MEMBERS OF CONGRESS AS COUNSEL.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 28, relating to members of Congress. I think we can pass it in the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill (S. No. 28) relating to members of Congress. The bill as originally introduced by Mr. WADE provided that no member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives of the United States shall, during his continuance in office, hereafter appear or act as counsel, attorney, or agent in any cause or proceeding, civil or criminal, in any court, civil, criminal, military, or naval, or before any commission in which the United States is a party or directly or indirectly interested, or receive any compensation of any kind, directly or indirectly, for services of any description rendered by himself or another in relation to any such cause or proceeding; and that no member of the Senate or House of Representatives shall, during his continuance in office, receive or agree to receive any compensation whatsoever, directly or indirectly, for any services rendered to any person, either by himself or another, in relation to any proceeding, contract, claim, controversy, charge, accusation, arrest, or other matter or thing in which the United States is a party or directly or indirectly interested, before any Department, bureau, officer, or any civil, military, or naval commission whatever. A person so offending, on conviction, is to be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by a fine not less than $—, and by imprisonment for a term not less than — years, and be forever thereafter incapable of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments, the first of which was to strike out the following words:

No member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives of the United States shall, during his continuance in office, hereafter appear or act as counsel, attorney, or agent in any cause or proceeding, civil or criminal, in any court, civil, criminal, military, or naval, or before any commission, in which the United States is a party or directly or indirectly interested, or receive any compensation of any kind, directly or indirectly, for services of any description rendered by himself or another in relation to any such cause or proceeding. And.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not sure that I heard the bill read very distinctly. The most of its provisions, so far as I understand them from the reading, appear to be reenacting the laws as they are. An act passed several years ago prohibits any member of Congress from prosecuting any claim against the Government except in the courts. This bill, I think, repeats that provision. I did not rise so much for the purpose of suggesting that merely, as to suggest to the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary whether he thinks it is advisable to exclude the privilege of members of the Senate who happen to be professional men of appearing before courts-martial.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Maryland will permit me to say that the amendment now under consideration does not involve that. That will come up hereafter. We are now considering the question of striking out from the third to the twelfth line; and the words proposed to be stricken out prohibit a member of Congress from attending to any business whatever in any court, before any Department of the Government, either with or without compensation. If the bill as it was introduced were to pass no member of Congress would be permitted to act for his constituents before any of the Departments or in any of the courts of the country anywhere, either with or without compensation. The committee propose to strike that out. By the subsequent provisions of the bill it will be seen that, as the committee report it, they propose to restrain members of Congress and clerks in the Departments and heads of bureaus from receiving a compensation from any person for doing any business before any Department or any commission or anywhere else except in the judicial tribunals of the country. The bill as reported by the committee does not prohibit members of Congress from practicing in the courts of the country; but it does prohibit them from appearing before courts-martial, commissions, Departments, bureaus, or anywhere else for a fee or consideration received from any one. The question now is, however, on striking out these first twelve lines.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twelve, after the word "shall" to insert the words, "after his election and," and in line fourteen after the word "office" to insert the words "nor shall any head of a Department, head of a bureau, clerk, or other officer of the Government," and in line seventeen after the word "rendered" to insert the words, "or to be rendered;" so that the clause will read:

That no member of the Senate or House of Representatives shall, after his election and during his continuance in office, nor shall any head of a Department, head of a bureau, clerk, or other officer of the Government, receive or agree to receive any compensation whatsoever, directly or indirectly, for any services rendered, or to be rendered; &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. While we are on that line, it has been suggested, to make the bill clear from any ambiguity, that after the words "or to be rendered," which have been inserted, there should be inserted the words "after the passage of this act;" so that it will apply to services rendered or to be rendered after the passage of this act. Otherwise it might cut off compensation which has been agreed on for a person attending before a court-martial or some other place where the law heretofore did not prohibit his attending. I move in the seventeenth line after the word "rendered" to insert those words, "after the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in line twenty-two, after the word "Department" to insert the word "court-martial."

Mr. JOHNSON. That is the particular provision—

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Maryland will pardon the Chair a moment, it becomes the duty of the Chair at this hour to call up the special order of the day, the morning hour having expired.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It will take but a moment probably to get through with this bill. I do not apprehend that it will lead to discussion. I will therefore move to lay aside all other orders until we get through with this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection on the part of the Senate that course will be pursued.

Mr. HALE. I suggest to the Senator from Illinois that possibly there may be some discussion on it. It is an important bill and marks out a new policy in the Government, a pretty wide departure from what has been practiced heretofore. I wish that it might be printed as it has been amended.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is printed as amended, and is before the Senator. It has been on our tables for a week or two.

Mr. WILSON. I will suggest to the Senator to let this bill go over, and then we can take up a measure which I think it is very important to act upon, and that is the joint resolution to equalize the pay of soldiers of the United States Army.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator submit that motion?

Mr. WILSON. I make that motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the joint resolution indicated in his motion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think we had better finish this bill. The bill has been printed, but the Senator from New Hampshire did not have it before him; that is all. It is a short bill. If he will send for a printed copy of Senate bill No. 28 he can have it before him in a moment.

Mr. WILSON. I understood the Senator from New Hampshire to suggest that that bill would lead to considerable debate, and therefore I made my motion. If the Senator from Illinois thinks we had better go on with the bill I have no objection.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to suggest to gentlemen that if they postpone everything that leads to debate it will take them some time to get through with this session of Congress.

Mr. HALE. I do not want any postponement of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts withdraw his motion?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair then, if there be no objection, will proceed with the pending question. The bill (S. No. 28) relating to members of Congress is still before the Senate, the pending question being on inserting after the word "Department," in the twenty-second line, the word "court-martial," and on that the Senator from Maryland was on the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was under the impression it was postponed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is now before the Senate at the point where the Senator arose.

Mr. JOHNSON. As I said just now, I suggest to the honorable chairman of the committee, and the Senate, whether it is proper in itself to make this amendment, at the present time particularly. You have extended to courts-martial jurisdiction over almost every variety of crimes. There is hardly an offense known to the criminal statute which is not more remotely, indirectly, or directly of such a character that these courts-martial or military commissions are supposed to have, and certainly assume, jurisdiction. My impression has been, and still is, (with no disrespect to the Executive,) that these courts-martial are assuming jurisdiction which Congress never contemplated. In all cases of contract to furnish materials to the United States in any Department of the Government, if the Government believe, or have reason to believe, that the party has acted fraudulently in his execution of that contract, he is tried before what they call a military commission, and from what I have understood—I speak from no personal knowledge—very great injustice has been done, and very often has been done because of the absence of counsel. But besides that, cases are occurring every day where the reputation of an officer or his life is involved before a court-martial. The earnings of his life, in character as well as in everything else, may depend upon the result of the decision of that tribunal.

Now, I suppose that the only ground upon which it is proper—and to that extent I agree with the policy as a good one—to exclude members of Congress who happen to be professional men from prosecuting their profession is, that in certain cases they are imagined to have, because they are members of Congress, an improper influence upon the bureau or the Department or the tribunal before which the case is to be tried. A clerk in these Departments, whether at the head of a bureau or anywhere else, or a Secretary of a Department, is in contemplation of law thought to be more or less under the influence of members of Congress; and from a desire to gratify a member of Congress he may at times decide unjustly as against the Government, or at least erroneously. He trusts to the member of Congress. He believes that his statements are true because of the character which every member of Congress is supposed to possess; and acting upon that, he decides accordingly; as very often what decision is to be given depends upon the authenticity of the facts which are laid before the particular Department.

But I submit whether that applies to a case depending before a court-martial. The influences upon the judges of a tribunal of that description are much stronger, I think, than any influence a mere counsel can bring to bear because of the fact that he is a member of Congress. The judges themselves, the members of the court, are appointed directly by the President or by the President's authority. They depend more or less for their advancement in their profession upon presidential favor. There are, besides—it is useless to deny; we all know it; in the nature of things it must be so—existing in every army and in every navy what may be called cliques; and where that is the case, if the judges who are to try a man belonging to one of these cliques happen themselves to belong to another, they bring, or are supposed to bring, and in all probability do bring without knowing it, the prejudices which arise from that fact.

Now, the great security, or one of the great securities, as it seems to me, of having a fair trial, notwithstanding the outside influences or internal influences which the members of these courts-martial may, as I have said, unknowingly to themselves, be under, is to have before them some professional man whose character in the country may be supposed to be more or less a guarantee that he will do nothing professionally that he does not think is right, and upon whose judgment after the result of any particular case may have been known the court may think the public themselves will in some measure rely. I cannot conceive it possible that because a man happens to be a member of Congress he can have any influence with the judges of a court-martial which could operate prejudicially at all to the attainment of justice.

Then, on the other hand, why is it—I ask in the name of humanity and in the name of justice, why is it that a man tried for his life before one of those tribunals, more or less ignorant of all the laws of evidence, and more or less ignorant of the proper construction to be given to the statutes, should not have the benefit of the best counsel that he in his opinion may think is to be procured? The meanest man in the community who happens to be tried for his life, or for any offense which involves his character, has a right to select any counsel that he thinks proper before any of the civil courts. He may come into this Senate Chamber or go into the other House and select anybody that he can get to defend him; and it is one of the duties of the profession, and one, as far as I know, that they never shrink from, to render that service whether the party charged is able to compensate or not.

If you give the lowest man in the community the privilege of being defended before any court in the community other than a court-martial the privilege of selecting his own counsel without reference to the political status of that counsel, why is it that you will not give to a general in the field, who has passed his life in the service of his country, and added to its honor, as it may sometimes happen, and who is upon his trial for his life, the privilege of being defended by the counsel that he may think best fitted to serve him? If I believed it to be possible, because of the relation in which that counsel may stand to the Government and because of the relation in which standing to the Government, he may stand, or be supposed to stand, toward the tribunal before whom he is to appear, that it would work an erroneous result and do mischief to the country, I would be the last person in the world to object to such a proposition as this.

Before I sit down, permit me to say, Mr. President, that so far as I am individually concerned such an amendment as this will have no effect upon me except to save trouble. In many of the cases in which I have heretofore been engaged in behalf of parties before courts-martial, I have got nothing and charged nothing; and in those cases where I have charged, or rather where I have been paid without charging, it was a compensation that I would not have taken under any other circumstances; much less than I charged in ordinary cases; because nine times out of ten the party who is being tried, no matter how high his rank may be in the military or naval service, is unable to pay. He has spent his life in maintaining the honor of the country, sustaining the glory of her flag, representing her abroad, if he is in the naval service; gone far from his home, if he is in command of a corps or division, and spent, nine times out of ten, not only all, but more than you give him; and when he gets involved in a difficulty which may lead to a court-martial he is penniless, literally penniless, so far as concerns his ability to pay counsel the professional fees which they have been in the habit of getting.

Now here we are in 1864. The Constitution was adopted in 1789. Our forefathers went through the war of the Revolution without such a provision as this. You went through the second war of independence, as it has been termed, the war of 1812, and the war with Mexico in 1846 without such a provision as this, and you have gone through the present war up to the present time without such a provision. What harm has resulted from permitting members of either House to appear as counsel before courts-martial? I am aware of none at all; that is to say, I am aware of no harm resulting to the country or to the individual because of the fact that the counsel of the party happens to stand toward the Government in the relation of Senator or Representative. I think it has been found, on the contrary, no matter who is the counsel, that the commanding influence, the controlling influence, is the Executive.

A man from Maryland was tried, for aiding the enemy, before a court-martial composed of some of the most intelligent and honorable officers in the service, and he was subjected to the punishment of a mere reprimand. The record of that judgment was hardly filed in the War Department before the Secretary of War lectured them by an order, reprimanding the court, and ordering the party who had been found not guilty, free of the offense with which he was charged, to be handed over to the civil tribunals to be there prosecuted.

In another case where the party charged had the benefit of the counsel of a member of the other House, and who was tried, before a court composed again of as high-minded and honorable men as are to be found in the military service, upon five or six or seven specifications of charges all involving fraud, was not only acquitted, but was said to be honorably acquitted. Such was the finding upon each one of the charges, and upon each one of the specifications. When it came here it was filed in the same Department. The Secretary of War—I am not finding fault with him; I am not saying that he did not do what he thought to be his duty; I think he transcended it, but that is a matter of opinion—issued an order dissolving the court, reflecting upon the intelligence of the court, insinuating disloyalty upon the members of the court, and had influence enough with the President to get the President to say in an official order that the man who had been pronounced not guilty, and pronounced as having been honorably acquitted, was dishonorably discharged from the service. His counsel could not save him.

I mention these facts not for the purpose of finding fault with the Secretary of War, but merely for the purpose of submitting to the Senate, as illustrated by these two cases, that it is perfectly clear that whatever influence can be brought to bear upon the minds of a court-martial comes from another quarter than that of counsel.

With these remarks, Mr. President, I leave the subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, this Senate and the House of Representatives undoubtedly contain a very fair sprinkling of the legal talent of the country, and probably possess an average share of that integrity that belongs to the profession; but it makes a very small portion, an almost infinitesimal portion of the legal ability of the country. We really deprive nobody of any privileges, and submit nobody to injury or loss by simply saying that the members of this

Senate and of the House of Representatives who are lawyers shall not practice in certain cases in which the Government is concerned.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We only prohibit them from receiving fees. They can go there if they want to do so without fees.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then we should not exclude the honorable Senator from Maryland, whose practice it seems to be to defend persons without charge, especially in court-martial cases.

I think the proposition is a sound one and a good one. In the first place, with reference to all other officers connected with the General Government except members of Congress, their whole time is, or ought to be, necessarily taken up in the discharge of their duties for which they receive pay. With regard to us, the greater part of our time is so, or ought to be so appropriated. When we are at home some of us engage in professional pursuits, and perhaps we do no injury in any way in that particular. For myself, however, I have been so long now in public life that I have pretty much lost the capacity for professional pursuits, and therefore do not have much to do.

I think this rule a sound one. If we do not give our whole time to the Government we ought at least to see that we are not mixed up in affairs with which the Government are connected by which we may be influenced in the discharge of our public duties. That, I think, is the great difficulty.

Take the case, for instance, of a court-martial: A member of the Senate may be counsel for an officer tried before a court-martial. It is impossible, in the very nature of things, that his feelings should not be strongly enlisted for his client; and there are few counsel whose minds are so exceedingly well balanced that they can keep clear of that prejudice and afterwards act without prejudice as judges upon the case. How often has it happened that persons who have been tried before courts-martial make complaints to Congress, and efforts are made here to bring in the record and spread it before the country. Perhaps we may have occasion to act upon that very thing in some other form, and it is impossible, in my judgment, that we can bring to it, after having been ourselves employed as counsel, that clear and unbiased judgment which we ought to possess with reference to all such matters.

This matter of courts-martial has been suggested as one illustration. Perhaps it is the strongest one. I think it is a case particularly where members of the Senate and House of Representatives should not act as counsel, either with fees or without fees. All these matters, in which the interests of the Government are so particularly connected, and are perhaps adverse to the interests of individuals, are not such matters as we should engage in; for I hold that having accepted our offices and taking the pay that we receive for the services we render, and being members of the Government itself, we should take care to keep not only our time ready for the service of the country, but our minds also in such a state that they are unbiased in their action with reference to public affairs. More particularly do I hold it not only advisable but essential that we should receive no fees with reference to such matters, although I see no impropriety in it as a general rule, and do not wish to cast the slightest reflection on anybody. I believe the true doctrine is that as public servants, acting in the capacity and the high capacity we do, we should keep ourselves in regard to the affairs of the Government entirely clear of everything which might tend to cast a bias on our minds in reference to any particular matter or similar matters at any subsequent period.

It is with this view and on this general consideration, and this general consideration alone, that I shall give my vote for this bill, not exactly as it stands, for I think it needs some little amendment. It has been suggested to me that there are some amendments, which will be proposed, that I suppose will address themselves to the sense of the honorable Senator who is chairman of the Judiciary Committee. On those I have nothing to say; but with reference to the general principle, I disagree entirely with the honorable Senator from Maryland, for the reason that I have stated. It is a single and simple one. Perhaps it will not be considered so forcible by anybody else as by me; but it is a matter on which I have reflected more than once during my congressional career, and I came to the conclusion early that, so far as the Government was concerned, members of Congress should devote themselves in all these matters particularly to their own duties, keeping clear of any complications with others that might in any way bias their opinions or affect their action.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, upon the question whether members of Congress should be allowed to practice before courts-martial, I entertain a very decided opinion. I did so in committee; I believe it was at my suggestion that the prohibition was placed in the bill; and the more I have considered the subject the more certainly I have felt convinced that such prohibition will be salutary.

I agree with the Senator from Maine as to the reasons for this prohibition which may be considered personal to ourselves why we should not thus act. But there are additional reasons not less strong, in my judgment, than those, strong and indeed conclusive as they may be.

When we consider the composition of these military tribunals, there are, it seems to me, very strong reasons why members of the Senate certainly should not practice as counselors and attorneys before them. The members of those courts are all looking to promotion; they all expect at a proper time to be elevated from lieutenants to captains, and from captains to majors, and so on up to major generals or lieutenant generals, as the case may be. It is true that Senators have not the power of promoting these several officers; but we are supposed to exert a very considerable influence in procuring their promotion. Whether that be so or not, it is quite certain that sitting here in executive session we have some power in deciding whether they shall be promoted or not. A single vote in the Senate is sometimes very important upon the question of the promotion of a military officer. A single Senator may have it in his power to prevent a man from being made a major general or a brigadier general or any other military officer of a higher or a lower grade. Taking human nature as it is, it is utterly inconceivable that members of these military courts should not have this fact in their minds while they are trying causes brought before them. I do not say that they will be improperly biased by any influence which a Senator, acting as counsel, could exert before them. No doubt they, as honorable, upright men, would intend to decide the cause just as they would if any other person were counsel, decide it on its naked merits, and try the cause, and not the particular party, much less the counsel of the particular party. But after all it is perfectly clear that the influence of a Senator, should he choose to exert it, might, quite unconsciously to the members of the court, lead to a result which all would deprecate and regret.

The honorable Senator from Maryland, it seemed to me, was unfortunate in his illustration on that very point. He alluded to the decisions of several courts-martial where the judgment of the court, pronounced as he said by as intelligent, high-minded, and honorable men as could be found in the military service, was by the Secretary of War set aside; and an officer who had been honorably acquitted by the judgment of his peers was by the President of the United States, influenced by the Secretary of War, dishonorably discharged from the service. Why? Because in the opinion of the Executive that judgment was one which ought not to be carried out; it was an erroneous finding or an erroneous judgment upon the finding; and so flagrant was this judgment that the Executive discharged dishonorably from the service one who had been honorably acquitted by the court-martial. How was the judgment of that military court brought about? Who was counsel for that man thus acquitted by the court and dismissed by the Executive? A member of Congress. I understood the honorable Senator to state that the counsel for the accused in that case was a member of Congress. Far be it from me to impute any wrong to that member, or to charge that any erroneous influence was exerted by that member upon the mind of the court; but it is a fact which cannot be winked out of sight that the judgment was one which struck the Executive with surprise, and one which he would not carry out. The Executive may have been wrong and the court right, but it is quite possible also that the court may have been wrong and the Executive right. At all events, under these circumstances I would as soon accept the judgment of the Executive, insisted upon, as I understand the honorable Senator to say it was, by the Secretary of War, as correct, as take the judgment of the court; and if there chanced to be an unfortunate element of congressional influence, in the character of counsel, introduced into the trial extraneous to the merits of the cause, it would account for the result at which the court arrived.

I have heard—I do not know that it is true, I trust it is not, but it is an illustration of the principle to which I am alluding—I have heard that on a certain occasion before a court-martial a member of Congress, appearing as counsel, and being dissatisfied with some preliminary decisions made by the court, said in very decided language to some member of the court, "You expect soon to be promoted, and I give you to understand that your confirmation will not get through the Senate without some difficulty." I am desirous, and I presume every member of the Senate, as well as every citizen who desires that justice should be administered fairly, both by military and civil courts, is desirous to avoid these evils, if it be possible to avoid them by legislation. I think it is; and I think that the difficulties which our citizen soldiers will sustain in consequence of not being able to avail themselves of the services of members of Congress to act as their counsel are more imaginary than real. No doubt there are honorable members of this body and of the House of Representatives who could act most efficiently and ably as counsel, either before military or civil courts; but as the honorable Senator from Maine suggests, these two bodies composing the Congress of the United States by no means contain the whole legal ability of the country. There will be no danger but that innocence may be defended and justice vindicated before all the tribunals of the country if we have nothing to do with the administration of justice.

To make the law its own proper duty, and I think as a general thing it is better to leave to others the administration of the law which we may have enacted; certainly before all courts where those who compose them may be considered in any manner dependent upon us either for their continuance in place or for their promotion to a higher place. If the members of a civil court held their offices at our will, or we by our vote could remove them from office readily, I would prohibit members of Congress from appearing before that, though a civil tribunal. The consequences are quite too apparent, quite too full of evil, to permit such a course as that to be followed safely for a single day. Judges should be independent. I trust that this amendment will be adopted, and that members of Congress—at least members of this body, and I would not discriminate between the two Houses in that respect—will not be allowed to practice as counsel for pay before courts-martial.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not know when I was up before to what two cases the Senator from Maryland alluded, and therefore I made no comment about them. I have since been informed what they were, and I find that they are cases of which I had heard before. One is the case of a man in Pennsylvania or Maryland who gave to the enemy when they were there information of where a large number of cattle belonging to the Government could be found, the result of which was that the enemy got possession of them. The court found him guilty, found that he had done the thing, and sentenced him I believe to be reprimanded; told him he must not do it again. Mr. Stanton, the Secretary of War, I understand, did dismiss the court with a great deal of contempt, and gave expression to it openly; and I think that feeling of contempt was shared by the whole country who knew the facts and saw the sentence. The case was a very gross one, and no one could throw the slightest imputation upon any officer of the Government, having the authority, for reprimanding the court in such a case for not having done its duty.

The other was the case of Major Belger. In that case the record, as I have been informed, was such as satisfied the Government at once, on its face, of the guilt of the officer. The very facts reported showed him to be guilty. It is well known that there is a sort of fellow feeling or something of the kind that very often operates on courts-martial, not constituted as civil courts are, that unquestionably needs correction; and I do not think the slightest reproach should be thrown upon the Executive in such cases for trying to make these courts, which after all are mere military tribunals, do their duty; and I presume the honorable Senator from Maryland did not mean to insinuate that anything had been done in those cases without very good and sufficient cause. I have stated the cases in order that they may go into the same record with the remarks he has made, so that the country may understand what they were. I remember that at the time of their occurrence I was informed of them, and for myself I fully justified the whole action of the Government in relation to those two cases, and I am satisfied that if they had carried it further and taken the same course in regard to some other cases they would have benefited the country.

Mr. JOHNSON. Both the Senators who have spoken in support of this amendment and the chairman of the committee seem to suppose that this bill prohibits members of Congress from trying causes before courts-martial. It does no such thing. That is not the amendment which I understand has been suggested by the Senator from Connecticut. It only says that no member of Congress shall try a case before a court-martial for a fee agreed upon in advance, or paid in advance, or to be paid in the future. He is perfectly at liberty to go before a court-martial and try a cause without a fee; and I said, therefore, that so far as I was concerned it would create no impediment in the way of any such duty as that should I be called upon to perform it.

Now, a word in answer to the Senator from Maine. He has said—perhaps he misunderstood me or he would not have said it—that all our time is due to the public. He does not mean to say that every day of the year is due to the public. I suppose he means to say that all our time while we are here, which is necessary for the public service, the public have a right to demand.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator misunderstood me. I said that all our time that was necessary for the public service, that the public needed, was due to the public; I went no further than that; but I expressly stated that we had much time, perhaps in the recess, when we could attend to professional duties. I placed my objection to members taking this particular class of duties on them upon another ground.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understood that, and was going to state it. The Senator placed it on a double ground. Now, Mr. President, I am to be informed for the first time—and I am now being instructed by Senators—that there is anything improper, looking to the full duty which a Senator owes to the country, of his becoming counsel in any case before any court, as an abstract proposition. I concede with the Senator from Maine that nothing is more plainly the duty of a member of Congress than to give his entire time to the service of the country in that relation, as far as his time is necessary for that purpose. But as the Senator says, and no doubt he illustrates it by his own example, there is time not due to the public. While he is away from here he tries causes in the State of Maine. He has done it; he has not grown too old to do it yet; and he is certainly not less able to do it now than he ever was, but a great deal more able if there can be said to be anything more able in reference to such a counsel, and he gives his time, when he goes home, to the prosecution of his profession. Do the public suffer by that? Some critic who might be astute to find out that the honorable Senator from Maine was not discharging the full measure of his public duty might say that he ought to be studying political economy, mastering all questions connected with finance, studying the slave question, and studying anything and everything which might at any time become a public measure before Congress.

I do not wish, therefore, to be understood that I would or that any member of Congress should in my opinion undertake to defend a case before a court-martial while Congress is in session. I had no such idea. What I mean to say is this, not as a right due to the member of Congress, but as a right due to the citizen, he should have the privilege of selecting his own counsel. If I supposed that in the exercise of that right his selection of a member of Congress would operate to the prejudice of the Government I should be as much in favor of this amendment as the Senator from Maine.

I understand the honorable Senator to say, and I understood him to say from the first, that he is not for excluding a member of Congress from appearing as counsel in cases, except cases of a certain class, and he supposes that the class of cases before courts-martial is of that description that members of Congress should not be permitted to appear in. The Senator from Connecticut takes the same ground. Now, a word in reply to him first.

He ought not to appear there, says the Senator from Connecticut, because the members of the court are looking to promotion; and it may happen that a man who is so looking for promotion may fear to offend counsel who happens to be a member of Congress, and especially if he happens to be a member of the Senate, because if he is nominated for promotion, his nomination may be rejected by the influence of that particular member. Now, in the first place, I shall be exceedingly unwilling to believe, and I certainly do not believe, that there is any member of this body now, or that there can be at any time hereafter a member of this body, who, because acting as counsel he was dissatisfied with the finding of a court-martial, would use his influence in this body to punish the members of the court. I should be unwilling to associate with counsel who would lend themselves—I was about to say with all deference to the Senator from Connecticut—to such a low, miserable, pitiful feeling as that. Dissatisfaction with a judge because he happens to decide against your client! Deny to him honesty because he differs in opinion from yourself! Take advantage of your official position in order to punish him because he differs from you!

In the next place, how is he to come before the Senate? The Senate have no right to appoint. They have no right to nominate. The Senate's right in regard to appointments arises after nomination, and there can be no nomination except at the hands of the Executive. If, therefore, any member of the court should be capable of shaping his judgment in order to secure promotion he will look to the Executive. What do they want? "I feel for myself," one of them may say, "that I am willing to pander for promotion, abuse my conscience in order to accomplish my end; that end is elevation in my profession; I cannot obtain it except through the instrumentality of the President or the immediate advisers of the President, the Cabinet, and particularly the head of the military Department of the Cabinet, and I will take care not to offend him." Is there not more danger—I submit it to the Senator from Connecticut—of there being an abuse in that quarter such as he deprecates, than of such an abuse arising from the mere fact that the party employed as counsel happens to be a Senator?

Now, a word in reply to my friend from Maine. There is a certain class of cases, he thinks, in which members of Congress should not be permitted to act as counsel, and this is one of them. Why is it one of them? Because these names may be brought before us either by nomination for promotion, or in the event of conviction by appeals for justice at the hands of the Senate, and he who has been counsel, unknowing to himself, cannot avoid feeling a bias which would prevent his doing justice or being in a state of mind to do exact justice.

In the first place, the honorable Senator from Maine, if he wishes to carry out practically his theory, must pass the bill as it was originally presented, and that is to exclude any member of Congress from trying in any court any cause in which the United States may be interested. Those cases may come before us. Land grants are ruled to be invalid, and an appeal is made to Congress—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to ask my friend a question with his permission.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Does he ever consent to sit as referee in a case where he has been counsel?

Mr. JOHNSON. No, sir, I am not a referee in a case of this description.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You may be.

Mr. JOHNSON. No, sir, I cannot be—neither a referee in point of fact or name, nor a referee in point of substance. A land grant is ruled to be invalid, and the claimants come here to have it made valid. Does anybody suppose that because that might be, it would be improper for a Senator of the United States, before the decision was made, to appear as counsel? I say to the Senator from Maine—and I suppose that any lawyer who knows what is due to himself and due to his profession would come to the same conclusion—that in a case of that description I certainly would not vote to affirm such a grant, nor would I vote to pay any claim which had been ruled by a decision of a proper tribunal to be invalid, in a case in which I had been counsel. I would not vote at all.

In relation to the two cases which have been spoken of, my friend from Maine knows more about them than I do. I have no knowledge at all of what were the charges in either case. What I said was founded entirely on the fact of the judgment of reprimand, I think, in the one, and a judgment of honorable acquittal in the other; but the Senator from Maine seems to suppose that because the Executive in each case found fault with the decision of the court, the decision must have been wrong, and from an explanation of the facts which he has got from the Department he thinks and says that in his judgment the cases were perfectly plain.

Nobody knows better than the Senator from Maine that the true rule by which judgment should be guided in all inquiries of that sort, is to hear both sides. Has he heard the court? No, sir. Has he seen the witnesses? No, sir. Does he know the character of the witnesses, their title to credit? No, sir. Does he know the demeanor of the accused? No, sir. And nobody knows better than the honorable Senator from Maine that all these things enter largely into the elements for a correct judgment.

My honorable friend from Connecticut, not now in his seat, has told us that the mere fact that those judgments were disapproved, proves, at least in relation to one of the cases in which a member of Congress appeared as counsel for the accused, that the judgments must have been erroneous. I suppose it is barely possible—I put the case now as a supposition that the mind is able to entertain without doing any violence to the power of reason or to its experience—that the judgment of five respectable men before whom the whole case was heard may be right, and the judgment of Hon. Edwin M. Stanton wrong. That is a fair possibility; and if you are about to place these courts-martial in a situation to be not obnoxious at all to any suspicion of injustice, let the rights of courts-martial be understood. They are appointed by the Executive; and what has been done—I speak from what I have heard from officers of the highest distinction, not members of either of those courts—what has been done has been construed as teaching the members of courts-martial that if the Executive desires a conviction, a verdict of acquittal, no matter what is the evidence, will be of no avail. "Acquit if you please, or rather if you dare, and if in our judgment the acquittal has been erroneous, then we not only set it aside, but we censure you." What would my friend from Maine have said if he had been one of the members of that court? Assuming that the court were wrong, I can understand that the conduct of the Executive in the particular case might have been right; but if the Senator had been a member of that court, and had, after hearing all the evidence, decided that a man should be honorably acquitted, and he had been announced at once as dishonorably discharged, and the court-martial itself dissolved as having shown mental imbecility, or what is worse, moral imbecility, what would he have said? I know him so well as to know he would say, "I may have erred; that is possible; but the chances of my having erred are infinitely less than the chances of error in the Department of War, where the Secretary is obliged to act without the benefit of many of the means of correct information which must be possessed by a court."

As I have already said, sir, I have no possible interest in the result; I merely wished to defend what I consider the rights of the profession, or more especially what I consider to be the rights of the individual citizen, so far as the particular amendment proposed by the committee is concerned.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, as I stated to the Senator, the bill would have suited me better as it was originally drawn, to prohibit members of Congress, so far as it is applicable to members of Congress, entirely from appearing as counsel in cases to which the Government is a party. The Committee on the Judiciary, however, have chosen to put it in another attitude, and I do not object to it, for the reason that I think it will substantially accomplish the purpose, and I do not feel disposed to urge my own particular views in opposition to the views of the committee.

I do not see the danger that is apprehended from this legislation. There are not many of our profession who are situated precisely as is my honorable friend from Maryland. We are generally men who work for pay in our profession. We like fees. We are not disposed to give our time and our labor and our study, as the gentleman from Maryland is, for weeks to the defense of people whom we do not know, merely from love of the profession or a sense of professional duty; and therefore the bill as it stands will apply to everybody but him. As he is not interested in it it will have all the effect desired, because it will exclude about everybody else; and I have no doubt he will be governed, as I trust we all shall be, by the implication of the bill itself, that the thing is improper. I really have no fears but that the bill as drawn, if we pass it, will accomplish all its purpose, of prohibiting members of Congress from appearing as counsel in similar cases, and that, I think, is highly desirable. Therefore I give it my support without attempting to amend it, and I do not see the difficulties that my honorable friend does.

It struck me that when he alluded to those two cases which have been spoken of, it was not necessary to introduce them by way of illustration. They illustrated nothing except that the Secretary of War and the President had disapproved in two instances the findings of courts-martial. I have been so long out of practice that I have forgotten to apply in all arguments here in the Senate the mere technical notions that we have in practice with regard to the effect of evidence, &c., but I put myself on broader ground. We know with reference to members of courts-martial that they are generally not lawyers; they are not educated judges, and they belong to the same class of men with those whom they try; and it is a fact in many cases in our own Army, and we know it, that however good soldiers we may have among our officers, we have many whose sympathies are not over-strongly with us. It is a fact too well known to be contradicted, and a fact the fatal effects of which we feel every day. I do not say that that is the case with the courts-martial which have been alluded to; I do not apply it to any particular court; but I say these different principles and feelings prevail, and there necessarily may be in many cases such gross errors committed by courts-martial that it becomes the duty of the President, who has the power to disapprove their findings, to exercise that power, and who has the power moreover to strike from the rolls any officer that he finds guilty of a misdemeanor, to strike him from the rolls notwithstanding the finding of a court-martial, and it is not to be imputed to him as a fault, or to the Secretary of War as a fault, and I cannot imagine that there is any occasion in these particular cases for the reasons I have stated to find fault with either the President or the Secretary with reference to them, because the facts are known to the country. In the first case the court-martial found the fact and fixed the punishment, which was a mere nominal punishment, and it was that which the President and the Secretary of War found fault with in reference to the court itself. It is very proper that a court-martial should be dissolved when it is found that the occasion for its being called together no longer exists. That certainly is not to be found fault with by the honorable Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON. It was to try many cases.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That does not appear; and if the Senator puts it as a matter of legal reasoning, I say that does not appear; it was not part of the charge. He now says it was a court established to try many cases. The Secretary of War properly did not choose that it should try any others, when, from the sample he had of the discharge of their duty in that case, he came to the conclusion that they were not fit to try other cases; and in my opinion that course was proper. I am expressing my opinion, not the Senator's opinion, in order that the matter may stand right so far as I am concerned before the country. At the time I gave my approval to that act, when I saw the account in the newspapers of what the finding of the fact was and what the punishment was, I do not think the Secretary would have done his duty if he had suffered a court which made such a finding to exist any longer to try any case. I applauded him then as I applaud him now, and so I did in the other case, for the facts were equally well known, all spread on the record and appeared. What motive the officers could have had, what particular influence they labored under, what feeling existed on their part, I do not know, and I presume the Secretary and the President did not see fit to inquire. They acted, however, upon evidence before them, and that this very court furnished, and they acted wisely and justly, and it was time, in my judgment, that some power should be exerted to bring not only traitors, but those who are almost if possible worse than traitors, to justice, who are preying on the public funds while they are holding office. That was all that was done in that case, and it was necessary by way of example. This is my answer. To be sure the Secretary of War and the President did not see the witnesses, but they knew what facts were found because they were spread upon the record, and were therefore quite as well able to judge as the court-martial was, and very much better able to judge than the court, because they are both eminent lawyers and can judge of the effect of evidence better than a mere military court such as that was or such as would be likely to be gathered together.

I have repeated this simply for the purpose of again replying to what after all is the insinuation of my honorable friend, that there was wrong in these cases on the part of the Government. The Government commits errors undoubtedly. Mr. Stanton is not without his faults; he does not pretend to be, any more than the rest of us; but that he is a most faithful, and devoted, and true public officer, trying to do his duty under immense difficulties and with immense labors, I do believe; and as far as a man can say he knows anything of such a matter, I know. Certainly for an act like this which the public mind when it sees the facts must approve, he ought not to be called to account in this way before the country.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, for myself I am entirely indifferent as to the amendment, whether it is adopted or not. I shall vote against the bill whether it is adopted or not, and I propose to say a few words in regard to it. I want to meet the bill as a whole. I do not consider the bill altered in the slightest degree by the amendment which has been adopted, because the part that is left retains in another form precisely the provisions which have been stricken out; for the bill is that it shall not be lawful for any member of Congress "to receive or agree to receive any compensation whatsoever, directly or indirectly, for any services rendered or to be rendered to any person, either by himself or another, in relation to any proceeding, contract, claim, controversy, charge, accusation, arrest, or other matter or thing in which the United States is a party." That covers everything which has been stricken out in the first clause, and prohibits members of Congress from appearing as counsel anywhere in any matter in which the United States is a party; and to that I want to address myself for a few moments.

This bill makes as a misdemeanor and punishes as a crime, with a fine and imprisonment, the doing of an act which our predecessors from the foundation of the Government have constantly done, unchallenged and unrebuked either by the press, public opinion, or anybody that I know of; and, Mr. President, let me say that upon this subject I feel sensitive. I am an old offender in this line. Of the little fame that belongs to so humble a name as my own, no small share has been acquired in precisely the transactions which this bill proposes to punish as a misdemeanor with fine and imprisonment. I remember, sir, some twelve years ago or more, about the time of the passage of the fugitive slave law, when the Government with its iron heel was trying to trample upon the humblest creatures that walked God's earth in the city of Boston, it was my proud lot to be called by the friends of the humble and lowly from my home in New Hampshire to come down and stand in the city of Boston between the oppressor and his victim.

That was a "matter," a "charge," an "accusation," and an "arrest" in which the Government of the United States was a party; and, sir, let me appeal to my honored friend who sits before me, [Mr. WILSON.] Suppose at that time some gentleman had come to him and said to him, "Mr. WILSON, we hope, in the progress of an enlightened and philanthropic-public opinion, to see such a regeneration of the politics of this land as shall place you one of the honored members of its highest tribunal. We give it to you in charge that the first thing you do when you get to the Senate, shall be to use your influence to prevent this pestilent fellow from New Hampshire from coming down to the courts of the United States here and standing between power and its victims." What would he have said? Why, sir, in the honest indignation of his heart, he would have said, "Keep your rewards to yourselves and let your gifts go to another, but I will maintain the consistency of my character, and the purity of my life, and the instincts of my manly heart; I will be found in the Senate as I have been found everywhere else, the foe of oppression, the friend of right, and the vindicator of the innocent."

And again, sir, I will tell you another case where the United States Government was a party to an "arrest," a "charge," an "accusation." The Government of the United States, under the cruel and arbitrary sway of the slave power, in the madness of its power undertook to shut up Faneuil Hall and to punish as sedition the manly, the noble, the Christian, and the godlike utterances of such men as Theodore Parker and Wendell Phillips. A prostituted grand jury, under the lead of an arbitrary court, found an indictment in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts, against Theodore Parker for seditious words spoken in Faneuil Hall. He was brought to a trial, and, sir, it was the lot of so humble an individual as myself again to go down and stand in the city of Boston between Faneuil Hall and the slave power, and to bid defiance to every attempt and every exertion that they made to close its doors and silence its eloquent utterances. I went there, and, God helping me, triumphed. The cause of right, of free speech, of manly utterance triumphed even in Boston, and by the judgment of the court itself the Government was rebuked; the infamous attempt was frustrated, and Liberty again walked erect, as she did in the earlier days of our history, through the streets of Boston. And, sir, what would the Senator from Massachusetts have said if the friends that elevated him to place and power had come to him deprecating this action and said to him, "We want the first act you do when you take your seat on the floor of the Senate of the United States to be to make punishable with imprisonment and fine any appearance to defend anybody anywhere against any 'arrest,' 'charge,' or 'accusation,' where the United States is a party?" Sir, he would have sooner gone to the place of departed spirits than come into this Senate upon any such price.

In legislating upon this subject we ought to remember that parties fluctuate. The party that is in power here to-day, but a little while ago was in a minority. God knows that they may be in a minority again. But, sir, minority or majority, if I know myself I will preserve in the humble sphere in which I act a consistent record. No man shall reproach me or those that I leave behind me to whom my fame will be dear, the accusation that in power I did one thing and out of power another.

Let me ask you again, sir, where is the necessity for any such legislation as this? What abuse has been practiced? Any? If there has, I have not known it. The most illustrious men that have sat in this body; nay, sir, the most illustrious men over the water, the great statesman and the great lawyer of England, I refer to Lord Brougham, commenced his career when he was a member of the House of Commons in Great Britain, and acquired his fame by the zeal and the ability and the success with which he defended criminals against charges brought by the Government. And in a later time, when the gigantic energies of the British Government, with all its power and all its patronage, were brought to bear upon the unfortunate head of one poor woman, and she a forger, when she was made the victim, and the whole power of the Crown and the Parliament was brought to bear upon her, Lord Brougham, to the honor of himself, to the everlasting honor of the profession to which he belonged, stood unaided and alone breasting the storm with which power and oppression would crush his female client, and again he triumphed. Pass this bill, sir, and you in substance declare that that glorious exhibition, the most glorious to which human power and human eloquence ever ministered, and all transactions like that should be punishable by fine and imprisonment, and you thus cast a stigma upon the noblest record of our race.

Sir, I know that it is easy to get up popular clamor. Ever since I have known anything of politics—and I have known as much of it in New Hampshire as anywhere else—it has been fashionable, constantly fashionable, to be throwing out slings and insinuations against the character of lawyers. I have known before to-day men eminent in the profession who, when party spirit ran high, and it was popular to indulge in such kind of slang—I have known some of the honored heads of the profession that have forgotten their manhood and their self-respect, and have given themselves up blind tools to the madness of party spirit. Sir, I say it, I say it openly, a majority of the members of this body are lawyers, a majority of the other House, I think, are of the same profession; and from the earliest period of our history such has been the character, the bearing, the conduct of the legal profession that, in despite of calumny, in despite of party jeers and taunts and threats, they have kept on the even tenor of their way, commanding the public confidence and the public respect as no other class of the community have. And let me say, sir, that the history of the legal profession in the worst of times has been such as to vindicate the justice of that confidence. In bad times, in evil times, when might has triumphed over right, when power has sought its victims, and its victims have suffered, who, in the history of this country, in the history of England, in the history of any country that had even the semblance of a free constitution, have ever stood up as the defenders of constitutional and civil liberty like this profession that it is now proposed—I say it; I must speak as history will understand it—to ostracize by the passage of such a bill as this.

Sir, I shall vote against it, if I vote alone. I will go from this Chamber, and from this life if it be necessary, before I will consent by my vote to pass a stigma upon the reputation of the illustrious dead, or a reproach against the illustrious living. There is no necessity, there is no call for it.

And now let me appeal again to the members of this body that now constitute its majority. What is your history in respect to this very matter? Before the present party came into power there was no legislation upon this subject; but from the moment that you came into power the legislation of this country seems to have proceeded upon the assumption that if there were any scoundrels in the land, if there was anybody that neither feared God nor regarded man, but whose sole object was to filch from the Treasury, it was members of Congress; and so your statute-books are covered over with statutes making this and that illegal, which before was not so adjudged to be. Since I have been a member of this body I have seen week after week, and month after month, an advertisement in the journals of this city, the National Intelligencer and some others, of members of the Senate in high standing proffering their services to anybody that had claims against the Government, or against any department of it, and at that time it excited no reproach. That has been condemned now, and against that condemnation I have not a word to say; but let me tell you that if you pass this act you virtually pass a sentence of condemnation against yourselves. It is a confession before the country that the integrity of a profession that has hitherto been above reproach, that has maintained itself in all time against popular clamor, is now gone, that their self-respect is abandoned, and that it is necessary to guard their conduct even in matters which heretofore have required no legislation at all with penal enactments of fine and imprisonment.

Mr. President, I shall be very loth, loth indeed, if you pass this act, to subject myself to its censure, but there are some things that must be preserved at all hazards, and among them are certain individual inherent constitutional rights. Among these rights are the right of a full, and free, and fair trial. Let me ask if the Senate are blind or deaf to the teachings of history? Where has danger come from in times past? Where is this necessity of now submitting the Senate at the feet of the military power? Does the history of the world teach you that civil liberty is in more danger from the arts and chicanery of lawyers than it is from the encroachments and oppressions of military despotism? I would sustain the President, I would sustain the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy and any of the heads of Departments, in the time of this great emergency, in doing a great many things that I think should not be tolerated in time of peace; but I cannot be blind to the teachings of history, and if history has a lesson to teach anybody, it is that the danger to liberty is from the aggressions of the military power rather than from anything else.

Let me refer again to the case to which I alluded before in Boston. Suppose that when Theodore Parker was indicted by the grand jury of the circuit court of the United States in Boston the Administration at that time had seen fit to do what has since been done, and had said that his seditious words, which were subversive of the Government and its authority, should instead of being tried by the civil courts be tried by court-martial? The military power is competent to that, and it has done it. Then, sir, a defense against the attempt to brand as a crime free speech in the ancient cradle of American liberty, to volunteer or to appear in such a defense as that, would have been a crime.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to suggest to my friend that both of the cases he has mentioned are not excluded by this bill. He may practice in such cases as much as he chooses.

Mr. HALE. My friend is totally mistaken. Let me read the bill as it is. The bill is not altered at all by the amendments in the slightest degree. I will read the bill. It does not allow a member of Congress "to receive any compensation whatsoever, directly or indirectly, for any services rendered, or to be rendered, to any person, either by himself or another, in relation to any proceeding, contract, claim, controversy, charge, accusation, arrest, or other matter or thing in which the United States is a party, or directly or indirectly interested."

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before what?

Mr. HALE. "Before any department," &c. That is qualified by the sentence after "or," in the twentieth line.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is a part of the same sentence.

Mr. HALE. Let the construction of that be as it may, it is just exactly the same. I was putting the case of the Government undertaking to try by court-martial those whom they formerly tried in the civil courts, and then there would be no right of appearing, no right of defense—

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator in the beginning gave us, with a great deal of eloquence, the account of two cases in which he stood between oppression and the oppressed; and he said that by the bill he would be precluded for the future from appearing in similar cases. My answer to that is that those were both cases in the civil courts of the country, and there is nothing in this bill which prevents the Senator, or any other Senator or Representative, from appearing in the civil courts of the country.

Mr. HALE. I am a little surprised that a gentleman ordinarily so accurate as the Senator is should make that statement.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will read the bill he will find that I am right.

Mr. HALE. I will read to your heart's content. I said when I got up that I intended to address myself to the whole bill, and the whole bill is:

"That no member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives of the United States shall, during his continuance in office, hereafter appear or act as counsel, attorney, or agent in any cause or proceeding, civil or criminal, in any court."

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is all stricken out.

Mr. HALE. That part is not stricken out. It has been recommended by the Committee of the Whole to be stricken out, but it is in the bill before the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senate have voted to strike it out.

Mr. HALE. The Senate have voted it when? In committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We all agree to that.

Mr. HALE. But it is in the bill before the Senate, and was the original proposition; and when I began my address, I said that I should address myself to the whole bill. That is the proposition which is before the Senate now. It is true that the Committee of the Whole have recommended that that part be stricken out; but it stands and is in the bill.

But the question I was discussing when the honorable Senator from Maine broke in upon me was this: suppose the Government should undertake now to try in courts-martial those matters which they tried in 1851 in the civil courts, this bill would apply; it would apply then to just exactly those cases, so that the argument is just as good, because we know that the Government does assume the authority to try men for seditious words, before courts-martial. I am not saying whether it is right or wrong; but I am speaking of the fact that the Government of this country at this day does assume the power of trying men for seditious words before courts-martial. I am far from saying that they have not the right to do it; I am far from saying that it is not wise to do it; but I do say that it is neither wise nor right, in case the Government assumes to try before courts-martial those offenses which have been ordinarily tried in civil courts, to preclude members of the Senate and House of Representatives from appearing before them.

I do not know that anything which I can say will retard or delay or prevent the action of the Senate upon this subject. I presume that it will not; I presume that the bill will be passed, and the honorable Senator from Maine says he would have preferred it in the manner in which it was originally presented; and that is total and entire exclusion of members of Congress from any practice in any court in any suit to which the Government may be a party.

Some gentlemen, I think the honorable Senator from Maryland and others, have said that this is a matter which will do very little injury to those who will be interested by it. I care not whether it will effect injury to them or not so long as in my humble judgment it is wrong. There is a wrong principle involved in it, and whenever such a principle is involved I am opposed to it.

I do not know, sir, that I have occasion to say anything more upon the subject. I do not know that I can elucidate it any further. I do not pretend to be less selfish than the rest of mankind. I am selfish. I am a lawyer by profession, and I work for fees; and the larger the fee that I can get honorably the better I like it. I have no concealment upon that subject. I am not one of those to whom the good things of fortune have been so bountifully showered down that I can afford when I am not here in the Halls of Congress to retire at ease and live at my pleasure without doing anything. I work. I work in the courts. I hold myself out for engagements whenever they come. I have received more or less almost every year. I hold that this is a legitimate part of my profession. If extraordinary courts are instituted I think it is more than ever incumbent upon those who stand as advocates to interpose every defense which they may in those extraordinary courts, more than they would before the ordinary tribunals.

Sir, when power was in the ascendancy and principle was trampled under foot in the dark periods of British history, when extraordinary tribunals, or commissions, or whatever they might be called, were instituted in England, would the honorable Senator from Maine or would this honorable Senate have then said that it should be a criminal offense for the advocates of England, at a time when power was enlarging itself and rights were being contracted and principles trodden under foot, to take part in the contest, and to require that they should retire from the contest, and let power have its own way? No, sir. When the ordinary tribunals of the country, the customary courts, are open, those charged with offenses should be defended there; but when, from purposes of public

State necessity or of public State policy, it becomes necessary to institute new and extraordinary modes of proceeding, instead of its being proper that the ordinary defenses should be abandoned, and the defendants shorn of their full right of defense, in my humble judgment they should be enlarged; and it is not only the right but the duty of every man belonging to an honorable profession to stand by the victim, whoever may be upon the other side.

Sir, where is the necessity of ostracizing lawyers and advocates? Why not reach your prohibition out to merchants? Why not prohibit them from exercising their legitimate business during time of war? Why not apply it to mechanics and to everybody else? Why single out lawyers? Have there been, sir, within your knowledge, within the knowledge of the Judiciary Committee or of anybody, any great abuses practiced that ought to be remedied? No, sir. It is nothing more nor less than an attempt to interpose extraordinary prohibitions in the case of trials that are instigated by the Government.

As I said before, I would sustain the Government, but in sustaining the Government I trust it is not necessary to believe—for if it is I cannot sustain them—that everybody they employ is as immaculate as the angels. I believe that when you are spending the amount of money that you now spend there will from necessity be bad men, corrupt men, who will fasten themselves upon the Government and obtain place and power, and resort to bad and evil practices. I have a very high respect for Mr. Stanton. I believe that he is a patriotic and upright and honorable man, and a man of great talents; and I will say that there is one talent that he has in a remarkable degree, I think in a greater degree than any man I ever knew, and that is, when there is a mean thing to do, he can get the meanest men to do it. [Laughter.]

And now, Mr. President, having said thus much, I leave this case to the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to say one word in reply to the honorable Senator, lest I should be misunderstood. I certainly have made no attack upon the profession; I do not think this bill makes any attack upon the profession as a general rule. The answer which I have to make to the Senator is simply this: as I said in the beginning, the lawyers in this and the other branch of Congress are almost an infinitesimal part of the lawyers in the country; if we embraced even a very large proportion or any considerable proportion of the legal lore and legal ability of the country, there might be something in what the honorable Senator has said as to our duties in defending liberty outside of this Hall; but the Senator well knows that in the part of the country we come from there are many members of the profession, large numbers of them, very much abler than I am, to say the least—not more able perhaps than the honorable Senator—and as honest and patriotic and upright men as he is himself. Sir, we may safely leave the business of defending criminals and defending liberty in the courts of the country to the multitudes of men we have in all sections of the United States who are able for that defense, and there is no want of them anywhere, if we have something else to do.

Sir, have we not a sufficient theater upon which to exhibit our love of liberty by standing here in the view of the whole country to speak for it? Is there no opportunity afforded us as Senators of the United States to defend here the rights of the people and the principles of liberty which have come down to us from our ancestors? Is this theater too contracted for the honorable Senator? Can he not make his voice heard here? Is there any necessity that he should go before a court-martial in order to defend the liberty of the country and the freedom of the press and the freedom of the people? Why, sir, I had no idea but that this theater was large enough even for him. It is certainly too large for me. I find myself, with all the labor which I am able to give to my duties here, unable to accomplish so much as I would wish, and I certainly do not feel that the rights of the people at home, in the courts of the country, even as against the Government, are in any danger because they have placed me in another position and called upon me there to guard the great interests which are submitted to all men whom the people have placed in positions like ours. Therefore, although I have listened to and have been charmed as I always am by the eloquence of the honorable Senator on the great subject of human liberty and the teachings of history, I confess that I cannot feel in my heart that liberty would suffer anything even if we were prohibited, himself and myself, from appearing before courts-martial for pay.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 36.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I desire simply to say a word. I believe it is proper in making a new law to inquire first what the old law is; second, the mischiefs; and then to look at the remedy. Now, as I understand the mischief which is to be corrected here, it is that members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives are in the habit of appearing in cases where the United States are concerned. I suppose there can be no mischief in their appearing on behalf of the United States. I suppose there is nobody who complains of that here. If there be any mischief at all it must exist in their appearing before certain tribunals, not the judicial tribunals of the country, against the United States. If that is the mischief, then I propose to read the law as it stands already. I read from the act of the 26th of February, 1853:

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That any Senator or Representative in Congress who, after the passage of this act, shall, for compensation paid or to be paid, certain or contingent, act as agent or attorney for prosecuting any claim or claims against the United States, or shall in any manner or by any means for such compensation aid or assist in the prosecution, or support of any such claim or claims, or shall receive any gratuity, or any share of or interest in any claim from any claimant against the United States, with intent to aid or assist, or in consideration of having aided or assisted in the prosecution of such claim, shall be liable to an indictment as for a misdemeanor in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, and, on conviction, shall pay a fine not exceeding $5,000, or suffer imprisonment in the penitentiary not exceeding one year, or both, as the court in its discretion shall adjudge."

I should think that was severe enough. It is almost equal in its severity to the punishment that we inflicted on treason a few years ago. Now the question for our consideration is whether we will prevent Senators and Representatives from appearing for the United States. If there be no mischief in that, then this bill is useless except as to another item, and that is the item of courts-martial, because that is the only place, I believe, where they are not prohibited now from appearing.

I suppose, Mr. President, that the true rule on this subject is that a lawyer has a right to appear before any regularly constituted court. Now, is a court-martial that kind of court? Is that a kind of court before which we can be trusted? I have never appeared before a court-martial, and I have never found any place indeed where my influence as a Senator seemed to help me anything beyond that which I possessed before I became a Senator. I think that it is casting a reflection on the officers of the Army who are now defending us in the battle-field, who are now periling their lives day after day for us, to say that when they are constituted into a court-martial, and when they sit in judgment on their fellow-officers they could be influenced by any such considerations as have been suggested here as a reason for passing this bill. If that be true, sir, then indeed the country is in danger, and if that be true it is too late now to help it by legislation.

But there is another view of this subject. When a soldier or officer from the State of Pennsylvania is brought before a court-martial here I shall defend him. As was said by the honorable Senator from Maryland the other day, I shall defend him with or without fee. I shall not stop to ask him for compensation. But what is the effect of this bill? It is to take away from him a right which he possesses now by law; and that is to compel me to do it. He has a right now to compel my service there as a lawyer by tendering me the proper compensation; and he may desire to do so. That will be the effect of it, and that will be about all the result of it. The result will be that perhaps no gentleman, if a Senator or Representative, will go before one of these courts-martial, because he will not want to incur the suspicion that he is going there for compensation when the law forbids him to receive any, knowing very well that the malice of mankind will attribute the worst motive to him.

I hope, therefore, that the Senate will throw out this bill and not pass it.

There is another feature in it that is exceedingly significant of the times, as it seems to me. That which this bill makes a crime was yesterday innocent. It was a thing, not that the humblest or the worst of mankind could do with impunity, but it was a thing which honorable Senators of the United States could do without the imputation of crime. To-day it is to be a crime, not malum in se but simply malum prohibitum. How is it to be punished? It may be punished almost as treason is made punishable under the amended act we passed some two years ago, "by a fine not exceeding $10,000 and by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, at the discretion of the court trying the same." Why, sir, this is worse than the punishment that is inflicted for the most violent and aggravated assault and battery in any of the States; worse than is inflicted for assault and battery with intent to kill, in nineteen out of twenty cases; worse than is inflicted for a larceny; worse in the way of fine than is inflicted for horse stealing. It may be supposed, however, that we can stand it, but I have very great doubts about that.

In my judgment, this part of the bill is obnoxious to another and a fatal objection. The Constitution of the United States provides, in a section derived strictly from Magna Charta, that this kind of fine shall never be levied. "Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted." What is an "excessive fine?" An "excessive fine" is a technical term as well known to the law as that of larceny or any other legal term susceptible of exact definition. It is that fine which, in the language of the law, saved to the freeholder his tenement, to the merchant his merchandise, to the villain his wainage, and it was formerly assessed by a jury in order that it might be determined from the condition of the man how much he could pay without touching the sustenance of his wife and children. They are not to be punished for the offenses of the husband and father; and yet this bill would do it, because this fine might be imposed in such a way as to sweep away the inheritance from the children of those who are convicted. I think it is atrocious in its severity.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, the debate which has ensued on this bill is an illustration of the truth that we know not what is before us. I had no expectation that we should be led into a discussion of the great principles of liberty and in defense of the legal profession when I called the attention of the Senate to the bill, and supposed that we could dispose of it in a very few minutes.

The Senator from New Hampshire has made, as he always does, a very eloquent speech against a provision not in the bill as it is before us. He says that before the Senate struck out a provision in the bill it contained a clause that was very objectionable. The Senate has stricken it out. When the question comes up whether it is to be put back again, his speech, perhaps, may be applicable to it. But he has made his speech on a proposition to insert the words "court-martial" in the bill. That is the only question pending.

The Senator from Pennsylvania, not satisfied to discuss that proposition, has gone into a general discussion of the rights secured by Magna Charta. He says that this bill provides severe and unusual punishments. Why, sir, the punishment is left in the discretion of the court. The Constitution, it is not to be presumed, will be violated by the court. The court may assess a fine of a dollar and imprisonment for an hour, if, in its judgment, that is the proper punishment for a person convicted under the act; or it may assess the fine without imprisonment. Because the bill authorizes a punishment of a greater degree to be inflicted, it does not follow that the court will impose the heaviest penalty provided by the law.

But, sir, this provision as to penalty, if it is to be discussed, is taken from a statute passed at a former session of Congress prohibiting members of Congress and officers of the Government of the United States from taking consideration for procuring contracts, offices, or places from the United States; and the punishment prescribed by the bill now under consideration is precisely the same as that prescribed by the act to which I have just referred. It was thought necessary some years ago to pass a law to prohibit members of Congress from receiving compensation for procuring contracts or places for others, using their influence in that way, selling their influence.

Since this bill has been under consideration I have been informed that money has been paid to procure recommendations to West Point. If that be so, I trust the offender will be brought to justice. Since this bill has been pending, I have heard that officers in the Departments of this Government have received money in order to facilitate claims that were passing through the Departments of the Government. I have heard that where there were many claims pending and it was a great object on the part of the contractors to have their claims acted upon and passed at the earliest day, they have given money to clerks in order to shuffle up their claims, so that they could be acted upon sooner than others.

These are the abuses that we are to guard against by this bill. The Senator from Pennsylvania denounces the bill. He says he knows of no mischief to be remedied. Are not the practices I have just stated mischiefs? Is it not time, when the country is rife with these statements and when the confidence of the people is being impaired in the transactions of their Government, that we should legislate to stop such abuses?

Mr. COWAN. May I ask, is there any provision for punishing that in this bill?

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is.

Mr. COWAN. In the bill now before the Senate?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir, in the bill now before the Senate. It provides that no "head of a Department, head of a bureau, clerk, or other officer of the Government" shall "receive or agree to receive any compensation whatsoever, directly or indirectly, for any services rendered or to be rendered to any person" in reference to a matter that is pending before a Department.

This is not a bill to prevent attorneys from practicing in courts of law, but it is a bill to prevent Representatives and Senators in Congress and officers of the Government who are paid for their services from receiving a compensation for advocating claims in the Departments and before the bureaus of the Government, and before courts-martial. That is the particular question that is pending.

Now, sir, I was in favor of extending this bill so as to embrace courts-martial for the two reasons which have been mentioned here in the Senate. In the first place the officers composing a court-martial are officers who are likely to be in a position to ask favors of the Senate. They are made up always of military officers. We all know that military officers are seeking promotion, and all the officers of the Army of the United States are passing in review before the Senate, receiving their confirmation from the Senate every few years. Hence I thought it was improper that Senators having to pass upon these officers should practice before them lest they might exercise an undue and improper influence. Another reason, which has been already stated, is that the proceedings of these courts-martial are often brought in review before Congress. We are daily passing resolutions calling for their proceedings to be submitted to us upon which to base legislation. I thought it was proper, therefore, to embrace courts-martial in the provisions of this bill; and that is the direct question which is now pending.

I am sorry that we have taken up so much time on the bill; but as we have had it so long under consideration I trust we may now hold on to it until we dispose of it one way or the other. I trust, also, that the Senate will let us come to a vote, for I think this question whether courts-martial shall be embraced within the provisions of the bill has been very thoroughly discussed, and must be understood by every member of the Senate.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary, in line twenty-two, after the word "Department," to insert the words "court-martial."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twenty-six after the word "not" to strike out the words "less than," and to fill the blank by inserting the words "exceeding ten thousand;" and in line twenty-seven after the word "not" to strike out the words "less than," and to fill the blank by inserting "exceeding two;" and after the word "years" to insert the words "at the discretion of the court trying the same;" so that the clause will read:

And any person offending against any provision of this act shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000, and by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, at the discretion of the court trying the same, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

MR. COWAN. I move to strike out all after the word "no," in the twelfth line, to the word "any" in the fourteenth line, in the words, "member of the Senate or House of Representatives shall, after the election and during his continuance in office, nor shall any;" so that the clause will read:

That no head of a Department, head of a bureau, clerk, or other officer of the Government, shall receive or agree to receive any compensation whatsoever, &c.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment. The yeas and nays were ordered.

MR. SAULSBURY. I regret that it has been found necessary in the judgment of the majority of the Senate to present this bill for the consideration of the Senate. I have always supposed that any person who had the confidence of his State sufficiently to cause him to be chosen a member of this body ought to be above all suspicion. Inasmuch, however, as that is found not to be true, according to the judgment of the majority of the Senate at this time, I shall vote for this bill as reported by the committee without any amendment. For one, I can freely say that since I have been in public life I have never received any fee, or acted in any case in which the United States was concerned; and I can say what few men can say, that I have never recommended any man to office, nor asked for a contract for any man.

MR. COWAN. The result of this amendment will be to leave Senators and Representatives obnoxious to the provisions of the act to which I referred the attention of Senators some time ago, the act of 1853. That makes it a penal offense for them to prosecute claims against the United States. That, I think, is enough. I think, when that law is upon the statute-book, that that is a sufficient protection and a sufficient assurance to the community that members of Congress will not abuse their privilege for filthy lucre.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

MR. JOHNSON (when Mr. HICKS's name was called) said: I am sorry to inform the Senate that the absence of my colleague is caused by very severe illness. He will not probably be here again during the session.

The call of the roll was then concluded, and the result announced—yeas 10, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Harding, Hendricks, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Riddle, and Wright—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Clark, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Sanlisbury, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—28.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. How shall the vote be taken?

MR. TRUMBULL. I suppose the vote may be taken on concurring in all the amendments together unless some Senator desires a separate vote.

MR. HENDRICKS. I ask for a separate vote on the amendment in relation to courts-martial.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be reserved, and the question on the others will be taken together, if there is no objection. The question is on concurring in all the other amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The remainder of the amendments were concurred in.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on concurring in the amendment reserved, which was in line twenty-two of the bill, after the word "Department," to insert the words "court-martial."

MR. JOHNSON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

MR. VAN WINKLE. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. WILLEY] has been absent from the city since Friday night.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Carlile, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, and Wilson—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Collamer, Cowan, Foot, Hale, Harding, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Riddle, and Wright—14.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

MR. FOSTER. I propose that the title be amended so as to read: A bill relating to members of Congress, heads of Departments, and other officers of the Government.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so amended, if there be no objection.

PAY OF COLORED TROOPS.

MR. WILSON. I now move to take up the joint resolution (S. No. 23.) to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution; the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. CONNESS, in line nine, after the word "service," to strike out the words, "during the whole time in which they shall be or shall have been in such service," and to insert the words "from and after the passage of this act;" so that the resolution will read:

That all persons of color who have been or may be mustered into the military service of the United States shall receive the same uniform, clothing, arms, equipments, camp equipage, rations, medical and hospital attendance, pay and emoluments, other than bounty, as other soldiers of the regular or volunteer forces of the United States of like arm of the service, from and after the passage of this act; and that every person of color who shall hereafter be mustered into the service shall receive such sums in bounty as the President shall order in the different States and parts of the United States, not exceeding $100.

MR. FOSTER. The amendment will make the resolution prospective only. As it stands in the text it is prospective and retrospective. That is the difference. It brings up the question whether we shall pay the colored troops from the time they entered the service as we pay white troops, or whether we shall so pay them only from the time of the passage of the resolution. It was debated at some length a day or two ago when the question was before the Senate, perhaps when it was in connection with another bill, and I do not propose to prolong the discussion, except to say that it seems to me we ought not to make this amendment. We ought to pass the resolution as it is.

Two considerations at once suggest themselves to us in this connection: the justice and the expediency of the measure. I have heard no member express the opinion that were it an original question, it would not be right to pass the resolution, and pay the black troops as we pay white ones; but inasmuch as we enacted a law a year or two ago in which we made a distinction, giving the black troops but ten dollars a month, when we paid the white troops thirteen dollars, we are told that justice is fully done by paying the black troops ten dollars a month up to this time, and after this time paying them the same that we do whites. It is said that that is all that justice requires, because that was the law, and they went into the service under that law. Now, sir, were it between party and party, and they had made a contract under the law, there would certainly be a show of force in that claim; but when the claim is made as against us who made the law, and when we agree that the law is not a just and fair one, it seems to me we ought to change it and to pay these men as we pay the white troops, although the strict letter of the law may not entitle them to the same amount. This is supposing they have gone into the service under the law understanding it, and knowing that they were to receive but ten dollars a month.

But, Mr. President, that is not the fact. These black troops did not understand that they were going into the service and to receive a compensation less than that paid to the white troops. It is true that the letter of the law made a difference, and if they read the statutes of the United States they would see there was a difference. But, sir, how many of these black men ever had access to those statutes? How many of them could have read them if they had? Most of them were born and bred where it was penal to teach them to read, and where, had they been found with a book in their hands, the penalty would have been the raw-hide or the branding-iron. Shall we now stand up here and insist that these men, having gone into the service under a statute of the United States fixing their pay at ten dollars a month shall receive no more because that is the contract? Sir, it was not the contract. They did not so understand it. The instructions which were sent from the War Department and the assurances made by the officers who enlisted these men were that they should be paid and treated in all respects as the white troops were.

MR. FESSENDEN. Let me ask my friend how he knows that fact; because if that can be established it would have an important bearing on this question.

MR. FOSTER. I believe it is admitted in regard to several departments; the department I believe of South Carolina, where instructions were sent from the War Office to enlist black troops, or, if not direct instructions, at least authority was given to General Saxton, the military governor of that State, to enlist black troops. He was authorized, as I understand it, and I supposed it was agreed that he was authorized to assure those troops that they should receive the same compensation as the white troops received.

MR. FESSENDEN. How was it in Maryland?

MR. FOSTER. I believe the same, but I am not so sure of it. In regard to South Carolina, I think it is admitted that the faith of the Government through its officers was pledged to those black men that their compensation, their rations, their clothing, &c., should be the same as those of the whites. The Government required from them the same service as from the white troops, and stipulated that they would render the same compensation. I believe the good faith and honor of the Government were pledged under these circumstances, and that it would be an evasion to fall back upon the written law and hold those men to the statute instead of carrying out fairly these assurances made to them by the officers of the Government.

Mr. President, these black men have not, as I insist, had the privilege of knowing what the law was. They could not know. They must have relied, they did rely upon the assurances of our public officers. I know it is said that Governor Andrew had not authority to pledge the faith of the Government of the United States to the black troops enlisted in Massachusetts that they should receive the same compensation as whites. Suppose we grant it. Suppose we grant that Governor Andrew, as the chief executive of a State, could not pledge the faith of the United States, still nobody doubts the fact that he acted in good faith as a man of honor and uprightness, as he is, and as a patriotic man, and that the blacks enlisted there gave full faith and credit to his assurance that they should be paid as the white troops were paid. I for one am disposed to stand by that assurance, even if made by a State and not by a national officer, though I think his instructions authorized him to make it. I think justice requires that we carry it out. Justice to any class, even of whites, it seems to me, would require it; but justice especially requires it when we consider that we are dealing with men a great portion of whom, as I have suggested, were never taught to read, and never could, therefore, know what the written law of the country was. We ought to treat them differently from what we treat men who are intelligent, educated, and able to ascertain what the law was by actual examination. The rule to be applied in the one case is very different from what ought to be applied in the other. This is on the simple ground of justice.

And, sir, if it is just to do this it is certainly expedient, for justice is always the highest expediency. But passing by for the time that maxim, let us look at the expediency of paying these men, not only for the future but for the past, as we pay white troops. If we say to these black men, "We take you on an examination as to your condition just as rigorous as that applied to white men; we exact from you the same service; we place you under the same military law; we subject you to the same discipline; we call upon you to put your lives in peril, just as we call upon white men to peril theirs; but we consider you an inferior class, and we will not pay you as much as we pay white men," is there any more direct way than that to make these men greatly inferior to other men in service, much more inferior than they would otherwise be? Do we not make the fact true by this course, however it might be? Do we not make these men inferior by this legislation, even if they were not so before?

Sir, I believe that all men who are called upon to serve their country in the field, who take arms in their hands and go into the ranks, putting life in peril, all men who serve in the same grade, should be regarded alike and should be paid alike—that it is a most inexpedient thing to undertake to discriminate between them, and especially on the ground of different complexions, and say to a man with a black skin, "You shall put your life in peril for ten dollars a month but we will give a white man thirteen dollars a month." Why not discriminate on the difference of color in the hair as well as in the color of the skin? Is not the one as sensible as the other? If the men are fit for service they should be regarded alike, treated alike, paid alike, and if it is just and right to pay these men for the future as we pay whites it is but just and right to pay them for their past services as we pay the whites. We cannot do the one, that is, pay them in the future, and refuse to pay them in the past, without an inconsistency, without creating among them such dissatisfaction and discontent with the service that will cost the Government very much more than it will to make up their back pay. Let this be refused to them, if they continue in service they will continue with a dissatisfied spirit. They will feel that you have fixed on them the mark of inferiority. They will feel that they have not been honestly dealt with. Most of them, credulous from their previous education and character, relying upon the assurances of men to whom they gave their confidence, and not relying on the law, will consider that they have been duped and defrauded and cheated into the service. Let that feeling be spread abroad among fifty thousand soldiers, (for that is about the number we have got of this class of troops,) and who can estimate the evil which will be produced in the armies of the United States?

It will cost us $1,000,000, more or less, to pay these men from the time they entered the service up to the present time, so as to make their compensation equal to that of white troops. Will $1,000,000 compensate for the dissatisfaction, the almost mutinous spirit which will be rife among these men if you thus deny them justice? No, sir; millions will not pay for it, and millions will never remove the stain of bad faith from the Government if we do not pay them. It will be a reproach and a shame to our Government.

Putting the question, therefore, either on the ground of justice or on the ground of expediency, it seems to me this amendment should not be made; but the resolution should be passed making these men, so far as compensation is concerned, equal with the white troops.

Mr. SUMNER. I am grateful to the Senator from Connecticut for his admirable argument on this question; and yet, it seems to me, if he will pardon me, that even in point of law he has not stated the case as strongly in favor of this obligation as it might be stated. It may be remembered that when this discussion was closing the other day I ventured to throw out some remarks to this effect, that there were evidently two classes of cases: the first, where enlistments in good faith were made under the statute of 1861; and the second, where the enlistments were made under the statute of 1862.

In point of law it seems obvious, if the enlistments were made in good faith under the statute of 1861 and there was no legal objection to making those enlistments under that statute, then the United States are bound. If, on the contrary, they were made under the subsequent statute, then it is simply a question of policy and expediency whether we shall make this payment. The whole subject is open to discussion, first, in the light of sentiment, which may involve expediency and policy; and secondly, in the light of law. I do not propose to say anything upon it in the first aspect except to make one remark: that our country at this moment can ill afford to take the responsibility of refusing an act of justice to colored soldiers whom it has allowed to shed their blood in its cause. The soul repudiates in advance any such sacrifice; for sacrifice it will be, at once of honor and of interest. I do not follow out this idea; but I pass at once to the second aspect of the question, which I called the question of law; and there I differ from my learned friend from Connecticut when I say that there are certain colored regiments in the field who, in point of law, are entitled to the full wages of thirteen dollars a month.

Mr. FOSTER. If the Senator will pardon me, I insisted on that fact, and said they were enlisted, not under the law, but under instructions from the Department authorizing the officers to enlist them on the same terms that white troops were enlisted, which would be thirteen dollars per month.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well. I still understood the Senator to imply that perhaps in point of law there might be some doubt whether the Government was liable for the thirteen dollars a month. I propose to carry the argument a little further than the Senator did, and to show by calling attention for one moment to the statutes—not at any great length—that under the statutes themselves the Government is obliged to pay certain regiments thirteen dollars a month.

I begin with the Massachusetts fifty-fourth and fifty-fifth regiments; and these may be taken as examples. I have before me the actual order under which those two regiments were raised. It is in the following words:

"WAR DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON CITY,
January 26, 1863.

"Ordered, That Governor Andrew, of Massachusetts, is authorized, until further orders, to raise such number of volunteer companies of artillery for duty in the forts of Massachusetts and elsewhere, and such corps of infantry for the volunteer military service, as he may find convenient, such volunteers to be enlisted for three years"—

Mark, sir, if you please, the period of service; "for three years"—

"or until sooner discharged, and may include persons of African descent, organized into separate corps. He will make the usual needful requisitions on the appropriate staff bureaus and officers for the proper transportation, organization, supplies, subsistence, arms, equipments, of such volunteers."

"EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War."

Now, on the face of this order, the Governor of Massachusetts is empowered to raise certain regiments in the volunteer service of the United States for three years. Under what statute? Under no other statute than the statute of 1861, for it was under that statute that the organization for three years was authorized. If you come to the later statute—and to that I ask particular attention—of July 17, 1862, which contains a special provision with reference to African troops, you will find that it is to raise troops for nine months. The words are as follows:

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, in addition to the volunteer forces which he is now authorized by law to raise, to accept the services of any number of volunteers, not exceeding one hundred thousand, as infantry, for a period of nine months, unless sooner discharged."

And then, sir, in section twelve of this same statute, the President is further empowered to employ persons of African descent. In section fifteen we come to the question of pay. That section I will read:

"And be it further enacted, That all persons who have been or shall be hereafter enrolled in the service of the United States under this act"—

"Under this act"—an act authorizing enrollments for nine months, not for three years—

"shall receive the pay and rations now allowed by law to soldiers according to their respective grades: Provided, That persons of African descent, who under this law shall be employed, shall receive ten dollars per month and one ration, three dollars of which monthly pay may be in clothing."

Mr. HOWE. What page do you read from?

Mr. SUMNER. I read from page 599, volume twelve, of the Statutes at Large.

Now, sir, you have the question presented to you precisely: under what statute were these enlistments made? Were they made under the nine months' statute, or were they made under the three years' statute? Look, in order to answer that question, at the order of the War Department:

"Ordered, That Governor Andrew, of Massachusetts, is authorized, until further orders, to raise such number of volunteer companies of artillery for duty in the forts of Massachusetts and elsewhere, and such corps of infantry for the volunteer military service, as he may find convenient, such volunteers to be enlisted for three years or until sooner discharged."

Here are no nine months' men. There is nobody under the second statute; but all are clearly under the first by the plain language of the order. And this is none the less so even if the second statute, so far as Africans are concerned, may be interpreted to sanction a longer term of enlistment.

Mark well that "all persons who have been or shall be enrolled in the service of the United States under this act shall receive the pay and rations now allowed by law to soldiers," (section fifteen.) But were not the soldiers of the fifty-fourth and fifty-fifth Massachusetts regiments "enrolled in the service of the United States?" Unquestionably, if troops ever were enrolled.

But it is the proviso that follows which causes the mischief. "Persons of African descent who, under this law, shall be employed, shall receive ten dollars," &c.

It is said that these colored soldiers were "employed." That is all. Not "enrolled;" but "employed;" and on this distinction the promise of Governor Andrew, in the name of the national Government, and the honest expectations of the soldiers, are to be set aside.

The order of the Secretary of War is for "volunteer companies of artillery," also for "corps of infantry," "to be enlisted for three years," "and may include persons of African descent." The persons of African descent are to be included in the "corps of infantry enlisted." Such persons are in advance declared to be enlisted men. And yet the argument which denies them their well-earned wages asserts that they are only "employed" and not enlisted. But if they are "employed" then are the "corps of infantry" with which they are included "employed" also.

To me the conclusion seems irresistible, on the face of these facts, that these troops were enrolled or enlisted under the earlier statute. It is clear that Governor Andrew thought so at the time; and it is equally clear that the troops themselves thought so at the time.

But there remains behind another question. Is there anything in the existing legislation of this country to prevent the enlistment of a colored person under the statute of 1861? To that I answer positively in the negative, and I challenge any contradiction. There is no color in that statute. There is no color in any statute raising troops for the Army of the United States, nor any color in any statute raising sailors for the Navy of the United States. It is only in our militia statutes that you find the word "white." In all our Army and Navy statutes there is no such limitation. The statute of 1861, therefore, I say, in point of law embraced all persons, whether black or white; and it was entirely at the option of the President, before the passage of the statute of 1862, to organize or receive colored troops under the statute of 1861. He hesitated to do it. I regretted at the time his hesitation. I thought it was an error by which the country suffered. We endeavored to repair that error by adopting the amendment which was introduced by the brave Senator from New York, who is no longer here, [Mr. King,] which you will find in the statutes of 1862. But I doubt if any person at the time, who had given attention to the subject, supposed that this amendment was necessary, except as an encouragement to a policy which the Government had been too slow to adopt. For myself I remember well my own feelings when I voted for it. I accepted it as in the nature of notice to the Administration that, in the opinion of Congress, the time had come when colored troops must be used.

In point of law it was plain that it could not stand in the way of an enrollment under the earlier statute.

And the Secretary of War seems to have acted on this interpretation, for, in undertaking to raise colored troops, no allusion was made to the statute of 1862, but the language of his order in every particular pointed to the statute of 1861. Am I wrong, then, if I say that in point of law these colored troops have just the same right to the full pay of a soldier that any Senator on this floor has to his compensation? It is by just as good title, and as firm in the statute-book as your own pay, sir.

I suggested the other day that there were two classes of cases: one where the enlistments had been made in good faith under the earlier statute, and a second class where they had been made under the later statute, and I suggested that if we were disposed to recognize the difference between these two classes it might afford a solution to our present difficulties. I am not disposed on any ground of sentiment to impose an unnecessary tax upon the burdened Treasury of my country, although there is no tax required by justice that I would hesitate to impose. But if there are colored troops now in our service who at the time they were mustered in had no reason to suppose that they were enlisted under the statute of 1861, who were led to believe that they came in under the statute of 1862, that is, for the pay of ten dollars, I am not disposed to press with regard to them any claim on the ground of sentiment; that is, for the past. I take the past as it is; but for the future I insist that they shall be put upon an equality. But true equality in the past is for the national Government to redeem its pledges, whether these pledges are direct or only implied, whether there is an absolute promise, of which you have a record, or only an inference or an understanding, founded, it may be, in a misconception, but still embraced in good faith by innocent parties. On this ground, at a proper moment, I shall be ready to propose an amendment something like the following, to come in immediately after the word "service":

Provided, That, with regard to all past service, it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War that such persons, at the time of being mustered into service, were led to suppose that they were enlisted under the act of Congress approved July 22, 1861, as volunteers in the Army of the United States.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, obtained the floor.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to the law which I have before me?

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I was struck by the legal point made by the Senator from Massachusetts, and was rather anxious to find that it was sustainable. I have looked over the law with reference to it, and I submit to him whether he has not gone a little too far in stating that, as a matter of law, this subject was covered by the law. The act to which he refers authorizes the calling out of the militia for nine months, in the first section. In the third section it authorizes the raising of one hundred thousand volunteers for nine months. In the fourth section it authorizes the filling up of the regiments in the field. The Senator says that the fifteenth section necessarily refers to the nine months' men, and to them alone. I think the Senator has overlooked the twelfth section. It is the twelfth section that authorizes the receiving of persons of African descent, not for nine months particularly, or for a year, but generally into the service of the United States. The twelfth section of the bill, which contains a considerable number of sections, reads in this way:

"SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to receive into the service of the United States, for the purpose of constructing intrenchments, or performing camp service, or any other labor, or any military or naval service for which they may be found competent, persons of African descent; and such persons shall be enrolled and organized under such regulations, not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws, as the President may prescribe."

The Senator will not contend that that section confines the enlistment of these persons to nine months.

Mr. SUMNER. That is my impression.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly not. It is general, and it must be so construed. He is to receive them into the service of the United States for any purpose, "for the purpose of constructing intrenchments or performing camp service, or any other labor, or any military or naval service for which they may be found competent," "not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws, as the President may prescribe." That certainly does not confine them to the nine months' service. Then take the first part of the fifteenth section. Does that confine them to nine months? It is this:

"That all persons who have been or shall be hereafter enrolled in the service of the United States under this act shall receive the pay and rations now allowed by law to soldiers according to their respective grades: Provided, That persons of African descent."

It refers to all that may come under this act of all kinds: in the first place the nine months' militia, the nine months' volunteers, the persons who are brought in under the fourth section to fill up the old regiments, and the persons of African descent under the twelfth section. They are all to receive the pay and rations allowed by law; and then it says:

"Provided, That persons of African descent who under this law shall be employed."

What law? The twelfth section, which expressly authorizes the enrollment and receiving of such persons into the service, and does not specify or intimate whether it is to be for nine months or a year or three years or any other time authorized by the Constitution and laws as they at present exist; but it specifically authorized the receiving of such persons, and then it says that the persons who shall be received "under this law"—that is, under the authority conferred by this act, which is the twelfth section—"shall receive ten dollars per month and one ration." I cannot accede, therefore, to the legal point raised by the Senator from Massachusetts, whatever I might think of the rest of his argument.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The honorable Senator from Maine has anticipated precisely the point I wished to make on this law.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought he rose to speak on another point.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Not at all. The Senator stated it much better than I could.

As I understand this question—and I shall detain the Senate but a very few moments—it is just this: in 1862 this law was passed authorizing the President to receive into the service persons of African descent. In the same law there was a provision that they should be paid ten dollars per month. That bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and they reported it with the pay of ten dollars per month. It was brought into the Senate, and the Senate concurred in that opinion, and supposed that ten dollars per month was sufficient pay for those soldiers. Now, after the expiration of almost two years, we are asked to go back and to pay them from the time of their enlistment, not ten dollars, as the law provided and as Congress determined, but thirteen dollars; and we are told it is in violation of the good faith of the Government and against a proper sense of justice if we do not go back and make this payment. It does not seem so to me at all. We promised them ten dollars a month. We have paid them ten dollars a month.

But gentlemen say they were deceived by the representations of their recruiting officers. The recruiting officers were the agents of the General Government. If they transcended their power and made representations that the law did not authorize, they, as agents, are legally liable, but the principal, never.

But I cannot see any injustice or any possible breach of good faith if we pay these soldiers all that we promised to pay them; and I think we have paid them an abundant compensation. They do not deserve to be paid as much as white soldiers. Many of our white soldiers left a profitable business at home, by which they were able to make money. These colored soldiers are refugees from the house of bondage, who have never heretofore got one cent of pay, and ten dollars is more compensation to them than thirteen dollars to a white soldier. They are fighting for a higher freedom. They are fighting for their freedom. They were receiving not one cent at the time we agreed to pay them ten dollars a month; and I cannot conceive of any possible injustice or hardship in the Government holding them to their bargain.

It may be that the two regiments referred to by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts were organized prior to the passage of this law, by an act of the Secretary of War. If so, it does seem to me that they should be paid if there was a law authorizing their enlistment at that time; but that is the very question which we contest. There was no law, as I conceive, authorizing the employment of African troops until the law of 1862, and that fixed their compensation at ten dollars a month, which I thought then sufficient, which the Senate thought sufficient, and which I think now ample for the services they have rendered. There can be no breach of good faith in carrying out the law precisely as we have passed it.

Now, suppose this state of things: I believed when this first law was passed that thirteen dollars a month was not sufficient pay for our white soldiers. I believe it now. The Senate believes it. A bill is now pending to increase their pay three dollars a month. Does any man propose to go back and pay your white soldiers three dollars a month in addition from the time they enlisted? If you will not do that for your white troops, why are you asked to go back and establish a different rate of pay for your colored troops from the one which the law fixed and authorized? I can see no possible reason why we should go back and thus oppress the Treasury with a burden which we have never assumed by law. Some of our white troops served for eleven dollars a month. At one time in the regular Army they served for three dollars a month; at another time for seven dollars a month; and because we believe that was not enough, are we going back now to reverse the whole legislation of Congress on the subject from the beginning of the Government, or the beginning of the rebellion, and place hundreds of millions as a burden upon the Treasury for the sake of paying two or three of these colored regiments? If I understand aright the history of these Massachusetts colored regiments—

Mr. COLLAMER. There is a mistake as to when those regiments were mustered in. It was after the passage of that act.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. If they were mustered in after the passage of the act, then no distinction can be made, because they come in under the act, by virtue of the act, and without the act they could not have been received at all. I believe that such was the understanding of the authorities in Massachusetts themselves, because they, by law, made provision to pay the three dollars that the United States Government did not agree to pay; and now, because they agreed to pay it and we did not, we are asked to take the burden from their shoulders, and pay this three dollars a month to the colored troops. I, for one, will not consent to do it. If we place colored troops hereafter on an equality with the white troops it is surely as much as they can ask either from the justice or the generosity of this Senate; for no man in his sober senses will say that their services are worth as much, or that they are as good soldiers, or that they should be paid as much. This, as it seems to me, is the truth about this whole question, and I regret to have said one word or to have troubled the Senate.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I recollect distinctly when the act was passed which has been referred to by the Senators from Maine and Indiana, and I voted for it with the distinct understanding that the colored troops were to receive ten dollars a month. I have a distinct recollection of my understanding of the act at the time. I thought that it was enough, and was satisfied with it. But it does appear from some evidence that it was not so understood by the colored troops who did volunteer, nor was it so understood, with respect to at least one regiment, by the Government itself; and my object in rising now is simply to furnish an additional piece of evidence on that subject.

I have in my possession a letter received from a paymaster stationed at Beaufort, South Carolina. He states that under an order of the Secretary of War, an advisory letter addressed to General Saxton, military governor, he paid the first South Carolina regiment, Colonel Higginson, the same as white soldiers to February 28, 1863, and since then ten dollars a month. He adds:

"It must be borne in mind that this regiment was a pioneer regiment composed of volunteers of very excellent material, and raised under a special contract with and authority of the Secretary of War that they should receive the same pay as white soldiers."

If the survivors of those men who fought under Higginson in the attack upon Wagner volunteered, entered into the service, with the distinct understanding that they were to receive thirteen dollars per month, and the Government of the United States or the Secretary of War so understood it and directed them to be so paid, I say it is but a simple act of justice that they should now receive the thirteen dollars per month; and in that view I shall vote in favor of the resolution in the way in which it stands, although originally I thought ten dollars a month was sufficient pay.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana in the course of his remarks I thought referred specially to the troops raised by the State of Massachusetts. Now, I wish to say for the information of the Senator that there are other troops having quite as strong a claim for this back pay as the two regiments raised in Massachusetts, and even more, perhaps. The first South Carolina regiment, under the command of Colonel Higginson, and another, I think the second regiment raised down there, under the command of Colonel Montgomery, were raised under an express order of the Government that they should have thirteen dollars a month.

Mr. COLLAMER. What was the date of that?

Mr. WILSON. I think those troops were raised in South Carolina before the act to which reference has been made was passed. Certainly Colonel Higginson's regiment was. I have here a letter from Colonel Montgomery, received yesterday, in which he says that his men were raised under an order of General Hunter that they should have the same pay as other troops. Colonel Higginson makes the same statement; and, in fact, the order is in existence.

Mr. COLLAMER. What is the date of it?

Mr. WILSON. Those troops were raised, I am confident, before we passed the act, under an order of General Hunter in South Carolina.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. General Hunter did not go to South Carolina until 1862.

Mr. WILSON. He was there before this act was passed. The Senator says the pay is sufficient. Does the Senator remember that the pay is only ten dollars a month, while the pay of other soldiers is $16 50 a month, being a difference of $6 50, nearly double.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. How is that?

Mr. WILSON. The white soldiers in the service receive thirteen dollars a month and $3 50 for clothing; the black soldiers receive ten dollars a month and nothing for clothing, but three dollars is deducted for clothing. Many of the men who have been killed before Charleston were in debt to the Government thirty or forty dollars for clothing. They never received a dollar's pay, and were in debt for clothing. Then the white volunteers receive a bounty; the colored men receive none. Then in most of the communities in the loyal States the families of the soldiers receive certain sums. In my own State a soldier's wife with two children receives twelve dollars a month, and has throughout the war.

Now, sir, a word in regard to the soldiers raised in South Carolina. We have had two drafts made there by order of General Hunter, and I received a letter from there the other day which stated they were about making another which was breaking up the plantations. We take nearly all the men there and put them into the service, when a man can earn $300 a year there now. Women there have earned and have received for their own toil more than $250. They cultivate the soil, raise cotton, and get the fruits of their own labor, and some of the women have sold their cotton for $250. We are taking the men that are fit for service there whom we can lay our hands upon, and forcing them into the service of the United States at ten dollars a month. We did pay them thirteen dollars a month when they were first raised, but we now pay them only ten dollars a month.

I was told the other day by Mr. Webster, of Philadelphia, a gentleman who has devoted days and nights to the raising of troops, black and white, in Pennsylvania, that they have raised in Philadelphia nearly five thousand colored troops, five regiments, and he said to me that they pledged their word to these colored men that they should receive the same pay as other soldiers, and that no doubt Congress would pass such an act, and that the act would be retrospective.

As to the order given to the Governor of Massachusetts, there cannot, in my judgment, be any doubt about it. He understood it to authorize him to promise them the same pay, and in all the advertisements, in all the meetings, in all the promises to these men, they were assured that they would receive thirteen dollars a month. They received no bounty. They have gone to the field. From two to three hundred of one of these regiments have been killed or wounded.

Now, it does seem to me that we ought, at any rate, to pay those who have been in active service this sum. It is true we are raising colored regiments to-day, and I am glad to say that we have more colored troops than I supposed we had by several thousand.

Mr. ANTHONY. How many have we?

Mr. WILSON. I do not wish to state precisely; I am not authorized to state it; but we have raised more of these soldiers than I supposed the other day we had, by several thousand. We are doing well. Many thousands of these men, perhaps half of them, are in regiments that are being raised and have never yet performed any service. We have raised eight thousand of these men in the State of Tennessee. Perhaps one or two regiments of them have rendered small service, but they have just been organized and officered ready to go into the service. All the testimony goes to show that these soldiers are as faithful and perform duty as well as any other soldiers. I hold in my hand a letter received yesterday from General Terry, who commands the colored troops in South Carolina, and he describes the services of these men, and he says their services have not been surpassed by any men, and that we ought to pay them the same compensation, and we ought to make it retrospective as a matter of justice to the men who have performed the labor, who have suffered and toiled before Charleston in the trenches, and have fought and some of whom have died for the country, and that too without receiving any bounties. It will cheer their hearts, they will go on in the future, and it will be money well expended. I believe it.

The colonel of a regiment in Virginia called on me the night before last. He was in a recent expedition into North Carolina, and he says he marched his regiment forty-three miles without a straggler. He says that the colored men can march further than any other troops in the country, and he has served in the best regiments throughout the war. He says that in the six months that he has had command of a colored regiment he has had but one case of drunkenness in it. All the testimony of our officers, who took these troops with prejudices against them, goes to show that they are industrious, that they are obedient, that they are deferential in their manners, that they make the best kind of scouts, that they know the country well, that they are performing their duty with a zeal and an earnestness unsurpassed. There is a reason for this. Take a colored man who has been degraded by popular prejudice, or by law, or in any other way, put the uniform of the United States upon him, and let him follow the flag of the country, and he feels proud and elevated. Besides that, they are fighting for the elevation of their race, as well as for our country and our cause, and for the emancipation of their race, and well may they perform that duty. As suggested by the Senator from Indiana, they are fighting for something higher and nobler than pay. But while I recognize all that, it does seem to me that we ought at any rate to make their pay equal to that of other troops, and we ought, in addition to that, at least apply that equality of pay retrospectively to those men whom we raised with this understanding, and who have been in active and hard service during the last year or two.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senator from Indiana will pardon me if I refer to him for one minute. He is so uniformly generous and just that I was the more surprised when I listened to his remarks just now. I was surprised at his lack of generosity and his lack of justice—he will pardon me—toward these colored soldiers. I was surprised—he will pardon me—at his injustice to the State of Massachusetts. He spoke disparagingly of the colored soldiers. He thought they had been paid enough. He thought that the gallant blood shed on the parapets of Fort Wagner had been paid enough; and he failed to see that those men who died for us on that bloody night and were buried in the same grave with their colonel who led them, now stood alive in this presence to plead for the equality of their race. How could I help regretting that the Senator was led into any such remark?

Also in the ardor of his utterance—he will pardon me still further—the Senator undertook to say that if we entered on this payment we should charge the Treasury with some one or two hundred millions in addition to its present burden. Why, sir, that is an entire mistake. Even if we pay everything that is contemplated by the resolution of my colleague, I am told that the whole sum will be little more than a million; much, I admit, for us to charge unnecessarily upon the Treasury; but not the very large sum which seemed to fill the patriotic vision of the Senator.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The Senator misunderstood my statement altogether. My statement was, that if we were called upon now to go back and increase the pay of the colored troops three dollars a month more than the law provided, with the same propriety we might be called upon to go back and increase the pay of our white soldiers because they thought that their pay had not been enough; and that would add to the burdens of the Treasury to a very large amount.

Mr. SUMNER. I accept the correction gladly. Certainly I have no disposition to press anything beyond the meaning of the Senator. But he will allow me to say that I was hardly mistaken in his argument. It was that we should charge the Treasury with a burden which it could ill bear. Now, if this money is due, let us charge the Treasury with the burden; and that brings me again to the direct question, is not the money due? The Senator denied it; but he will pardon me again if I say he hardly went into an argument on that head. I repeat, then, is the money due? I dislike to trouble the Senate by going over topics that have already been too much discussed; but I trust they will excuse me if I state the case yet once more. On many accounts I confess a special interest in this question; but not the least is that I would not have my country do an injustice, least of all an injustice to people of a race too long crushed by injustice.

The argument need not be long. In the first place the statute of 1861 contains no words which can be interpreted in any way to exclude the enrollment of persons of color under it. I challenge any Senator to point to a single word in that statute which would authorize any such exclusion. You have then the statute in the case. That is the first point. In the second place, you have the order already read from the Secretary of War addressed to Governor Andrew authorizing an enrollment for three years, making in his order no discrimination in any way between persons of African descent and white soldiers. That is the second point. You have then in the third place the open promises and pledges of Governor Andrew, under that order, and for the time being undertaking to act as the agent of the United States, solemnly promising the full pay of thirteen dollars a month to these colored persons as soldiers of the United States. Then in the next place you have the very terms of the enlistment subscribed by these soldiers at the time of their enlistment, which I read the other day, where it is expressly stated that they entered into service under the statute of 1861.

These four points—the statute of 1861, the order of the Secretary, the promise of Governor Andrew in behalf of the United States, and the terms of enlistment—all these make a case by which, as it seems to me, the Government is bound. In face of these, how can it be said that these colored troops were "employed" under the statute of 1862? There is no ingenuity of interpretation which can place them there.

That I am not mistaken in the facts on which I found this argument, is apparent from a letter which I hold in my hand, written by one of these soldiers now on Morris Island. But I shall content myself with a brief extract:

"In the month of February, 1863, Governor John A. Andrew announced that he had permission from the War Department to raise a regiment of infantry to be composed of men of color. Enlisting began immediately, and the fifty-fourth regiment was filled to overflowing in three months. The only inducement he offered to these men was an acknowledgment of their manhood. For he promised that the United States Government would treat them in every particular the same as other volunteer regiments from the State of Massachusetts."

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Will the Senator pardon me a moment just there?

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. They were to be treated in every respect as the volunteer troops from Massachusetts. Will the Senator contend that the commissioned officers of colored regiments might be drawn from the colored troops themselves, after the passage of the law of 1862? Was not that a disparity? Was that treating them like other troops?

Mr. SUMNER. Of course the order is applicable simply to the enlisted men; and this is my answer to the Senator. It is not applicable to the officers.

The letter goes on to say:

"The enlistment rolls signed by these men bound them to obey the President," &c.

How?

"In pursuance of the law passed in July, 1861, calling for volunteers."

Such was the understanding on which the enlistment took place. It was by this lure that you won these men to the field of sacrifice.

I have already said too much, but before I sit down I cannot forget that the Senator from Indiana in his impetuous movement brushed against the commonwealth of Massachusetts. I do not remember his precise words; nor do I care to remember them. But he more than intimated that there was on the part of this State something else than a patriotic motive in pressing this obligation. I think he said this whole effort is now to save the payment of this extra money. Does not the Senator know that the commonwealth of Massachusetts has already provided for the payment of this sum, so far as its own two regiments are concerned, and that those regiments have refused to receive it? These colored troops declare that they were enlisted as soldiers of the United States, and as such they are entitled to the pay of soldiers of the United States from the Government of the United States. If it be wrong to maintain their claim then is Massachusetts wrong, then am I wrong on this occasion. If the claim is maintained earnestly it is because, both in law and in sentiment, and on every ground of policy or expediency, it commends itself to those who represent Massachusetts. And now, since this State has been called in question, I shall not content myself with merely giving my own opinions and arguments, but I shall ask you to listen to her honored Governor.

In an official message to the Legislature of Massachusetts Governor Andrew has discussed this whole question with his accustomed lucidity and thoroughness. Here is something of what he says:

"To my own mind, the right of these men under the existing statutes to the lawful pay and allowances of volunteers is demonstrably clear. But if it is doubtful it is agreed, I believe, in all quarters that it will be the duty and the pleasure of Congress to embrace an early opportunity to prevent by positive legislation the continuance of that doubt. Meantime I must embrace the earliest occasion to invoke the Legislature of Massachusetts to render justice to the men of these regiments beyond the possibility of a doubt by the appropriation of the needful means out of our own treasury until the national Congress or the Executive Department shall correct the error."

The Governor, after considering some details of the argument, proceeds as follows:

"I think there can be no proposition of law more clear than this, namely: that colored men are competent to be enlisted into the regular Army of the United States, into the volunteer army of the United States, into the Navy of the United States, and to be employed in any arm of either service."

"The military enlistment law of 1814 required only that the recruit shall be a 'free, effective, able-bodied man, between the ages of eighteen and fifty years.' (See act of December 10, 1814.) It did not require a man to be under forty-five, nor a citizen, nor white, in which three respects it differs from the old militia act. The naval act of 1813 is not the less clear."

Such is the statement of the Governor on this question in point of law. At the time these regiments were mustered into the service he believed that he was acting legally under the statutes of the United States. He so instructed these men, and these men naturally believed him and gave themselves generously, nobly, beautifully to the public service. Will the country now disown them? Will the country now fasten a ban upon them, and lead them to say in their hearts that they have been duped?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not know whether this joint resolution will be disposed of to-night; but I have drawn two amendments in the shape of provisos that if adopted will put it precisely on the ground that the Government may keep its faith entire; that where a promise has been given under the authority of the War Department, and the Secretary of War shall be satisfied of that fact, they shall be paid according to the rate of thirteen dollars a month, and also a provision which would provide for a large class of cases arising in the insurrectionary districts where these men, women, and children all come in together upon our hands.

Mr. SUMNER. Be good enough to read it, if you please.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will read my proposed amendments in order that they may be printed if the resolution goes over until to-morrow, or if they meet the views of the Senate that they may be acted on to-night. To meet those cases which have been referred to by the honorable Senators from Massachusetts I propose this proviso:

Provided, That in all cases where, under the authority of the War Department or the order of the War Department, the Secretary of War shall be satisfied that such persons of color have been heretofore mustered into the service upon a promise to pay them at a rate of thirteen dollars per month, the same shall be paid at that rate for such services heretofore rendered by such persons.

Mr. SUMNER. That is identical with the proposition I have already proposed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. And the other proviso is this:

And provided further, That from the monthly pay of every such soldier mustered into the service in the States or parts of States where by the proclamation of the President the insurrection exists, there shall be reserved the sum of—dollars—

It has been suggested by some friends that the sum be made four dollars—per month for the purpose of reimbursing the expenses incurred by the United States in feeding and clothing the women and children of color in said States or districts.

I believe these two provisos would disentangle the bill, and I send them to the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not think there is any chance of terminating this measure to-night, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask that those amendments which I propose to offer to-morrow be printed.

The order to print was made.

Mr. JOHNSON. I withdraw my motion, as I understand an executive session is desired for a short time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California.

Mr. CONNESS. As I offered the amendment, and as the proposition contained in it has been assailed, as I think very unjustly and very ungenerously, by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] in at least half a dozen speeches, I desire to say something on the subject before the vote shall be taken. At present I am not at all attached to the proposition I have made, and if any other shall be made by any other Senator that will mete out justice to the country and to the colored troops together, I shall be prepared to accept it, but I am not prepared to listen to the mode of discussion indulged in by the Senator from Massachusetts without having an opportunity to say a few words in reply. Therefore I move now that the Senate go into executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in the consideration of executive business, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 10, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. Dr. PRESLEY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PLATTSBURG COLLECTION DISTRICT.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from New York from the Plattsburg district introduced a bill to change the location of a custom-house in his district, which was recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. The bill also provided for an increase of the salary of the collector. To that the Committee on Commerce were unwilling to agree, but they have instructed me to report a bill for the change of location of the custom-house, and I ask unanimous consent to report it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from Wisconsin has no particular interest in the matter, and I hope he will withdraw his objection.

The objection was not withdrawn.

CUSTOM-HOUSE INVESTIGATIONS.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer a resolution to which I am sure no gentleman will object when he hears it. It is in these terms:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to communicate to this House the reports made by the Solicitor of the Treasury on the investigations made by him in New York into the conduct of prize business, the management of the custom-house and public stores, and the manner of taking bonds for goods shipped to certain interdicted foreign ports, with copies of all the testimony taken by him in each of these three several branches.

Mr. HULBURD. I object.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I desire to state that this resolution was especially designed for the committee of which my colleague is chairman.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BOYD. I ask, with all the kindness of my heart, unanimous consent of the House, as a question of privilege or a privileged question, to make a personal explanation.

Mr. COX. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. BOYD. In the printed remarks of my colleague [Mr. BLAIR] there is a paragraph which relates to myself in a manner that requires me to notice it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I must object to anything that interferes with the progress of the enrollment bill.

VOTE ON CONFISCATION BILL.

Mr. SWEAT. On account of sickness of myself and of my family last week it was impossible for me to be present to vote upon the confiscation bill. I ask the consent of the House to record my vote.

Mr. STEVENS objected.

Mr. SWEAT. I will state that had I been here I would have voted against the bill.

BUREAU OF FREEDMEN'S AFFAIRS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business having been called for, the call of committees for reports is in order. Under that call the first business in order is the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs, which was reported back with amendments from the select committee on emancipation on the 13th of January last, and postponed to Wednesday, January 20. It comes up as the first undisposed-of bill reported from a committee.

Mr. ELIOT. I send to the Clerk's desk an amendment, which I offer as a substitute for the bill.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is upon the floor.

Mr. COX. I move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot make that motion, as he has not the floor for that purpose. The Chair would state that when reports from committees are in order, the reports of committees undisposed of come up first as unfinished business.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. ELIOT. I will hear what the gentleman desires.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. I desire to say that there is a minority report upon this subject which has not yet been seen by members of the House, and—

Mr. ELIOT. I cannot yield for that purpose. The minority report has been printed for a fortnight, and been in possession of every member of the House who felt disposed to see it.

Mr. Speaker, in introducing this bill I bespeak for it the favor of the House, and invoke their attention to the arguments constraining us to its speedy passage. It is not my wish to interfere with the debate so long as it shall seem necessary to illustrate its provisions or to show its demerits or its worth. If it cannot stand discussion it ought to fail. But a fair and free argument will bring to an affirmative vote upon the passage of the bill a large majority of those who are willing to legislate in view of the great facts which exist in our country, rather than in sight alone of party questions and differences of judgment as to the policy which has resulted in producing those facts.

In December, 1860, the Legislature of South Carolina enacted her ordinance of secession. The evil example of that traitor State was followed by the independent action of other States, and the rebel confederacy was organized. Its object was to destroy this Union and to build upon its ruins another government to be known as the great slave Power of the century. The first act of war was committed in April, 1861. On the 15th of April the President made his proclamation calling for seventy-five thousand men and summoning both Houses of Congress in extra session. The Thirty-Seventh Congress assembled on the 4th of July, 1861. On the 6th of August an act was passed "to confiscate property used for insurrectionary purposes." The fourth section of that act provided that when persons "claimed to be held to labor or service" were required or permitted to take up arms against the United States, or to work or be employed in military service against the United States, the person who claimed such labor or service should forfeit his right thereto. It was a gentle act, but it was the beginning of a good work. By virtue of its provisions many thousands of slaves have been made free. At the second session of that Congress I had the honor to report from the select committee a confiscation bill, and after full debate the bill, as amended in committee of conference, was finally passed. By the ninth section of that act it was provided that slaves of rebels escaping within our lines or captured from them or deserted by them and coming under our control, or found within any place occupied by rebel forces and afterwards by our own forces, should be deemed captives of war and forever freed from slavery. On the 1st of January, 1863, the President, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy in time of armed rebellion, and as a fit and necessary war measure for suppressing the rebellion, declared free all persons held as slaves in certain specified States and districts. In his proclamation the President recommended to those people so declared free to abstain from all violence unless in necessary self-defense, and advised them to labor faithfully for reasonable wages. And upon that great act, which the President sincerely believed to be an act of justice warranted by the Constitution upon military necessity, he "invoked the considerate judgment of mankind and the generous favor of Almighty God."

The immediate effect of such legislation and of the proclamation of the President was to bring under the control of our Government from rebel States, and in districts conquered by our arms, large multitudes of freedmen who had ceased to be slaves but had not learned how to be free.

On the 19th of January, 1863, I introduced a bill to establish a Bureau of Emancipation. It was referred to a select committee, but for want of time was not reported by them to the House. That bill, again introduced at this session, and made more efficient in the light of a year's experience, is now before us. Its provisions have been carefully examined in committee, and I will endeavor to explain them and the necessity of this legislation, its object, and its expected benefits to the freedmen and to ourselves.

The question is not now whether Mr. Lincoln was correct as a statesman when he declared that his proclamation was "warranted by the Constitution upon military necessity." The question is not now whether Congress did or did not transcend its powers in August, 1861, or in July, 1862. Upon those questions we have all arrived at a judgment. During the debate upon the confiscation act they were fully discussed; and whatever our judgment may be, a great fact now exists which we must recognize, and which cries out to us for legislation. By reason of that proclamation and of our past legislation and of the successes which have been achieved by our armies under their valiant generals, three million persons held as slaves have become and are becoming in fact free.

By the census of 1860 the following slave population is found to have been in the rebel States:

Alabama.....	435,080
Arkansas.....	111,115
Florida.....	61,745
Georgia.....	462,198
Louisiana.....	331,726
Mississippi.....	436,631
North Carolina.....	331,059
South Carolina.....	402,406
Tennessee.....	275,719
Texas.....	182,566
Virginia.....	490,865

Slaves.....	3,521,110
Deduct the slaves in Tennessee, to wit, 275,719
And estimate the excepted portions of Louisiana and Virginia at.....	245,391
	521,110

And there will remain affected by the terms of the proclamation..... 3,000,000

When Mr. Lincoln declared that "all persons held as slaves within the designated districts" are and henceforward shall be free, he did an act as Commander-in-Chief which was irrevocable. Whatever rights it conferred cannot be withdrawn. He may, as Commander-in-Chief, strike off the chain, but he cannot in any capacity, as chieftain or as President, make of a freedman a slave. And we know that Mr. Lincoln so holds the law to be. And as his heart was in that great proclamation of freedom, so his matured judgment rests upon it firmly content. In his message to the present Congress he says, "While I remain in my present position I shall not attempt to retract or modify the emancipation proclamation; nor shall I return to slavery any person who is free by the terms of that proclamation or by any of the acts of Congress." Shortly after that proclamation was made I had an interview with the President, and he then said, "I think that proclamation will not of itself effect the good which you anticipate, nor will it do the mischief which its opponents predict." But he "builded better than he knew." That act was the great act of his life. It has become greater daily in the judgment of the world, and in the ages that are to come it will be the corner-stone of his immortal fame. Never before had such opportunity been given to man. For one I reverently recognize the hand of God. He created the occasion, and His servant obeyed the divine command which it involved.

But Mr. Lincoln's proclamation cannot effect the good it contemplated unless, first, it be vindicated and made effective by military success, and, secondly, by appropriate legislation. The shackles have been loosened from the slave, but defeated armies would leave the conquerors free to weld them on again with bolts that could not be stricken off. Mr. Lincoln referred to this possibility in his recent annual message. "It was all the while deemed possible," he says, "that the necessity for it might come;" that is to say, the necessity of emancipation as a military measure; "and that, if it should, the crisis of the contest would then be presented. It came, and as was anticipated it was followed by dark and doubtful days. Eleven months having now passed, we are permitted to take another review. The rebel borders are pressed still further back, and by the complete opening of the Mississippi the country dominated by the rebellion is divided into distinct parts, with no practical communication between them." The successes which our Union armies have achieved during the past year have been undisturbed by any failure that can cast a shadow upon the bright certainty of final triumph. In the graveyard at Gettysburg the rebel hopes of victory on northern soil were buried. The stricken hosts of Lee's army will not revisit those fields of blood, where the unaided ghosts of rebel traitors would taunt them with their defeat. Upon the Mississippi, when Vicksburg fell before the consummate genius of Grant and the heroism of his officers and men, and when the keys of Port Hudson were yielded to Banks by hands unwilling to surrender but impotent to resist, a free highway was again thrown open, dividing the region where treason had prevailed and breaking its strength in twain, while it drew together again the North and the loyal South by that bond of living waters which God from the beginning had established. All honor to those men, heroes all of them, in those great battles which crushed the hopes of rebel leaders in the East, and northern traitors, their allies and true friends, and have sealed our assurance of ultimate success. At every step made by our armies upon southern soil freedmen have come within our actual control, and have sought to prove their allegiance and to receive protection. The President tells us that—

"Of those who were slaves at the beginning of the rebellion full one hundred thousand are now in the United States military service, about one half of which number actually bear arms in the ranks, thus giving the double advantage of taking so much labor from the insurgent cause and supplying the places which otherwise must be filled with so many white men. So far as tested, it is difficult to say they are not as good soldiers as any. No servile insurrection or tendency to violence or cruelty has marked the measures of emancipation and arming the blacks. Those measures have been much discussed in foreign countries, and contemporary with such discussion the tone of public sentiment there is much improved. At home the same measures have been fully discussed, supported, criticized, and denounced, and the annual elections following are highly encouraging to those whose official duty it is to bear the country through this great trial. Thus we have the new reckoning. The crisis which threatened to divide the friends of the Union is past."

Mr. Speaker, the President refers to the one hundred thousand men who were slaves and are now free and in our service. But three times that number would not more than state the aggregate of those who were slaves at the beginning of the rebellion and are now under the protection of our Government. In November, 1862, a committee of Friends, or Quakers, under appointment from the New York Yearly Meeting, visited Washington, Alexandria, Fort Monroe, Hampton, Norfolk, and Craney island, to investigate the condition and wants of colored refugees. At that time, before the military proclamation of the Commander-in-Chief, there were in and around Washington about six thousand refugees, at Alexandria twelve hundred and thirty, at Fort Monroe, Hampton, Fort Norfolk, Craney island, and Norfolk, six thousand and fifty-four, and many others, whose numbers they could not then ascertain, at Yorktown, Suffolk, and Portsmouth; that is to say, at that early day within this territory there were known to be thirteen thousand two hundred and eighty of these freedmen who wanted work and wages. This commission issued from the New York Yearly Meeting of Friends was one of the pioneer missions in this great work. The report of William Cromwell and Benjamin Tatham is full of interesting facts and of sound practical suggestions.

The destitution of these people, their suffering from neglect and disease, their willingness and ability to work, their wages promised and earned and half paid, and the ascertained value of their labor to the Government beyond the whole expense involved, are stated in brief and plain language, without exaggeration, and with no harsh comment. Before this action by the New York Yearly Meeting, associations had been initiated in several places by humane men, who contributed freely both time and money in this work; ascertaining facts by personal investigation, and working with the Government so far as they might to relieve, to educate, and to employ those freedmen of the South. The educational commission of Boston, the national freedmen's relief association of New York, the Port Royal relief committee of Philadelphia, had been organized and were actively at work.

Mr. Edward L. Peirce, under instructions from the Secretary of the Treasury, before the supervision of affairs at Port Royal was transferred from the Treasury to the War Department, went to Port Royal and examined and reported on the condition of the freedmen and on their self-sustaining ability when aided in their early efforts by the Government that had made them free. His earnest labors, aided by the associations of New York, Philadelphia, and Boston, and his admirable reports to Mr. Chase, whose personal and official care have been given heartily to freedmen as well as to finance, have furnished to the committee information of the highest practical character and value. The friends of emancipation in the West have contributed their proportion of money and labor to ascertain the condition of the freedmen upon the Mississippi and to give them the welcome and protecting hand which their untired freedom might require. The contraband relief commission of Cincinnati, Ohio, has recently appointed a committee to suggest a plan for the benefit of freedmen and for the occupation of the lands from which white traitors had fled and on which loyal black men lived. In an able report made by George Graham and John W. Hartwell the establishment of a Bureau of Emancipation is recommended.

At St. Louis the western sanitary commission has been actively employed in the same direction. Of the humane agencies which this rebellion has called into life no one has done more to relieve the soldiers of our western army than this commission. From the beginning of the war these earnest men have labored in their great work. And now they have found opening to them this new field of labor. Their president, Mr. James E. Yeatman, has recently returned from a tour of observation in the lower Mississippi valley from Cairo to Natchez. He has gone in person to the camps where the freedmen are collected and has examined into their condition that he might "ascertain their wants and how they can be relieved and make such recommendations and suggestions for their management and improvement as will bring them as speedily as possible to the enjoyment of the blessings which the President's proclamation of freedom was designed to confer upon them." Mr. Yeatman has done his work as thoroughly as it was possible to accomplish it within the time assigned him, and his full report shows how deeply his heart and his mind have been engaged. Besides his report he has made and his commission has published suggestions of a plan of organization for freed labor under a Bureau of Emancipation, which will give to the Commissioner, if this bill shall become a law, the experience of a wise practical man who has known what were the oppressions of slavery, and who knows the early perils of unused freedom.

During the past year the Secretary of War, Mr. Stanton, and the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Chase, have done all that could be done without definite legislation by Congress to make the labor of the freedmen profitable to themselves and serviceable to the country in the camp and in the field. How the freedmen have become soldiers, and what brave soldiers they are, I do not stop to consider. Gentlemen doubted last year whether they would fight. Nobody doubts now. I would that I had time, for I could tell of one from my own city, Sergeant Carney, of the Massachusetts fifty-fourth, whose dark complexion covers but cannot cloud a true soul and a brave heart. I could tell you how he seized the regimental colors and planted them upon Fort Wagner; how he was shot down holding firmly aloft his sacred banner; how he kept his post while men were falling around him, his own blood pouring out the while, until the attack was over; how after his regiment retired he remained, his colors flying and within the fort, but no one there to defend or to support him; how he dragged his shattered body alone, holding his banner up, supporting himself with it as with a staff; how he was again sorely wounded by a rebel ball but kept on his way undaunted and unsubdued until he had drawn himself, his colors flying, toward his regiment; and how, wearied and fainting, he found his men, saying as he fell exhausted and spent, "Here are the colors, boys; they have not touched the ground!" Other men wear stars upon their shoulder; but this man, black though he may be, shall live in history, himself a star, fixed and luminous forever.

Sir, where these men have had opportunity they have vindicated their full manhood. They have shown more manly treatment than they have received. They have not feared to fight or to die in battle. We have feared to pay them as soldiers or to acknowledge them as men. At some time prior to June, 1863, Messrs. Robert Dale Owen, James McKay, and Samuel G. Howe were appointed commissioners from the American freedmen's inquiry commission, under authority from the Secretary of War, to examine into the condition and the management of emancipated refugees. In June they made their preliminary report, which has been published by authority of the War Department. It concerns the refugees in the District of Columbia, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Florida. This report describes their condition as refugees, speaks of them as military laborers, and discusses their ability as soldiers, and it recommends also the establishment of a bureau in the War Department for the supervision and conduct of these affairs.

Mr. Speaker, your committee has sought and acquired information from all these sources. I have also conferred in person and by correspondence with parties whose business has led them among these refugees, and whose means of personal knowledge of their condition and wants have enabled them to speak with some authority.

Upon one proposition we have found a decided and united judgment. Every one whose knowledge has been personal declares the imperative and immediate importance of such a bill as your committee has reported to the House. For it is true that military successes alone cannot make the great proclamation of Mr. Lincoln fully effective as an act of justice to the freedmen, nor as a benefit to the nation at large. To that end there must be appropriate and efficient legislation. Without that a generation of freedmen would be destroyed before a generation of freemen would live. Mr. Lincoln says, "I recommend to them," that is, the freedmen, "that in all cases, when allowed, they labor faithfully for reasonable wages." So they will, if allowed. But who is to allow them? Will you let harpies go among them, or white blood-hounds whose scent is keen for prey, whose fangs are remorseless, whose pursuit is for gold at any cost of human life? Such men have been there; they are there now, under color of Government authority; and the abuses practiced by them sadden and depress the freedmen. The president of the western sanitary commission, speaking from his own observation, says, "he sighs to return to his former home and master. He at least fed, clothed, and sheltered him. Something should be done, and I doubt not will be done, to correct these terrible abuses, when the proper authorities are made to comprehend them. The President's proclamation should not thus be made a living lie, as the Declaration of Independence has too long been, in asserting the inalienable rights of man, while the nation continued to hold millions of human beings in bondage." Neither the considerate judgment of mankind nor the gracious favor of God can be reasonably invoked upon the President's act of freedom unless the law shall protect the freedom which the sword declared.

The President submitted recently to the consideration of the House a letter which he had received from a joint committee of the freedmen's aid societies of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Cincinnati. The sources of accurate knowledge which have been open to these parties entitle what they say to great consideration. We look into history and it is silent. No voice of the past can define the duties which the great facts of the present time enjoin upon us. We look to England, and the story of her emancipation in the West India islands is fresh in our memory. The English oak is thrifty in its green old age, in whose shade Wilberforce and Pitt took counsel together before the bill to abolish the slave trade was introduced. But the act of June, 1833, declared to be free some six or eight hundred thousand persons. We have, and shall have, as the free fruits of this rebellion, more than three millions. Yet the act of England also provided for the early years of freedom. Ten years before, Parliament had voted to adopt decisive and effectual measures to ameliorate the condition of the slave population. Those who are familiar with the literature of abolition know what those measures were. The Colonial Secretary of State addressed the colonial Governors, directing them to submit certain propositions to their Legislatures. The propositions were submitted, but they were all rejected, and the condition of the slaves remained unchanged. Then, ten years afterwards, came the act of emancipation. But that act sought to break gently to the eye the light of day. The slave was to be an apprentice before he became a man. For these apprentices special guardians were appointed and their duties were defined. Before the term of apprenticeship had expired full freedom was proclaimed in all the colonies. But between the date of the act of emancipation and the final proclamation of freedom in 1839, the Government of England published in documents of all kinds—orders, dispatches, reports, and decrees—fifteen folio volumes, which contained more than seven thousand pages, and we may learn there how their early freedom affected the freedmen and the colonies.

But the condition of things in the West India islands differed so essentially from the state of facts caused by this rebellion that colonial experiences are only or chiefly valuable to us as demonstrating the necessity of timely and efficient legislation. And if we turn to France, and recall the story of her action to liberate the colonial slave and to elevate the enfranchised man, and review the facts with which that nation had to deal, we find after years of discussion and inaction convulsive abolition decreed in 1794 and deliberate slavery reestablished in 1802, until another convulsion created the republic and compelled the decree of 1848. And here also we find legislation and decrees and regulations aiming to protect both freedman and Government, and although we may learn no other lesson we are compelled to learn this—that emancipation, while it restores rights to the slave, devolves high duties upon the Government by whose decree it has been proclaimed. If we look to what was done in Sweden two years before the provisional Government of France had acted, or in Denmark following her example the next year, or in Portugal, or much later in Russia, we still come back to consider our own present duties, guided by this light alone which the experience of other nations gives to us, and which reveals to us the need of immediate and efficient action. No nation upon the face of the earth with whose history I am conversant has held in bondage over so wide extent of country so many millions of human beings as this nation has dared to hold under a Constitution which the people ordained to secure the blessings of liberty and to establish justice; nor has human ingenuity ever devised a system of slavery more debasing in its character to the slave or to his master. Even in Spanish colonies, where the condition of the negro slave has been and is degraded below the level of humanity, rights are secured by law which the master is bound to respect. He may ransom himself and his wife and children by the produce of his labor. He may have a wife by law, and he may change his master if he can find a purchaser whom he confides in. No such rights, nor any others that I know of, are so secured by law as to be made available to the slave in our southern States. Yet the service of a person, and not the body and life of a human being, is all that our Constitution ever meant to recognize as the subject of property. Where slavery has been most uncompromising and cruel the freedman is found most helpless and most deserving aid.

Mr. Speaker, this war has been continued for nearly three years. From its commencement it was plain that the freedom of the slave must follow military success. But up to this day not one act has been done by the Congress of the United States to protect freedmen or to aid them in self-protection or self-support. This great work, the greatest work which this rebellion casts upon the Government, has yet to be commenced. And now all that your committee has asked for at this time is the creation of a bureau. If this bill shall become a law, and a wise, judicious, and humane system shall be devised and carried into operation, it may appear that more than a bureau is demanded. In considering the subject you intrusted to us, your committee has sought the judgment of private men acquainted with these affairs and with officers of our Government. Mr. Stanton, whose able conduct of the War Department will be more fully appreciated when the whole work which he has accomplished shall be fully known, does not court the immense labor which this bureau will impose upon him, but he will discharge all the duties that shall be assigned him, and he appreciates fully the great responsibility of the work that must be performed. The Solicitor of his Department, Mr. Whiting, whose varied learning and wide range of legal study have eminently qualified him for the work, has examined the bill now before the House, and in his reply to the committee has made some suggestions that deserve careful thought. He says:

"I hope, however, that it will not be deemed an impropriety for me to make another suggestion. The work laid out for the Bureau of Emancipation is of immense magnitude. Two and a half millions of wards driven from their accustomed shelters by the sharp catastrophes of war, landless, homeless, helpless, appeal to the Government to guard and save them. From their earliest years deprived of the light of knowledge, they are children able as yet to see only the star of freedom. They feel with hope and confidence that the flag which brings to them liberty, will spread over them the mantle of its protection. In the heart of this great people every pulsation thrills for freedom. The instincts of national honor will allow no filtering and no failure in our duty to the oppressed freedmen who stand shoulder to shoulder in this struggle for our country's safety and renown. I therefore honor you gentlemen who see your high duty and mean to perform it.

"The plan proposed in this bill is for the organization of a bureau in the War Department. Perhaps this is the best means of commencing the great work, but I think the time will soon come, if it has not already arrived, when the duties of this bureau will require the powers and merit the dignity of a separate Executive Department.

"There are several subjects which might be advantageously grouped together, and ought to be placed under the management of one controlling mind. Among them are the following:

"1. Taking possession, on behalf of the United States, of all real estate abandoned by its owners, who have joined the rebels.

"2. Taking possession of all real estate forfeited to the United States to be sold for taxes, whether bought in by order of the President of the United States, or sold to settlers and others.

"3. Taking possession of all lands confiscated to the United States.

"4. Taking possession of all personal property of the enemy derelict, abandoned, or captured, except prizes at sea.

"5. Taking care of and making provision for all persons now freed or hereafter to be freed under any laws of the United States or proclamations of the President, or acts of manumission.

"6. Taking care of all colored men in the rebellious districts who were free before the war, and all fugitives thereto from loyal States.

"7. All legal proceedings for the confiscation of rebel property in all the courts. The United States attorneys, or special attorney, to act under orders of the new Department so far as respects these proceedings.

"8. The administration of all laws, rules, and regulations relating to the migration of colored persons to and from the rebel States.

"9. And of all laws relating to the compensation, if any, which the Government may hereafter give to aid loyal States in emancipating slaves.

"10. All other matters relating to the emancipation and its processes, its rules and regulations, &c., and the protection of the interests of the colored men on one hand, and the United States on the other.

"These subjects are intimately connected together; they would require genius and active energy of the most powerful executive talent. The Secretary of War or of the Treasury are already so overwhelmed with labor and responsibility that it is ungenious to demand of either of them to assume this herculean task. The labors of this Emancipation Department will be unsurpassed by those of any other executive minister. Its importance to the ultimate issue of the war, to the reputation of our country abroad, to the moral character of our people in the southern States, to the Treasury, to the soldiers, and to the industrial interests of this great nation can hardly be overestimated. Whoever is competent to fill the office of Secretary of Emancipation should have a seat in the Cabinet, and should also enjoy the confidence and cooperation of that great and good man whose proclamation of freedom has recreated a nation, and will cause his name to be venerated wherever the flag of the Union shall cast its shadow."

But, sir, for reasons which controlled the committee, it has not been deemed advisable at this time to report a bill creating a Department. Is it too much to hope that in offering this bill for your action we may be sustained by the House without reference to party differences? Why, sir, what has been done hitherto? Let me tell you: The rebellion began in April, 1861. In August, at the extra session, an act was passed providing for an annual direct tax of $20,000,000, duly apportioned among all the States. There were $5,153,981 28 apportioned to the rebel States. In June, 1862, an act was passed for the collection of those taxes in insurrectionary districts. The lands were charged with the payment of the tax, and sales of the lands were provided for. Tax commissioners were created and their duties specified. After sales had been effected and the lands purchased on account of the United States, under the terms of the act these commissioners were empowered to lease certain of the lands together or in parcels, the leases to be "in such form and with such security as shall, in the judgment of said commissioners, produce to the United States the greatest revenue." By the tenth section of the act the commissioners are empowered to make rules and regulations, and insert such clauses in the leases as will secure proper and reasonable employment and support, at wages or on shares, of persons and families residing on the lands. That was the first notice taken by legislation of the freedmen.

It is important, because it was a recognition by Congress of an obligation to see that some proper and reasonable employment and support were given to these loyal men. But it was an act whose object was to raise money and to get revenue. The lands are to be leased in such form and with such security as will produce the "greatest amount of revenue." The act itself was not dictated by humanity, but by prudence and national thrift. And, sir, I greatly fear that in its administration the "greatest revenue" has had the largest consideration. I trust in God the time is not remote when they may have fair wages for fair work. At this moment there is, as I believe, in the Treasury more than a million dollars which the freedmen have contributed largely to produce.

The testimony of parties who have personally examined into the facts concerning work and wages of the freedmen is uniform that not only are those men often employed upon leased lands at less than half wages, but that in many cases, when employed directly by officers of the Government, they are compelled to receive less than one third of the wages that similar service from others at the same place and at the same time demanded and received. I know very well how difficult it may be to protect from the calculating speculator who has power the thoughtless and improvident man who wants bread. But over the thoughtlessness and improvidence which oppression has caused it is both a privilege and a duty to keep kindly guard until the liberty we have vouchsafed shall give to the freedmen mental nerve and moral self-reliance.

Mr. Speaker, besides the law I have referred to there have been three distinct appropriations of money made for purposes of colonization. When freedom was decreed in the District of Columbia the act of emancipation provided that the sum of $100,000 should be expended in aid of those, whether free or freed by that act, residing in the District who desired to emigrate.

By the act of June 7, 1862, section twelve, one fourth part of the proceeds of sales and leases of land acquired by the Government under the tax act is made payable to the State as a fund to aid voluntary emigration to some tropical colony. There has been also an appropriation made to provide for the emigration of men made free under the confiscation act of July, 1862. Already the experience of a year, with the embarrassments created by disloyalty, timidity, distrust, and avarice, has satisfied all who have sought to know the facts that at the end of this rebellion there will be no freedmen whom the economical interests of this Union can afford to spare. My friend from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] is seeking to make it easier by legislative provision for white emigrants to come among us. I wish him success. Let them come—the healthy, sturdy, and studious German from the Rhine to the Vistula. We will welcome them all—and the impetuous Irish and the canny Scotch! We have room enough for all loyal men from all lands under the sun. But we cannot spare the freedmen. In those tropical regions of the South where they have been deprived of themselves they have a right to live. And the industrial interests of our country require that their compensated labor should enrich the land which has been cursed by their unpaid toil. But, sir, all our legislation thus far has been for ourselves. We have imposed taxes upon the lands and subjected them to sale. The Government of the United States has become the owner of large tracts of abandoned property. We have appointed tax commissioners and laid on them the duty of leasing lands so as to bring to the Treasury the greatest revenue. We have provided for the expatriation of the freedman, but not for his relief. The necessity for practical legislation upon this great subject is thus made plain.

Mr. Speaker, the purposes and objects of this law are twofold; and they are vindicated by the plainest considerations of justice and of self-interest. The Government of the United States stands committed before the world this day by the laws which we have passed, by the proclamation of the President, and indeed by the necessary issues of this rebellion, to a humane and enlightened policy toward the freedmen of the South. Our laws have made them free; the proclamation of the Commander-in-Chief has declared them free; and day by day, as this war has culminated toward the meridian of freedom, hundreds of thousands of loyal men, slaves heretofore, stand before your armies waiting your action, that the freedom you have vouchsafed shall be a blessing and not a curse. Why were these men made free? Was it because slavery was wrong, because it degraded the slave and tempted the master away from the great truths of our common Master who spoke upon the mount? Was it that we might "render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's?"

Was the conscience of the nation troubled by reason of its sins, and did the Commander-in-Chief therefore proclaim his gospel of glad tidings, and did the Congress of the United States therefore emancipate the slaves of rebels? If that had been so in fact, if Congress could have seen that it was better in the sight of God to obey the laws of God rather than the constitutions of men; if the Commander-in-Chief could under his oath of office as a high act of justice, justified as such and not by military necessity, have decreed freedom to the enslaved, it would nevertheless have been incumbent on us to lead them gently into the land of promise, and not to permit them to wander through the wilderness until a generation had died by the way.

But it was not so, and upon the facts of history it would be an act of meanness which no language can fitly describe, and for which no national suffering could fitly atone, if we should leave those men, freshly freed after a life of servitude, children of the nation as they are, to grope their way into the light without parent or guardian or friend. Why, sir, we freed them for our own selfish ends. It was to weaken the enemy. It was as a means of crushing the rebellion. It was because they were made to work while the rebels fought. It was because we wanted their strong arms upon our side. It was because we began to see that we must fight them or free them. Let us not be too self-righteous, for "even the publicans" would have done "thesame." Look back and recall the arguments upon which the constitutionality of all our legislation has been defended. Sound arguments they were, and by slow degrees they have commended themselves to magistrates and to men, until now the heart of the nation rests contentedly upon the logic of their conclusions. But they were arguments drawn from the arsenal of military necessity. They were hurled by the power of the laws of war against a national iniquity, it is true, but against it, not because it was a sin, but because it was a strength to the enemy which we had a right to annihilate and destroy. Well, sir, we have destroyed it, and as our armies march on, its destruction becomes more certain and more universal, and now a great national duty looks us in the face.

Sir, we had no right to decree freedom and not to guaranty safe guidance and protection. It does not meet the case to say we had no right to free them, and therefore we will not act. And I invoke the practical statesmanship and the personal humanity of those who do not see their way open to act with us who are now charged with the administration of this Government, to unite with us here and now upon this legislation which existing facts demand. For, whether it was right or wrong under the Constitution to decree emancipation by law or proclamation, it has been done, and it cannot be undone. We are responsible for it. But because of it, and because of the rebellion itself, which preceded military orders and all congressional enactments, three millions of enslaved men have become and are becoming free. Concede it was wrong. What then? Is there a man upon this floor who would send them back to slavery? If not, what shall be done? Shall the Government support them? They must do so in some way, with law or without law. They must not starve. They have been driven into their graves by hunger and by neglect already. Shall this continue? Mr. Yeatman, of the western sanitary commission, after his examination into the condition of freedmen between Memphis and Natchez, writes as follows:

"Dr. Littlefield, who is the physician of the infirmary farms, is located at the Savage place, where he has established a freedman's hospital. He appears to take a very deep interest in this people, and is desirous to aid in improving their condition. He reports he has to furnish medicines and attendance to many of those on the leased plantations, especially to those on the places leased by one man who had leased five plantations, whose negroes are greatly neglected and poorly provided for. The testimony of quite a number of persons fully corroborated this statement. One of the freedmen, Hanson Jackson, working at Wilton's plantation, said that they get corn wherever they can find it on abandoned plantations; that they frequently have to go as far as Tensas bayou; that he has been without bread for days; that four pounds of meat per week is all that is allowed him; that he pays for his flour, and has worked since April without receiving any pay or clothing whatever; that he only receives tickets for actual days' work, to be paid when the crop is sold. Others from the same farm testified to the same thing, and laborers from other plantations gave similar testimony. None received molasses, rice, or beans, and hominy only when they chose to make it themselves.

"The poor negroes are everywhere greatly depressed at their condition. They all testify that if they were only paid their little wages as they earn them, so that they could purchase clothing, and were furnished with the provisions promised they could stand it; but to work and get poorly paid, poorly fed, and not doctored when sick, is more than they can endure. Among the thousands whom I questioned none showed the least unwillingness to work. If they could only be paid fair wages they would be contented and happy.

They do not realize that they are free men. They say that they are told they are, but then they are taken and hired out to men who treat them, so far as providing for them is concerned, far worse than their 'secesh' masters did. Besides this they feel that their pay or hire is lower now than it was when 'the secesh' used to hire them. This is true. A good negro man would hire for from $200 to $240 per annum, and a woman for from $150 to $180 per annum, and be fed and clothed besides, and that too when cotton was only worth ten cents a pound. Now it is worth seventy cents. Why should not the freedman now get at least as much for his labor as the slaveowner did for it when he was a slave? The planter who formerly hired a negro slave obtained from $450 to $500 as the result of his labor; now he will obtain at least $2,500, while the laborer, if he should obtain his entire year's wages, will only receive $62; $2 per head being deducted to pay his medical attendance, which is never given. But the poor freedman fares even worse than this. He does not get his $7 per month, or $84 per annum, less $2 for medical attendance. He only gets paid at that rate for the actual number of days which he may work, that is twenty-seven cents per day, so that if the planter furnishes but ten days' labor in the month, the laborer receives but $2.70 for his month's labor. Was there ever a greater iniquity than this? I am confident that it is only necessary for this commission to present these facts at Washington to have them corrected.

"The parties leasing plantations and employing these negroes do it from no motives either of loyalty or humanity. The desire of gain alone prompts them, and they care little whether they make it out of the blood of those they employ or from the soil. There are of course exceptions; but I am informed that the majority of the lessees were only adventurers, camp followers, 'Army sharks,' as they are termed, who have turned aside from what they consider their legitimate prey, the poor soldier, to gather the riches of the land which his prowess has laid open to them. I feel that the fathers and brothers and friends of these brave men should have an opportunity to reap, under a more equitable system for the laborer, the reward of the months of toil and exposure it has cost to open this country to the institutions of freedom and compensated labor. If these plantations were required to be subdivided into parcels or tracts to suit the views and means of our western men, say in farms of from one to two hundred acres, thousands would soon flock to the South to lease them, especially when it is known that one acre of ground there cultivated in cotton would yield, in dollars, ten times as much as at home. Besides this subdivision would attract a loyal population, who would protect the country against any guerrilla bands that might infest it.

"General Hawkins, who has been for several months in command of troops in this region, a man of sound judgment, has given much thought to this subject, and he fully convinced me that the true interest of our country, and justice to our loyal people, who have given their sons to the crushing out of this rebellion, require that they should have the opportunity to share in the fruits of their victories."

This testimony from one who speaks of what he saw and knows does not stand alone. It is indeed the voice of many who have gone among the freedmen in their new homes along the Mississippi. Yet the Government at Washington has endeavored to do all that in the absence of any legislative authority could have been done without more means of knowledge to guide them in their action. General Thomas, who has been organizing colored regiments under orders from the War Department, found that some plan should be adopted at once to regulate the labor and wages of the freedmen. Such work was not fairly within the scope of his authority, and great errors have been committed; but experience was gained which will be made available both to control the rapacity of men whose sole object is gain and to secure to the honest laborer his fair compensation. But to illustrate somewhat the treatment these freedmen have been receiving at Memphis, I call attention to one other statement made by Mr. Yeatman:

"Within the city of Memphis, not directly connected with any of the camps or with the colored regiments, there are some three thousand freed men and women, mostly freed men, who are employed in various ways and at various rates of compensation. Those employed by Government receive but ten dollars per month; while many could readily earn from thirty to fifty dollars per month. Those thus employed are outside of the military organization.

"To give an instance: One quartermaster told me that he had in his employment a harness-maker, to whom they could only pay ten dollars per month, while they were paying white men doing the same work forty-five dollars per month; and that the colored man could readily procure the same wages were he allowed to seek a market for his labor in the same town. I saw a number of colored men pressed into service (not military) to labor at the rate of ten dollars per month, one of whom petitioned to be released as he had a good situation at thirty dollars per month. The freedmen on the steamboat on which I was a passenger from St. Louis to Memphis were all colored, and were receiving forty-five dollars per month. These men were afraid to go ashore at Memphis for fear of being picked up and forced into Government employment at less than one fourth their existing wages. Besides the fact that men are thus pressed into service, thousands have been employed for weeks and months who have never received anything but promises to pay. This negligence and failure to comply with obligations have greatly disheartened the poor slave who comes forth at the call of the President, and supposes himself a free man, and that by leaving his rebel master he is inflicting a blow on the enemy, ceasing to labor and provide food for him and the armies of the rebellion. Thus he was promised freedom, but how is it with him? He is seized in the street and ordered to go and help unload a steamboat, for which he will be paid, or sent to work in the trenches, or to labor for some quartermaster, or to chop wood for the Government. He labors for months, and at last is only paid with promises, unless perchance it may be with kicks, cuffs, and curses."

Now, sir, I have faith to believe that this House will, by no party vote, determine that these abuses, so far as they are controllable by legislation, shall be controlled. These facts are not isolated. Indeed I fear they are not exceptional. But they demonstrate that on grounds of humanity—and it is the argument for humanity that I am trying to present—the time has come when the representatives of the people should act. Longer delay is criminal. Why, sir, if this bill as it was introduced one year ago had then become a law, and if the bureau it contemplates had been organized by a man of genius and of heart—for both are wanted for this work—many hundreds of lives would have been saved, much gross injustice would have been prevented, and a large profit would have been realized by the Government that would have amply reimbursed their entire outlay. And that brings me to consider the object of this bill as connected with the interests of the people and of the Government. That it is for our interests, material, political, and pecuniary, to protect these men so far as they require protection, and no further, it will not be difficult to prove. It is almost to be regretted that the argument is so strong. The necessities of war compelled us to make them free. We are entitled to small praise for that. And if now, besides all reasons resting on broad grounds of justice and humanity, it shall appear that a decent regard to prudential and pecuniary considerations requires just such legislation as we are trying to initiate, it will not become us, I fear, to assume much credit for a philanthropy which will be profitable as well as godly!

It would be but fair in this argument to credit the freedmen with one hundred thousand men in the military service of the Government. That number will be doubled before many months have passed. Every man of them stands for a son, a brother, or a friend. By just so many men our own homes are the happier and the more productive. What would those lives be worth to us if we could compute their value in money? But it may be said that does not tend to prove that a bureau is wanted: we may take all the strong men that can bear arms without being troubled with women and children. I do not believe any gentleman will be found with hardihood enough to make such suggestion. But it is not true. How long will those strong men fight in our ranks when it shall be known to them that the Government for which they peril their lives permits the unarmed freedmen and all the women and children upon the plantations of the South to be oppressed? These freedmen are men, and although they have been humbled by their condition they have the affections of men. They know their value to us, and they know our value to them; they will fight bravely, heroically, to the death. But you may depend upon it they will not fight, and they ought not to fight, if the Government shall declare its policy to be that plantation lessees may absorb the muscle and sinew and labor of all who do not fight but can work, and that for half wages half paid, while they wage battle with rebels at the risk of slaughter upon the field and with the certainty of death if captured by the enemy.

It is then but fair, when we consider the selfish reasons urging us to action in the direction of this bill, that we remember the priceless value of these fighting men, and that we appreciate the importance of giving to them legislative assurance that those who are left at home are not left subject to the caprices and the avarice of men who regard them as serfs of the soil, and as instruments by which to work out their own way to fortune.

But, Mr. Speaker, the uniform testimony of the men who have witnessed the willingness and the ability of these freedmen for profitable employment demonstrates that, by judicious and timely aid and under the supervision of superintendents able and willing to "organize and direct their labor and to adjust with them their wages," the liberated slaves who shall not have been received into our ranks will return to the Government in produce and in money more than shall be expended on their account.

At Fort Monroe more than a year ago it was ascertained that although the colored laborers employed by the Government were paid less than half the price paid for the same service here at Washington, a sum not less than thirty thousand dollars was due to them for work. At Lawrence, in Kansas, where a school for refugees had been established before October, 1862, a stranger who visited them and saw the cleanliness and good order that prevailed said to the superintendent, "This must have cost a good deal of money." "Not a cent, not a cent," was the reply. "These children are dressed at the expense of their parents from the proceeds of their own earnings since they have been here." These refugees had gone from Missouri and Arkansas. There were but a few hundreds, but where they found employment they accumulated money and property at once. But they had required help. One man of some means had given to them orders for supplies to the amount of five or six hundred dollars. But the whole sum excepting eight dollars had been paid by the refugees themselves. Captain E. W. Hooper, aid to General Saxton, one year since wrote from Beaufort that after an experience then of eight months among the freedmen of South Carolina, where we know that slavery has done its worst to brutalize the master and to enfeeble its victims, and with good opportunity to observe the conduct of the freed negroes as laborers, it was his "personal conviction that almost without exception they would readily become industrious and productive laborers under any liberal system which should offer a fair and reasonably certain compensation proportioned to the work actually done." From Craney island, in Virginia, from Helena, in Arkansas, from St. Helena and other islands in South Carolina, the proof is plenary that with judicious aid and under a fair system of labor and wages the expenses involved in the first necessary outlay would be reimbursed by the productive labor of freedmen within a reasonable period of time. The "facts" published by the emancipation league and the letters and reports to which I have already adverted permit us to entertain no doubt that this bureau will, if placed in the charge of able and administrative men, be conducted substantially without cost to the Government.

Mr. CLAY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. ELIOT. Certainly, if it does not come out of my time.

No objection was made.

Mr. CLAY. I wish to know whether the gentleman intends to include within this emancipation bill the State of Kentucky; whether he intends to trample under foot the constitution and laws of Kentucky, and free every slave without the consent of their owners?

Mr. ELIOT. I am happy to say to the gentleman that Kentucky is this time out of the ring altogether. This bill does not contemplate Kentucky at all, and has no reference to it.

Mr. CLAY. I will say that the gentleman goes so far as not only to take all the negroes in the South, but he is disposed to seize all the lands in that country, under the idea that they are abandoned. I have many constituents who hold property in that country who are all loyal men, but who are living in the State of Kentucky and never have lived in the South. I wish to know whether the lands of residents in Kentucky are to be considered as abandoned, and hence to be seized and disposed of under this bill?

Mr. ELIOT. Where do the loyal citizens, the constituents of the honorable gentleman, reside?

Mr. CLAY. In my district.

Mr. ELIOT. Where are their plantations?

Mr. CLAY. In Mississippi, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Tennessee.

Mr. ELIOT. And those plantations are owned by men residing in the district of my honorable friend?

Mr. CLAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELIOT. If they are not abandoned plantations they do not come at all under the range of this law. If those plantations are abandoned I think the honorable gentleman's constituents are rebels.

Mr. CLAY. I go further, and say that I am the owner of a plantation there myself. [Laughter.] Because I am attending to my duties here on behalf of my constituents is my plantation there to be considered as abandoned and to come under this law?

Mr. ELIOT. No, sir; the gentleman is constructively upon his plantation.

Mr. CLAY. The overseers on those plantations have been driven off by the military authorities; and are the plantations to be seized as abandoned property on that account?

Mr. ELIOT. Why did they not remain upon their property if they were loyal men? If they were rebels they have probably gone South and are in the ranks of the rebellion. But the desertion by the overseer does not leave the gentleman's farm "abandoned."

Mr. CLAY. They have gone off because the law did not protect them on their plantations. I was myself in Kentucky, and had to go over into Ohio for protection.

Mr. ELIOT. If the owners of these plantations are rebels, we will take their slaves if we can, and take care of them until they can contribute to their own support.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether, under the sixth section of this act, abandoned plantations in Kentucky, Maryland, or any one of the slave States, may not be subject to colonization and settlement through the agency of the commission? I call his attention to the proposed amendment to the sixth section, which expressly provides for colonization on these plantations which have been abandoned, without making any distinction between loyal and disloyal slave States.

Mr. ELIOT. If I understand the inquiry of the gentleman from Indiana, it is whether, under the provisions of this bill, some portion of the State of Kentucky may not be taken as colony ground. No, sir; it may not be. This bill proposes no such scheme.

Mr. MALLORY. I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky—

Mr. ELIOT. Massachusetts, sir.

Mr. MALLORY. I beg pardon of Kentucky, and of the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Laughter.] I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether, when he made the remark just now that Kentucky was out of the ring for the present, he intended to bring Kentucky into the ring, and how and when?

Mr. ELIOT. I should like right well to answer that question, but it will take a little time. It is a mere matter of personal opinion that the gentleman inquires about, how long it would be before I should want to bring Kentucky into the ring, and what I would do with her. I have no sort of objection to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. MALLORY. I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether he wants to confiscate the landed estate of my colleague [Mr. CLAY] in the State of Mississippi, knowing my colleague to be a Union man? Is he willing that this bill shall so operate as to call my colleague's property in Mississippi abandoned property, and to have that property taken and settled by freedmen, perhaps by the slaves of my colleague?

Mr. ELIOT. Certainly not, sir. Certainly not. We are kind-hearted people on this side of the House.

Mr. MALLORY. The gentleman's bill does that very thing.

Mr. ELIOT. Oh no, sir. I pray you read it.

Mr. MALLORY. I have read it, and I think the gentleman himself does not clearly comprehend it.

Mr. KNAPP. If I understand the gentleman, he claims that it is not proposed that this bill shall operate in the State of Kentucky at all.

Mr. ELIOT. No, sir, it does not.

Mr. KNAPP. I call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to that part of the sixth section which gives the commissioners power to permit persons of African descent, and persons who are, or shall have become, free, to occupy, cultivate, and improve, all lands lying within those districts now or heretofore in rebellion, and all real estate to which the United States shall have acquired title. Now, under the operations of the various confiscation laws, the United States may acquire title to lands in Kentucky, and I desire to know from the gentleman from Massachusetts whether this bill is not intended to operate on these lands.

Mr. ELIOT. I ask the gentleman whether he intends to say that the State of Kentucky is in rebellion?

Mr. KNAPP. No; but I understand that a good many of the citizens of Kentucky have joined the rebellion, and that their property in Kentucky is liable to confiscation.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I move to go to business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise the point of order that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] having the floor the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] cannot take the floor from him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is familiar with the rule that allows any member to take the floor and move to go to the Speaker's table. The gentleman from Massachusetts has twelve minutes of unexpired time.

Mr. STEVENS. I merely want the Senate amendments to the internal revenue bill referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. ELIOT. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has already consumed two minutes, and I have only twelve minutes in which to finish my remarks.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think that the gentleman from Massachusetts should be taken off the floor by the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule on that subject.

The Clerk read from Barclay's Digest a sentence stating that it is the invariable practice to permit a member, on the expiration of the morning hour, to take the floor, even though another member may be occupying it, to make the motion to proceed to business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. STEVENS. I merely wanted to have a bill referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. I have no objection to the gentleman going on and finishing his remarks. I withdraw my motion if the gentleman does not take it kindly.

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, there is another view to take of this question of expense. There has not been a day since the fortunes of war first opened to the slave his way to freedom when there have not come to our forts and military camps and within our lines, everywhere when fort or camp or line was accessible, men and women, old and young, of all ages and conditions, healthy and strong, disabled and infirm. Everywhere our banner has been raised these fugitives have tended toward it as the needle turns toward its pole. And they have come under the stars of our flag with the faith of the mariner who holds his helm so that his disabled bark may keep its course northward although the tempest shall threaten and darkness is all around him, for he knows right well that above the storm the north star is shining and will guide him safely to his home. When they began to come General Butler received and retained them, for they were "contraband of war."

In old England when, by mischance, a man was killed, the thing that caused his death was held sacred, and called "deodand." The Union "as it was" has been dashed against the slave and destroyed. Let the slave be "deodand" forever, for he has been forfeited to God! But coming as these slaves did before proclamations or confiscation acts, our Government has been compelled to take them, to feed them, to clothe them, to shelter them, and they still come, and they would come without proclamation or law. They hail our successful generals as angels of deliverance, and when the Galena chieftain, who is sometimes alluded to on this floor by his irrepressible Representative, shall advance again his conquering armies, he will hear sounding through rice field and cane-brake and savanna and swamp, hearty and earnest hosannas to Universal Salvation Grant! These freedmen must live at the Government charge until they are permitted to support themselves. We cannot help it. We have not been able from the beginning to avoid it. In Virginia and Maryland and North Carolina and all down the Mississippi, and upon the sea islands of the South, the same causes have operated and the same results have followed. We have no means of knowing until the facts can be gathered from the different military departments how many rations or what other aid it has been necessary to provide for refugees from bondage. It ought, indeed, to be stated that such aid has been given not alone to colored refugees, but to the "poor whites" to keep them from starvation. In the report of Messrs. Owen, McKay, and Howe to the War Department, it is said that—

"In November last General Butler was feeding in New Orleans thirty-two thousand whites, seventeen thousand of whom were British-born, and only ten thousand negroes; these last chiefly women and children, the able-bodied negro men being usually employed on abandoned plantations. Nor where relief has been required by both whites and blacks have the latter usually applied for or received in proportion to their number nearly as much as the former. Mr. Vincent Colver, appointed by General Burnside at Newbern, North Carolina, superintendent of the poor, white and black, reports that while seven thousand five hundred colored persons and eighteen hundred white persons received relief," * * * * "the average proportion dealt out?" * * * * "was about as one to each colored person to sixteen for each white person. At the time this occurred work was offered to both blacks and whites—to the whites at the rate of twelve dollars a month, and to the blacks at the rate of eight dollars a month."

It is also true that no needless expense has been incurred. Captain Hooper, in speaking of the department of the South, says:

"Where the Government has been obliged to support destitute contrabands it has issued only such portions of the Army ration as were absolutely necessary to support life. No fair-minded man acquainted with the facts of the case can say that in this department they have so far been a great burden to such a Government as ours."

I have no reason to believe that in any of our departments aid has been given where it was not necessary.

But the point I make is that large expenses are now incurred. And it is impossible to prevent this charge from being continued needlessly unless the Government shall take this matter in hand and by its own organized and systematic action enable the freedmen to support themselves. The sooner this bureau is efficiently established, the sooner that expense will be avoided.

Mr. Speaker, it is not possible that the work of this bureau can be properly performed by any agency except that of the Government. The argument on this point is well stated in the letter to the President from the freedmen's societies of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Cincinnati:

"There is not yet in the public mind any duly awakened sense of the magnitude of the negro question, as for two years there was not of the war itself. The Government must know, even better than the people, what the vastness of the question is, and it is not proper for us to ask it, Mr. President, the Government is doing, or preparing to do, what is necessary to meet it; to reduce the evils connected with emancipation to their lowest point, and elevate its blessings to the highest; to establish a system, carefully considered and adapted, and executed with energy and zeal, for the thorough and general dealing with the freedmen? It is plain to us, with our experience, that the question is too large for anything short of Government authority, Government resources, and Government ubiquity to deal with. The plans, the means, the agencies within any voluntary control are insignificant in their adequacy to the vastness of the demand. Our relief associations have discharged their highest duty in testing many of the most doubtful questions touching the negroes' ability and willingness to come under direction when direction has lost its authoritative character. They have proved the freedman's diligence, docility, and loyalty, his intelligence and value as a laborer. They have alleviated much want and misery also. But were their resources ten times what they are, and ten times what they can be made, they would be no substitute for the governmental watchfulness and provision which so numerous a race under such extraordinary circumstances requires. In our judgment the present and the future of the freedmen demands a kind and degree of study, of guidance, and of aid, which it is in the nature of things impossible the Government should give indirectly, or by means of any existing bureau or combination of bureaus. The case is large enough, serious enough, urgent enough, involving the nation's interest, its humanity, the respect of the people for the Administration, and our reputation throughout the world, to require the best ability the country offers, organized in a regularly constituted Government bureau, with all the military and civil powers of the Government behind it, with all the existing machinery of transportation, commissary stores, and quartermaster's facilities, with all the omnipotence of the national agencies coordinated and brought to bear upon the treatment of the case."

"We ask, then, your interposition with Congress, recommending the immediate creation of a Bureau of Emancipation, charged with the study of plans and the execution of measures for easing, guiding, and in every way judiciously and humanely aiding the passage of our emancipated and yet to be emancipated blacks from their old condition of forced labor to their new state of voluntary industry. We ask it for many reasons, but we will content ourselves with stating only two:

"1. It is necessary that there should be a central office, to collect from original investigations, and to receive from investigations already made and making, the now scattered information and varied and undigested testimony respecting the condition, wants, and prospects of the freedman. The amount of knowledge now existing in private hands, or local spheres and associations, is already great; but it is nearly useless for want of being arranged and brought into systematic order. If offered to officials already overburdened with care and duties, and laid before Departments which are not yet agreed as to the precise sphere within which it falls. The honest differences of Departments as to their authority and responsibility in the case have been a chief obstruction to the methods of dealing promptly with the necessities of the freedman. Were a bureau in existence with no other duty but to attend to this vast and ever-expanding class of our fellow-creatures, countrymen, and citizens, it would at once be able to concentrate, and in the shortest possible time to methodize, the now diffused and disjointed testimony in the case, and from its central and commanding point of view to devise plans and measures which would satisfy the humanity and relieve the anxieties of the nation.

"2. It is not merely a central office that is wanted. It must be a Government bureau. The various freedmen's associations—rich, numerous, and powerful—might unite and establish a central office at Washington, in which should converge all the light and knowledge collected at the most distant points of the circumference, and from which wise and humane plans might originate and radiate in all directions. But such a central office, disconnected from the Government, as in that case by the hypothesis it would be, without any right to official information or assistance, would lack the chief illumination now required, which is simply this: a knowledge how the existing machinery of the Government in all departments can be brought to bear on the problem of guidance, support, and relief in this temporary though not brief state of the transition of millions of bondsmen from forced to free labor. This is a problem in which the vast, costly, omnipresent machinery and agencies of the Government already existing, with the least possible additions and the least possible disturbance, are to be economized and applied to the work of starting and aiding a humane process of emancipation."

Mr. Speaker, I will not at this time discuss at length the brief and simple provisions of this bill. The duties imposed on the Commissioner are large, but not more so than is necessary to make the bureau effective. It is connected with the War Department for obvious reasons. From the beginning of the rebellion the military power which effected the freedom of the slave has been invoked for his protection. The power of the War Department is required to command respect and obedience where rebellion has so recently had control. In fact, most that has hitherto been accomplished to organize and adjust labor, excepting the action under the tax act of June, 1862, has been done under authority and pursuant to orders which have emanated from that Department, and for the present there can be no doubt that the functionaries employed should find their official chief in the Secretary of War.

Sir, my duty will not have been performed without stating distinctly the clear constitutional power of Congress to legislate in the direction of this bill.

1. By the Constitution the President is made Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. He has, therefore, in time of war all the powers which by the recognized laws of war are conferred upon that high office. Such powers are as constitutional as that to appoint an ambassador with the advice and consent of the Senate, or a judge of the Supreme Court. By the rebellion the war powers of the President and Congress have been invoked and are in force; among them the power to liberate the slaves of the enemy is one of the most efficient and humane. That has been used. But the power to liberate three million slaves involves the duty of their needful protection. Without that the exercise of the power to liberate might be a crime. Such protection by the Government which made free cannot be given without the action of Congress. Without that the power of the President cannot be carried into effect. By the direct terms of the Constitution Congress has power to make all laws necessary to carry into execution all the powers conferred upon the President.

2. Congress has power to declare war and to "make rules concerning captures on land." The slaves liberated by the confiscation act, and to be liberated by its provisions, are captives of war, and as such are proper subjects of our legislation.

3. Congress has power "to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces." Legislation has become necessary and laws have been passed to regulate the conduct of the Army in regard to slaves found in the enemy's country, and to prohibit our officers from returning them to slavery. But those laws would be imperfect in their operation and might be oppressive in their results without further legislation; and so a necessity has arisen for an act to protect the freedmen.

4. The President, as Commander-in-Chief, has a right to issue all proclamations within the power of military commanders, as recognized by the laws of war, addressed to the public enemy. The faith of the nation is pledged to make good those proclamations, to maintain their provisions, and to fulfill the pledges which they contain or by necessity imply. The proclamation of freedom has liberated men oppressed by a life-servitude. Those men are now subjects of the Government. They owe it allegiance, and are as such entitled to its protection. To that end this legislation is required.

Upon all these grounds this bill may securely rest. But if all proclamations were wrong and all laws were without constitutional support which have sought to liberate the slaves of enemies, still the rebellion itself has freed them and they are subjects of our charge. We must protect them or be faithless in our office.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I have stated the imperative necessity of this bill, the high objects which we would accomplish, its brief provisions, and its legal right to our support. It remains to discuss its expected benefits to the freedmen and to ourselves. But first I would invoke the attention of the House to a report submitted by the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. KALBFLEISCH,] and signed by him and by his colleague on the committee, [Mr. KNAPP,] in opposition to this bill, for it assumes to present the argument against the legal power of Congress to legislate and against the expediency of our present action. Its formidable exordium is worthy of note:

"That a careful examination of the provisions of the bill under consideration has convinced your committee that it not only involves grave and important questions, but likewise a task of great magnitude to overcome the legal and apparently just objections which arise upon a fair scrutiny of its contents. Humanity may be pleaded in favor of the passage of the bill, but great caution will have to be exercised, not only that the plea be well founded, but that no unintentional injustice be perpetrated thereby."

One may feel justified in approaching with some timidity an argument thus heralded. But there need be no fear. These four questions are proposed for discussion:

"1. Has Congress the legal power to establish a bureau for the purposes contemplated in the bill; and are the matters intended to be legislated upon within the province of and of a character to make them proper subjects for national legislation?"

"2. Has Congress the constitutional power to impose a tax upon the citizens of one State to support the indigent freedmen of another State, no matter how humane and charitable the motive prompting the act?"

"3. Will the passage of the bill in question produce the effect intended or desired? May not results directly opposite to those anticipated by its friends flow from it, and a new system of vassalage, only differing in its appellation with the one hitherto existing between the freedmen and their masters, be inaugurated?"

"4. Should not the bureau, if established, be under the control and direction of the Department of the Interior, instead of the War Department?"

It would be a figure of speech which I am not bold enough to use, to say that these questions are argued. The legal argument upon the first two propositions is disposed of summarily. This is it:

"Your committee are of opinion that Congress has no legal power to carry into effect all the provisions of the contemplated bill. A plea of humanity, policy, or war necessity may be urged in favor of assuming the power, and a forced construction placed upon the plain letter of the Constitution to sanction the act. But a great stretch of power and an unwarranted perversion of the language of the fundamental law will have to be resorted to in this instance to attain this end."

But the minority of the committee do not deem it to be worth their while to state the grounds of their opinion, or any reasons or authority in its behalf. The Commander-in-Chief has used the power of war to declare freedom to the slaves of enemies. Had he a right to do so? The minority of the committee do not deny it. Laws of Congress have been passed to the same end. But the validity of these laws is not brought in question. The fact exists that a nation of freedmen has been created, and that many hundreds of thousands of men, women, and children who had been in slavery are now within our lines and under our protection, and that they must be at Government charge until aided to self-support. The great question is not approached. But the "committee fail to comprehend" "why the freedmen of African descent should become these marked objects of special legislation to the detriment of the unfortunate whites." These freedmen when in slavery composed the working power of the rebellion. That power has been wrested from the enemy so far as the proclaimed freedom has been enforced. We have a right to make that power available to ourselves. But to this end legislation is required. That is one reason. After a life of servitude, inherited from slave ancestors stolen from their homes and subjected by force to the control of their masters, these freedmen thus invited to freedom for our own security, and recognized as men, have this right, which will not be denied by any theorist of any party; that is to say, the right to earn among us their own subsistence. To that end this legislation is required.

But to what "detriment" of what "unfortunate whites?" The burden of their support is now on the Government and must be borne, and if a "tax upon the labor of the poor" is the detriment and the "less favored white men" are the "unfortunate whites" referred to by the report, who must bear the tax? Then let this bureau be quickly organized, for so the burden will be at once lifted up and the "detriment" be converted into profit. It is objected to this bill that its "machinery" is insufficient, and that it will be well to leave it with its originators until an intelligent and well-defined system has been matured. Then let the objectors suggest more operative machinery, and by judicious amendments perfect the system. Men, who know by study and by sight the wants of the freedmen and of the Government, have carefully examined the provisions of this bill. The "machinery" by which this bureau will become most useful and effective must be made in the light of experience and by judicious and wise men, mindful equally of the rights of the Government and the necessities of the freedmen. A detailed system of government embodied in this organic law would be unwise and prejudicial to all the interests concerned. But two gentlemen, who represent the minority of the committee, say:

"If these freedmen of African descent are still slaves, and the Government have inherited or taken by conquest the position of their masters, they are of course liable to be separated from the free population, have their tasks assigned them, and their wages controlled and established by the representatives of their masters; but if the presidential proclamation has had any effect, and if they are freedmen in anything else but in name, in the opinion of your committee, the Constitution of the United States and of the several States prescribes that jurisdiction over most of the subjects mentioned in the bill shall be vested in the judiciary."

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. Do I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to say that only two members of the committee dissented from the majority report?

Mr. ELIOT. I say so.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. That is not my understanding. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MIDDLETON] was not present in committee, but I believe he coincides with our views.

Mr. ELIOT. The gentleman from New Jersey is present now, and can contradict my statement if it is not correct.

What does this mean? This bill does not seek to separate the freedmen from the free population, or to assign them tasks, or to control and establish wages. But assuming the effectiveness of the proclamation, on what does the "opinion" rest that the constitutions of the several States vest in the judiciary "jurisdiction over most of the subjects mentioned in the bill?" What constitutions and what States are referred to? Is the sovereign State of South Carolina one of them? But the report finds that too many clerks may be appointed at Washington; that in fact they may be appointed without any limitation as to number "except that they are restricted to two in a class, but without any limitation as to the number of classes." The "careful examination" which the minority of the committee have given to this matter has failed to inform them that there are just four classes of clerks, and that two of each class would therefore give eight clerks precisely, if the whole number authorized by the bill should be appointed. "It appears," argues the report, "depending entirely upon the necessity existing in his mind whether" "the power of disposing" of "these freedmen may not revive most of the odious features of slavery without its name." This argument defies analysis, and cannot be made more clear than by its statement; but it was not quite fair to refrain from showing how it appears that such contingency might depend on such necessity existing in the mind of the Secretary of War.

But the minority of the committee feel it to be right to say:

"Under the provisions of the bill the freedman may be as effectually stripped of the proceeds of his labor to build up the fortunes of an avaricious superintendent as though he were under the control of a master, without enjoying the benefits of the protection and support the system of slavery affords."

This gratuitous statement is without justice or fairness, or foundation in fact. Under the fair administration of this bureau no superintendent can oppress the freedman for personal gain. This must have been obvious if examination had been given to the provisions of the bill. The criticism is, not true. But this remarkable report proceeds to say:

"Large sections of rebel slave territory have been brought within the military power of our Government; and it is highly probable that still larger portions of such territory will be added thereto. Your committee cannot conceive of any reason why this vast domain, paid for by the blood of white men, should be set apart for the sole benefit of the freedmen of African descent, to the exclusion of all others, and leased for an unlimited time, thereby preventing its occupation, except by them, at least for a long time to come. It seems to your committee incomprehensible, nay, extremely unjust."

What seems "incomprehensible, nay, extremely unjust?" These gentlemen cannot conceive of any reason why this domain should be set apart for the exclusive benefit of freedmen! But why complain because of that inability? This bill does not tax their power in that direction. Such proposed use of these lands would be simple enough and "comprehensible," whether just or unjust, but the proposition before the House involves the consideration of no such question.

The report of the minority becomes more unfair as it draws to its close. It says:

"The bill proposes to give to each petty superintendent the determination of all questions relating to the disposition and direction of all persons of African descent becoming free under any proclamation, military rule or order, or by any act of the State governments, with power to establish and enforce regulations such as may be deemed proper for the judicious treatment and disposition of such freedmen, and with power to assign lands, &c. An institution like this, which assumes the functions of the judiciary over a large portion of the population, and combines with it the domestic management of the master over the personal and household matters of the freedman, cannot be carried out without spreading a network of officials over all the conquered States as numerous as the slavemasters whom this system supersedes."

The bill proposes no such thing. It is difficult to see how one of fair intelligence could examine its provisions and make such a statement. But it is as difficult to believe that any honorable opponent could make it without examination. Upon this point the bill shall speak for itself. The President is empowered to appoint, with the advice and consent of the Senate, a "Commissioner of Freedmen's Affairs"—

To whom shall be referred the adjustment and determination, under the direction of the Secretary of War, of all questions arising under this act, or under any laws now existing or hereafter to be enacted, concerning persons of African descent and persons who are or shall become free by virtue of any proclamation, law, or military order issued, enacted, or promulgated during the present rebellion, or by virtue of any act of emancipation which shall be enacted by any State for the freedom of such persons held to service or labor within such State, or who shall be otherwise entitled to their freedom. And the said Commissioner shall have authority, under the direction of the Secretary of War, to make all needful rules and regulations for the general superintendence, direction, and management of all such persons, and to appoint a chief clerk who shall be also a bonded disbursing officer, and shall have an annual salary of $2,000, and such number of clerks, not exceeding two of each class, as shall be necessary for the proper transaction of the business of said bureau.

The sixth section of the act provides as follows:

That the said assistant commissioners shall, under such regulations, directions, and orders as may be given by the Commissioner of Emancipation from time to time, appoint all necessary resident superintendents and clerks, who shall be paid for their services such reasonable compensation as the Commissioner shall determine, under the direction of the Secretary of War, not exceeding the ordinary and usual compensation for similar service in other Departments; and the said Commissioner, and by his direction the said assistant commissioners, shall have power to permit persons of African descent and persons who are or shall have become free, as aforesaid, under such rules and regulations as may be from time to time prescribed by said Commissioner and approved by the Secretary of War, to occupy, cultivate, and improve all lands lying within those districts now or heretofore in rebellion, which lands may have been or may hereafter be abandoned by their former owners, and all real estate to which the United States shall have acquired title, and which shall not have been previously appropriated by the Government to other uses, and to advise and aid them, when needful, to organize and direct their labor, adjust with them their wages, and receive all returns arising therefrom, which shall be duly accounted for to the Commissioner of Freedmen's Affairs; and all balances, if any there be, after defraying the charges and expenses of the bureau, shall be annually paid into the Treasury of the United States. The said assistant commissioners and superintendents shall have power, as arbitrators, to bring to conciliation and settlement all difficulties arising between freedmen, except when resort to a provost judge or other legal tribunal becomes necessary.

The closing paragraphs of this report are as follows:

"Could this at once be made a self-sustaining system, to be supported by the labor which it controls and directs, and for whose benefit it is intended to act, there might be a semblance of propriety and justice in its proposed inauguration. But if it is to be converted into a grand almshouse department, whereby the labor and property of the white population of the country is to be taxed to support the pauper labor of the freedmen and mendicant officials of the country, its operations cannot be too closely scrutinized."

"The Government have as yet been rather unfortunate in their efforts in behalf of the freed slaves, and it seems to your committee to be very desirable that legislation upon this subject, if it can be done legally, should be confined to the absolute existing wants of the country. After the transition state through which we are now passing shall have ended, and the character and position of this class of our population shall have become better defined, the rights of the Government to the title of the confiscated property determined by competent authority, it will be time enough to initiate a system adapted to their wants and capacities, and calculated for their protection and humane treatment."

How can this system be made self-sustaining until it is inaugurated? We have no doubt, and the minority of the committee do not deny, that the labor for whose benefit it is proposed to act will support this bureau. Its propriety and justice will then be vindicated upon industrial and material grounds as fully as upon grounds of humanity its necessity is now apparent. Of course its operations must be closely scrutinized if it is converted into an "almshouse department." But the scrutiny will be in season when the conversion is apprehended. But what if it be true that Government has been unfortunate in its efforts in behalf of the freed slaves? The Government has done what it could. But Congress has done nothing. The fact asserts the need of action, at once and effective, that such reproach shall be removed. Let legislation be confined to the "absolute existing wants of the country." That is all we propose. But that which is demanded should be had without delay.

Is it true, Mr. Speaker, that we should wait until the quiet of peace shall have hushed the echoes of this war before we initiate any system adapted to the wants and capacities of these freedmen? What can there be in the "character and position of this class of our population" that needs to be defined before we act? Their "character" is not unknown to us. Their social degradation compelled by slavery, their trustful nature, their thirst for knowledge, their willingness to work for the wages of labor, their yearning after what the white man also covets—position, and property which will secure position—we know these things. But we do not know, and shall not until we give them the rights of men, what are their full capacities for that life which is above the material life and that "pursuit of happiness" which aims at ends beyond the horizon which slavery defines.

But what shall be done before that time arrives? Is it the purpose of these gentlemen and of those who act with them in this House that our Government shall maintain these freedmen without system and at unlimited and indefinite cost, furnishing rations and hospital supplies and clothing and keeping them in camps under military rule? If this were possible is it wise? And when the time shall have come at which the gentleman from New York (Mr. KALBFLEISCH) suggests that a system for their humane treatment may be initiated will it be more lawful or constitutional to act then than now? Why, sir, the case is too plain for argument. Now is the accepted time. And this Congress will bear the deserved reproach not only of this great-hearted nation, but of all nations of Christian men, if we falter in this work.

Mr. Speaker, it has somewhat appeared already how the parties to this bill will be the better for the law. But I would take a wider view of this grand work which the war has put upon us. From its commencement no man has been able to anticipate events; nothing has occurred as the wisest seer predicted. Great generals have failed, and men unknown to fame before have conducted us to victory. Battles have been won in the valleys and "above the clouds" by a rank and file bravery which the annals of military history cannot rival. Who of us has not had occasion to say, "Not unto us, but unto Thee, O God! be rendered praise!"

And now out of the war a new nation of men has arisen. No power in Constitution, in President, or in people outside of the rebel States could have held out to them its liberating arm in time of peace. The mad ambition of slaveowners, which struck at the life of the nation to give new life to slavery, disclosed the power to strike back the blow, and in the fullness of time a man was found commissioned to the work.

We read that in the beginning God said, "Let there be light, and there was light." But since the beginning human agencies have worked out the ways of Providence; and never in history since that great fiat has it been given to more than one man to lift up from three million souls the darkness and the doom of slavery. Our duty He has assigned us now. It may be that by some other phrase of law or form of act the mutual interests of the Government and of the freedmen within its borders might be secured. I believe that this bill, wisely administered, will complete the work.

It will enable the Government to help into active, educated, and useful life a nation of freedmen who otherwise would grope their way to usefulness through neglect and suffering to themselves, and with heavy and needless loss to us.

They are children of the Government. By the necessities of war deprived of the guiding and controlling hand which had held in stern mastery their earthly destinies, they are unused to rights heretofore denied them, yet they know somewhat of them by instinct and by association. No matter how abject the slavery, the idea of freedom is in the soul, and when the friendly hand has been extended the freedman has shown capacity and will to walk as a man among men. What they require is to be made sure that they are free, and to be furnished a chance to work and to be guaranteed their reasonable wages. Work they understand. Their mothers worked before them, and went down into dishonored graves, cursed by the unpaid toil of bondage. But wages they have not owned, and in the right to earn and to enjoy them they find their manhood. Soon they will find the place they have a right to fill. Quick to learn, appreciating kindnesses, and returning them with veneration and affection, earnest to acquire property, because that too is proof of manhood, they ask but opportunity, and guidance, and education for a season, and then they will repay you some thirty, and some sixty, and some an hundred-fold.

Without your legislation the freedmen able to fight will be alienated from your cause; the freedmen unfit for service, with the young and the aged and infirm, will be a charge upon your Treasury. But give the aid which this bill can secure to them and you will quickly find not only that peace which comes from duty well discharged, but material strength and a recompense of reward which after all the expenses of your bureau shall have been defrayed will contribute to your wealth.

So shall this, your act, give to the freedmen of the South and to all the freedmen whom you represent, "beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness."

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I move that this bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where there may be the fullest discussion of this whole subject.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. COX. I wish to state that the members on this side of the House are willing that this subject shall be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I hope that will be agreed to by unanimous consent.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. COX. Who has the floor the next time the House resumes the consideration of the bill for the establishment of a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs?

The SPEAKER. The first business in order will be the gentleman's motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the House proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER laid before the House amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 122, to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. STEVENS moved that they be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 83, noes 14.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ARKANSAS CONGRESSIONAL REPRESENTATION.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege. I have the credentials of JAMES M. JOHNSON, from the third congressional district of Arkansas, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee of Elections.

The credentials were read.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move that the credentials be laid upon the table.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the gentleman to forego his objection, and to extend the usual courtesy to this gentleman, to permit his credentials to be referred to the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order, except by unanimous consent. This being a question of privilege, can be called up at any time.

Mr. DAWES. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw his objection, and let the credentials be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I think that we might as well decide the question at once. I do not wish to take up the time of the House, but this question involves mileage and pay and other questions, such as we had in the Louisiana case.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman moves that the credentials shall be laid upon the table, where no one can be heard.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Let it rest for the present.

UNEMPLOYED GENERAL OFFICERS.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Military Affairs a joint resolution to drop from the rolls of the Army unemployed general officers, that it may be printed and recommitted to the same committee.

Mr. COX. I ask, my colleague one question. Has not the President the power to dismiss these officers at his own pleasure without any further legislation by Congress?

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not think that he would feel that he has that right. Whether he has or not there is no harm in passing this and stimulating him. I do not propose to discuss it now.

Mr. COX. I object, because this is a thrust at some generals who have been unjustly unemployed.

CONSCRIPTION.

Mr. SCHENCK moved that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWES in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of Senate bill No. 36, to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863.

The CHAIRMAN stated the question to be upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] as follows:

Amend by striking out the seventeenth section as follows:

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That provost marshals, boards of enrollment, or any member thereof acting by authority of the board, shall have power to summon witnesses and enforce their attendance by attachment without previous payment of fees in any case pending before them, or either of them, and the same witness fees and costs shall be allowed as may be allowed in the district courts of the United States, and they shall have power to administer oaths and affirmations; and any person who shall swear or affirm falsely before any provost marshal or board of enrollment, or member thereof acting by authority of the board, or who shall, before any civil magistrate, swear or affirm falsely to any affidavit to be used in any case pending before any provost marshal or board of enrollment, shall, upon conviction, be fined not exceeding $500, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than twelve months.

And inserting in lieu thereof the eighteenth section as reported by the committee, as follows:

Sec. 18. And be it further enacted, That provost marshals, boards of enrollment, or any member thereof acting by authority of the board, shall have power to summon witnesses in behalf of the Government, and enforce their attendance by attachment without previous payment of fees in any case pending before them, or either of them; and the fees allowed for witnesses attending under summons shall be five cents per mile for mileage, and no other fees or costs shall be allowed under the provisions of this section; and they shall have power to administer oaths and affirmations. And any person who shall willfully and corruptly swear or affirm falsely before any provost marshal or board of enrollment, or member thereof acting by authority of the board, or who shall, before any civil magistrate, willfully and corruptly swear or affirm falsely to any affidavit to be used in any case pending before any provost marshal or board of enrollment, shall, on conviction, be fined not exceeding $500, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than twelve months.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend the amendment by adding after the word "attachment," in the fifth line, the words, "and process shall issue in behalf of the drafted man to bring in his witnesses." I merely wish to say that I think the drafted man, if there be a trial, ought to be allowed process to compel the attendance of witnesses. In all criminal cases the commonwealth always allows the accused process to secure the attendance of his witnesses, and it is done at the cost of the commonwealth.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will explain in a very few words why, after due consideration, this was not adopted by the Committee on Military Affairs as a feature of this section, and why I think the committee were right in their conclusion. The practice now is for persons claiming exemption on the ground of age, physical disability, or any other cause, to produce before the board of enrollment the certificates of their neighbors, their own affidavits, and such other documentary proofs as they may desire to present. The gentleman now proposes that in addition to that the board of enrollment shall summon and examine such witnesses as the drafted man may indicate. Now, if witnesses are brought in under summonses they will get mileage under the provisions of this bill, and if they are to get mileage what is there to prevent enormous abuses? The person drafted may summon all his neighbors, pretending that he wants their testimony, thus giving them an opportunity to visit the county seat with the assurance that their mileage will be paid by the Government. If this rule were adopted it would be liable to great abuses.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN called for tellers on the amendment to the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BALDWIN of Massachusetts, and W. J. ALLEN, were appointed. The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 50, noes 54.

So the amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend the amendment by adding to it the following words:

That drafted men shall have process to bring in their witnesses, but without fees or mileage.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope that amendment will not prevail, for the reason that it will lead to a long array of trials; every man who desires to escape the draft will ask a postponement and the summoning of witnesses, and it will drag out the business indefinitely. Drafted men constantly bring in their testimony now.

Mr. STEVENS. I will save the gentleman trouble. If it is thought that drafted men ought to have no chance, I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have thought nothing of the kind, and have said nothing of the kind. Drafted men now have a right to bring their witnesses before the boards, and do bring them; but what we propose is that they shall not have the authority of the Government to compel all men everywhere that they choose to name to come in as witnesses. I will remark that all kinds of amendments to this bill which tend to prolong the time of deciding whether a man is properly drafted or not will simply burden it and destroy its efficiency, and this amendment will have that effect, although not intended to do so at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraw his amendment?

Mr. STEVENS. I have withdrawn it already.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman had not the floor to withdraw it at that time. Does he withdraw it now?

Mr. STEVENS. No, sir; I will take a vote upon it.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment; and it was agreed to—ayes 66, noes 37.

Mr. KELLOGG, of New York. I offer the following amendment to come in at the end of the section:

And when claim is made for the discharge of a person in any manner in military service, and under the age of liability therefor under this act, without the consent thereto of his parent or guardian, the board of enrollment of his district shall hear evidence adduced and decide thereon; and if found entitled to exemption on such claim shall discharge such person and strike his name from the enrollment: Provided, Such person or his parent or guardian shall first pay back in such manner as shall be directed by the Provost Marshal General all bounties, general and local, he may have received for entering such service.

On looking over this provisions of the bill, Mr. Chairman, I do not see that any provision is made for the cases enumerated in the amendment. Under the operation of the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus there is no remedy that I can discover in cases of minority. There are undoubtedly cases where minors enter the service for the purpose of defrauding the Government, of receiving local and general bounties, and then claim to be discharged from the service on the ground of their minority. My amendment guards against that by requiring that where the discharge of a minor is claimed, and where the claim is authenticated by evidence, he shall first pay back all the bounties, local and general, that he has received, in such a manner as may be approved by the Provost Marshal General. I have even thought that clothing also should be reimbursed; but it seemed to me that that would extend the difficulty too far; although I should be willing that that be made a condition also.

I consider that it is our bounden duty here to provide some remedy for cases of this kind. I suppose there are cases within the knowledge of every member on this floor where exemptions are claimed for minors who have been wheedled into the service; but inasmuch as there is no tribunal established by which their cases can be adjudged, they are cut off. It seems to be our duty to supply this defect. I ask, therefore, that my amendment be considered, and if it meet the approbation of the committee that it be incorporated in the bill.

Mr. GANSON. I agree with my colleague [Mr. KELLOGG] that there should be some remedy in the cases of minors who are in the service without the consent of their parents and guardians. I agree with him, also, that if they are to be discharged they should return, as a condition precedent to the right of discharge, whatever bounties they have received. I am happy to state that I had drawn a section, which I proposed to offer, restoring the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus to all cases relating to an alleged minor who has been, or may hereafter be, enrolled or drafted into the Army. I proposed to modify the first section of the act of 1863 which authorizes the suspension of the privilege of that writ so as to allow the writ to issue in the cases referred to. I do not myself think it best for us to confer on these local boards the power of examining into these cases, but that we ought to extend to them the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus.

In my section of country—I do not know how it is elsewhere—the judges have uniformly in the cases of minors made it a condition precedent that the minor whose discharge is claimed shall restore any bounty he may have received. Of course he should do that under all circumstances. I should prefer to the amendment proposed by my colleague the adoption of the section which I have drawn.

In my judgment there is no well-grounded apprehension that if the privilege of the writ be restored it will be abused. In the northern district of New York, comprising two and a quarter millions of people, there were applied for, in the United States district court within the twelve months preceding the suspension of this writ, only twelve writs. Four or five of them resulted in the discharge of the parties. I have therefore never been able to see the necessity for the suspension of this privilege, at least in that section of country; and I think there should be no objection to restoring the privilege to children. I do not see how the Republic can suffer by it. That does not come within the class of cases referred to by the gentleman from Illinois the other day, who was speaking of arbitrary arrests. I desire to serve notice on the other side of the House that in this proposition I am not actuated by any political motive at all. I am only actuated by what I deem to be right and proper. I think that the proper tribunals to examine these cases are the judicial tribunals established by the laws of the land, and that it is neither necessary nor proper for us to create any other local tribunal to examine them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. KELLOGG] accept the substitute of his colleague?

Mr. KELLOGG, of New York. I do not. I desire to state to the committee that, on consultation with the Provost Marshal General, he informed me that some provision of this kind should be incorporated in this bill, or be enacted by Congress in some shape or form.

The question was taken on Mr. KELLOGG's amendment, and it was rejected.

The question recurred on Mr. SCHENCK's amendment, to substitute the eighteenth section of the House bill for the seventeenth section of the Senate bill, and it was adopted.

The Clerk read the nineteenth section, as follows:

Sec. 19. And be it further enacted, That members of religious denominations, who shall by oath or affirmation declare that they are conscientiously opposed to the bearing of arms, and who are prohibited from doing so by the rules and articles of faith and practice of said religious denomination, shall, when drafted into the military service, be considered non-combatants, and shall be assigned by the Secretary of War to duty in the hospitals, or to the care of freedmen, or shall pay the sum of $400 to such person as the Secretary of War shall designate to receive it, to be applied to the benefit of the sick and wounded soldiers; and such persons shall then be exempted from draft during the time for which they shall have been drafted.

Mr. STEVENS. I move, in order to make this section harmonize with the previous amendments, to strike out "four" and insert "three," so that the commutation shall be $300.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to strike out these words:

Or shall pay the sum of $300 to such person as the Secretary of War shall designate to receive it, to be applied to the benefit of the sick and wounded soldiers; and such drafted persons shall then be exempted from draft during the time for which they shall have been drafted.

Mr. Chairman, I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to say that they are disposed to incorporate into any general substitute for the Senate bill as much of this section as will be left by my amendment. The remaining portion of the section simply treats of commutation money, and provides for the application of it to a special fund. So far as that is concerned these persons will have the same prejudice to this that they have had previously. I propose to strike out the provision for the special application of this fund. I think that it would be improper; that it would be inconvenient. I believe that it would be a bad precedent to undertake to direct that the commutation money paid by these men shall be diverted from the general uses of the fund to procure substitutes and to create a special fund, even though for as benevolent an object as that indicated. I think that all commutations should go into the same general fund and be used in the same general way. Much unnecessary inconvenience and expense would result from breaking that fund into parts.

Mr. STEVENS. I oppose the amendment. The whole question involved in this section is covered by the amendment of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. We all know what are the conscientious scruples of the Society of Friends. While they are loyal men, it is against their religious belief that they shall either themselves bear arms or pay money to procure others to bear arms to destroy their fellow-men. They will not object if the fund can be appropriated to anything but actual slaughter. They do not object to furnish their portion of the money necessary to carry on the war, and to bear the general expenses of the Government. If you mix it with the general fund, whether their scruples are sensible or not, they exist; and to put their commutation money into the general fund to procure substitutes to bear arms against their fellow-men is against their religious belief—one which they honestly entertain, and rather than sacrifice which they would suffer any punishment.

We all know that the amount to be paid by these men would not amount to one tenth of what is the expense of the hospital service to which this commutation money is to be applied. There is no difficulty in paying it for that purpose; and we thereby relieve the conscientious and religious scruples of a worthy class of men who, while they are willing to pay it, ask that they shall not be drawn into any violation of the faith in which they have been raised, and to which they honestly adhere. I do not think it right to coerce the consciences of any class of men because their religious belief is not such as meets with the approval of our judgment. I think that the only true sect is the old Hardshell Baptists. There are those who think otherwise. So far as it is a religious question, I consider myself bound by the Constitution and policy not to violate their religious belief. While we compel them to pay commutation money, we ought not to make them pay it for any purpose inconsistent with their religion or oppressive upon their consciences. I trust, therefore, that the House will see the propriety of retaining what is proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to strike out the last word and insert the words "upon that quota." I think that we ought not to make a distinction between this class of persons and other classes as to the length of time for which they shall be exempted on payment of commutation.

Mr. STEVENS. I would say to the gentleman from Illinois that we have already amended the fourth section of the bill, and this section as it stands is right. If the proposed amendment is adopted it will be contradictory to the fourth section.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not so understand it. The amendment to the fourth section was that a person under certain circumstances should be exempt from draft on that particular quota. The language of this section is that he shall be exempt during the time for which he shall have been drafted. The roll may be exhausted long before the expiration of the three years. It may be exhausted in one year, or in two years. At all events, it strikes me that the committee ought not to make a further distinction in favor of that class who may, by oath, declare that they are conscientiously opposed to bearing arms. We all know how easy it is for men to take such an oath. We had an amendment proposed the other day by a gentleman from New York exempting all persons who would swear that they were conscientiously opposed to bearing arms in this war. Many men, when drafted, will not scruple to swear that they are conscientiously opposed to bearing arms when they have no religious belief about it, and when they do not belong to any church.

Mr. DEMING. The committee, in drafting their amendment, proceeded upon the ground that every citizen in time of war owes military service to the Government, unless he pays a certain sum in lieu of such service, or unless he furnishes a substitute. They were urged by a great many gentlemen to adopt a broader principle, that every citizen in time of war owed military service, thus summarily rejecting both commutation and substitution as an exemption for personal service.

But after reading a great multitude of letters, after examining the reports from different provost marshals in the office of the Provost Marshal General, and after having examined the conscription law of England, of France, and of Prussia, they determined to adopt the narrower principle, and, in order to carry out that rigidly, they were opposed to making conscientious scruples a ground for exemption.

The committee had before them most voluminous petitions from all parts of the country; from clergymen whose consciences tell them that their office is too holy to engage in a contest which the nation is waging for its life and for its honor; from Evangelical Lutherans, whose consciences tell them there is no national emergency which calls their pastors to the war; from Quakers and Friends, whose consciences tell them that if their right cheek is smitten they shall turn their left to the smiter also; from the Society of Ebenezer, who claim special inspiration, and whose consciences tell them they must use no deadly weapon against a human being; and from the elders of the Anama society supporting the Ebenezer elders.

The committee found that in addition to those before them by petition there was a vast crowd ready to rush in for exemption if the door was once opened, and the principle once admitted that conscientious scruples is a ground of exemption. There are the Dunkers, the Shakers, and the Mo-ravians, all holding principles in common with the Quakers. There are also the Mennonites, whose conscience tells them to take no oath, to do no violence to any man, to take patiently the spoiling of their goods, to pray for their enemies, and to feed and refresh them when hungry or thirsty. We also had petitions from the Rog-erens, whose consciences tell them to obey no human law; and last, but not least, we had an application from the peace Democrats to be relieved from service upon the ground of being conscientiously opposed to the war. [Laughter.]

It was thought such a vast door would be opened by admitting conscientious scruples as a ground of exemption that the committee were in favor of rejecting it entirely. From the best information we could get there are now five hundred thousand non-resistants in the country; and if this principle is once adopted there will be an active revival among all the non-resistants soon, and their ranks will be suddenly and fully recruited, at least. It was in view of the immense number that might claim conscientious scruples as a ground of exemption, either truly or falsely, that induced the committee to oppose exemption from conscientious scruples altogether.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not understand that this bill grants exemption to any conscientious men, nor does any proposed amendment do it.

Mr. DEMING. The clause now under consideration certainly grants exemption from conscientious scruples. It exempts from field duty, at least; and it was upon the grounds I have avowed that the committee determined not to provide in their amendment any exemption whatever from conscientious scruples. But upon consultation with members upon this floor, particularly members representing non-resistant constituencies, we found that there is an earnest wish, so far as their respective districts are concerned, that some amendment of this kind should be introduced into the bill.

Well, now, if we are to legislate for gentlemen's particular constituents, instead of looking over the whole field and legislating for the country at large, there will be wisdom in introducing the section which is in the Senate bill, to wit, section nineteen. But if you wish that those men who either feign or really have conscientious scruples shall engage in the service and do their share in sustaining the public burdens, it will certainly be unwise, and it would be a very bad precedent, to adopt this principle of exemption from conscientious scruples. If the House intends to adopt any such section as this then I think that the section in the Senate bill is as well worded and as well guarded as any section upon such a topic could be.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I wish to make a single suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. No further debate is in order.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I was not going to debate, but merely to make a suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. No further suggestion is in order.

Mr. HOLMAN called for tellers on the amendment to the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BALDWIN of Massachusetts, and FARNSWORTH were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 71, noes 30.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I move now to strike out the twelfth line of the section, which is, "and such drafted person shall then be exempted from draft." If the twelfth and thirteenth lines of this section are both stricken out it will leave the exemption of the persons included in this section upon the same ground as that of those who pay the $300 commutation money under the preceding section of the bill. Under the amendment which has been adopted they may have to pay $300 two or three times while other men only have to pay once. If these two lines are stricken out and not a word is said upon the subject the payment of commutation money will have the same effect in their case as in all others. This was the suggestion which I desired to make to the gentleman from Illinois, who, I was very sure, would have adopted it, because I suppose no one wishes that a person who is conscientiously opposed to war, and who pays his $300 commutation money, shall stand in a worse position than the man who is not conscientiously opposed to war and who pays his $300. Let all stand upon the same footing.

The amendment was agreed to—ayes 73, noes 27.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I move to amend the original text by striking out in the first and second lines of the section the words "members of religious denominations," and inserting in lieu thereof "any person;" and also by striking out from the word "arms" in line four down to the word "shall" in line six, so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall by oath or affirmation declare that they are conscientiously opposed to the bearing of arms shall, when drafted into the military service, be considered non-combatants, and shall be assigned by the Secretary of War to duty in the hospitals, or to the care of freedmen, or shall pay the sum of $400 to such person as the Secretary of War shall designate to receive it, to be applied to the benefit of the sick and wounded soldiers; and such drafted persons shall then be exempted from draft during the time for which they shall have been drafted.

Mr. GRINNELL. Is not that in the nature of two amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. A division can be called for.

Mr. GRINNELL. Then I call for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair the amendment is in order.

Mr. GRINNELL. I do not insist upon a division.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, the effect of this amendment is simply to exonerate from bearing arms all persons who may file their affidavits or make affirmation that they are conscientiously opposed to bearing arms, not in this particular war, but in any war. It seems to me that if we exonerate a class of individuals who are conscientiously opposed to bearing arms simply because they belong to a particular religious society whose articles of faith prohibit it, we ought to extend the exemption so as to embrace all who have conscientious scruples on the subject. I cannot understand why it is that mere membership in a particular religious society should exempt a man because he happens to have conscientious scruples. It is not with the articles of faith of religious societies that we have to do, but with the conscience. The mere fact that a man has cast in his lot with the Quakers, the Moravians, or the Dunkers ought not to exonerate him unless we exonerate those who have conscientious scruples against bearing arms who may belong to some other religious society, or to none whatever. We may just as soon exempt the one as the other. It does seem to me that if we retain this provision of the Senate, and exempt Quakers, Moravians, Dunkers, and those belonging to other like sects, we ought to extend the exemption so as to include all others who do not belong to these religious denominations, but who are nevertheless conscientiously opposed to bearing arms. Place them all upon terms of equality. If we look to men's consciences in drafting them let us put all who are conscientiously opposed to military service in the same category. Put them into hospitals, or assign them to such duties as they can discharge without any violation of their conscientious scruples.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Chairman, I think that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois should not prevail. I believe that it is due to the age, due to the country, due to the world, that we respect that religious class of persons who are known as Quakers. I have seen letters written by Quakers residing in the Carolinas, who had fled to the mountains to escape tyrants rather than serve in the armies of Jeff. Davis. If you examine the conscription bill enacted in the rebellious States you will find that even there, having found the Quakers would not fight, they exempted them. Thus even the demons of rebellion do not now drag into their service the Quakers. In fact they could not. There is no power that could compel them effectively to bear arms. Their history shows that for more than two hundred years no nation has ever succeeded in bringing that denomination into the ranks as fighting men. Their religious conviction and zeal are stronger than the chains that would bind them or the dungeons that would confine them. We propose here that Quakers who are drafted shall go into hospitals. They make the best, being practiced, nurses. Taking care of the sick is part of their religion. They will render as good service and as valuable to the country in that capacity as they would if they went to the field and faced the foe. We should not at this day trifle with religious scruples and these men, who have laid the foundations of commonwealths in peace, whose children are reared in principles of peace, who have been always in favor of peace and opposed to bloodshed. We cannot put forth any claim to religious and Christian principles if we fail to respect the conscientious scruples of men who have no new-born creed; who have been firm and decided in their principles, and patriotic and just as citizens, ever since the nation has had an existence.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN's amendment was rejected.

Mr. CRESWELL. I move to insert after the word "members" the words "in good standing."

Mr. SCHENCK. Inquire whether that amendment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not in order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to amend by including in the words to be stricken out the words "or to the care of freedmen."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the amendment is not in order at this time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will it be in order after the vote has been taken on the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It will be then in order.

Mr. GARFIELD called for tellers on Mr. SCHENCK's amendment.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. Before the vote is taken, I move to amend by striking out the last word. I desire simply to speak one sentence to the committee. As the section now stands, the Secretary of War is required to make a separate special fund of all the money paid by persons of this religious denomination as commutation. We propose to strike out that language, leaving all the money paid for commutation to go into the one fund. The amount that would be received from Quakers would not be worth the time and trouble of having a separate fund established for it. This does not interfere with any man's conscience. A Quaker that is drafted can go and serve in a hospital. The petitions that we have received on this subject show that it would be quite satisfactory to Quakers to be placed in care of hospitals or of freedmen. We desire not to burden the Secretary of War with the necessity of establishing a separate fund for the moneys to be received from that source. I thought that the committee did not understand what the question was, and it was for that reason that I called for tellers.

Mr. STEVENS. I think the committee understood it half an hour ago. It goes to the gist of the question whether we are to coerce the consciences of these men simply because we think they have erroneous ideas. The committee of Quakers asked for the provision made in the Senate bill. It satisfies them. They are willing to pay the commutation money as set forth here, and that will satisfy their consciences.

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. ALLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last line for the purpose of saying a word in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] He says that that would be satisfactory to those gentlemen who are here memorializing Congress on this subject. I think that he is entirely mistaken. Certainly in my conversations with those who came here representing the religious Society of Friends I received no such impression. On the contrary it seems to me to be a great hardship upon that sect to adopt that amendment. They to be sure would be allowed the alternative of serving in the hospitals, but they would be compelled to enter that service during the war. They would not obtain their discharge by paying commutation money. Everybody knows, who knows anything of the professors of that religious denomination, that they think they cannot pay a single dollar consistently into the Treasury to be appropriated to any of the war purposes. No, sir, they cannot pay the commutation money to be appropriated to general war purposes; that would be in entire violation of their faith. They have held that view of the case from the beginning, and with now and then an exception it has been universally adhered to by the Society of Friends. It would be practically saying to that body of citizens, "You must enter the service, and you may then be designated for duty in hospitals; beyond that we cannot go." And if they adhere to their religious faith, no matter how hard the circumstances, they must be forced from their homes into the service, for they cannot conscientiously pay the commutation money which shall be used for general war purposes. I do not believe, sir, that that is the intention of those who are in favor of this bill at all. It seems to me from what I have seen that it is the determination and purpose of Congress to relieve from all unnecessary burdens this class of persons, and it certainly can make no difference except a little extra trouble to the War Department. If that is the purpose, then the section ought to be retained as it is.

Mr. Chairman, this is no new thing to recognize and respect the conscientious scruples against bearing arms of the members of this Society. They have been exempted in the State of Massachusetts for more than a century from military duty in any form, upon the certificate of the overseers of their meetings that individuals are members of that Society, that they have conscientious scruples against bearing arms. Massachusetts ever since the organization of her government under the State constitution, if I mistake not, with the exception of a single year, has recognized that principle. Accordingly they have been exempted, as I have said before, for nearly or quite a century in that State. I believe, as was stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] that there is no class of persons more loyal or that ought to receive all of the consideration from the Government that can be consistently given to them. They have ever been loyal, and they are certainly characterized throughout the country as not being behind any other Christian denomination for their benevolence, Christian character, and good citizenship, and for performing every duty that should be required of them. It was the declaration of that great apostle of Democracy, Thomas Jefferson, that that great leader of the Quakers and founder of Pennsylvania, William Penn, was the greatest lawgiver that ever existed upon the face of the earth since the days of Moses; and I believe that all history does not furnish such triumphs for civilization and progress by the use of the sword as were furnished by that illustrious Quaker in the practical operations of his conduct and teachings to the aborigines of Pennsylvania. And while I would not exempt them from their share of the public burdens in this hour of trial and peril, I would so far respect their conscientious convictions as to give them the privilege of serving their country and paying their money in such form as will not compel them to surrender the faith of their fathers.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I would not detain the committee at this time but for the fact that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] in what he has said has put me in a light in which I am unwilling to stand before this House. I was one of the few members of the Committee on Military Affairs who were in favor of exempting Quakers and the like religious denominations; but that committee saw fit not to report the section at all. I have been willing to exempt men who, from their religious creed, were absolutely prohibited from engaging in war. I feared that it was not practical to do so without making a great distinction in favor of a class. Now, I am in favor of the proposition of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to strike out the last clause.

The gentleman from Massachusetts says that I have misrepresented the Quakers in this respect. I think that I can convince him that I have not. They objected to the commutation money being expressly declared for the purpose of procuring a substitute to go into the Army. We obviated that by providing that the money thus paid should go into the general Treasury; and those Quakers with whom I conversed and who appeared before the committee thought that it would be paid, because they could not discriminate in a general fund what went for war and what went for other purposes. And therefore the act already passed, providing for paying $300 into a common treasury, obviates the entire difficulty in the case. I have therefore not misrepresented the Quakers; and the striking out of this clause, as suggested by the chairman of the committee, will not in any way interfere with their consciences; and not only that, but it will leave them free as they were before.

Mr. THAYER. I desire to ask whether by a prior section of the bill it is not provided that commutation money shall be applied to the procuration of substitutes?

NEW SERIES....No. 37.

Mr. GARFIELD. No, sir, I think not. An attempt was made to put on that provision, but the answer to it was that it could not be carried out as applied to districts.

Mr. THAYER. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. This debate has gone on to such lengths that I must insist that gentlemen shall confine their remarks to their amendments, which, in this case, is the last word.

Mr. THAYER. I only want the last word. I find in the sixth section the provision to which I referred, that commutation money shall be applied to the procuration of substitutes, and I am not aware that that portion has been stricken out by the committee. If it has not been, of course the argument of the gentleman from Ohio goes for nothing. We must do either one thing or the other in this matter. We must retain the section as it is reported from the Senate, or we must strike it out. It is in the highest degree disrespectful to the Quakers to propose that they shall be exempt from service and yet shall be compelled to furnish a substitute. Any one who knows anything of the opinions of the Society of Friends upon this subject, knows that such a provision, so far from being a provision in their favor, would be regarded by them as a mere evasion of their demand for a fair and honest consideration of their conscientious scruples.

I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PIKE. I renew the amendment merely for the purpose of saying that in my judgment it is much better to have the $300 from the Quakers than to have them as hospital soldiers. That is the only question before the committee. Now $300, together with some local bounty, will procure a substitute for active military service. To give $300 to the hospital is the same as to furnish it for other purposes, because it will take another $300 to procure a substitute. For these reasons I shall vote for the bill as it stands.

I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the committee rise, with a view to close debate on this section.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAWES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the Senate (No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and had made progress therein but had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that when the House again resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union all debate upon the pending section be closed in half a minute after the committee resumes the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWES in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of Senate bill No. 36, to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I move to strike out the nineteenth section.

Mr. HOLMAN. Upon that I demand tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Mr. J. C. ALLEN and Mr. GARFIELD were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 66.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair votes in the negative; and the amendment is not agreed to.

The question recurring on the amendment offered by Mr. SCHENCK, it was put, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Ohio. I move to amend section nineteen by striking out all after the word "non-combatant," and insert in lieu thereof the words "and shall thereupon be exempt from that draft."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. EDGERTON. I move to strike out the nineteenth section, and insert what I send to the Chair.

Mr. CRESWELL. Is it not in order first to perfect the section before it is stricken out?

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to perfect the section will take precedence.

Mr. CRESWELL. I move to amend by adding at the end of the nineteenth section the following:

Provided, That no person shall be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this section unless his declaration of conscientious scruples against bearing arms shall be supported by satisfactory evidence that his deportment has been uniformly consistent with such declaration.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. EDGERTON's amendment to strike out the nineteenth section of the bill, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the persons exempted by section thirteen of this act, the following persons shall be exempt from draft, namely: all ministers of religion not engaged in any secular employment and in regular ecclesiastical standing in any church or religious society, who by the canons or laws of such church or society are prohibited from bearing arms or taking part in war, under penalty of forfeiting their ministerial office; and all other persons who shall, by oath or affirmation, declare that they are conscientiously and religiously opposed to the bearing of arms in war.

The amendment was disagreed to—ayes twenty-four, noes not counted.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to strike out in lines eight and nine of the nineteenth section the words "or to the care of freedmen."

The amendment was disagreed to—ayes 53, noes 67.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I move to add after the word "denomination," in line six, the words "adopted before the 1st day of January, 1863."

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. KELLOGG, of New York. I move to add to section twenty of the bill the following:

*And when claim is made for the discharge of persons in any manner, in military service and under the age of eighteen years, without the consent thereto of his parent or guardian, the board of enrollment of his district shall hear evidence adduced and decide thereon, and, if found by such board entitled to exemption on such claims, it shall discharge such person and strike his name from the enrollment: *Provided, Such person or his parent or guardian shall first pay back, in such manner as shall be directed by the Provost Marshal General, all bounties, general and local, and all clothing supplied by the Government which he may have received for entering such service.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a point of order. That amendment is palpably out of order. It is not germane to this section. It might perhaps be in order as an independent section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. KELLOGG, of New York. Well, I will offer it hereafter as an independent section.

Mr. STROUSE. I offer the following amendment:

Add to section twenty-one: And any person claiming exemption for any cause, and believing himself aggrieved by the decision of the board of enrollment, may within ten days after such decision, appeal to the district court of the United States for the district in which the appellant was drafted; and the board of enrollment shall certify the proceedings to said court, where a speedy examination shall be had, and the decision of said court shall be final and conclusive.

I offer this amendment, Mr. Chairman, with little prospect of its adoption, but with a faint hope that some plan may be developed which may enable the unfortunate victim of the illegal and unjust decision of a district provost marshal to apply to some tribunal for redress, and have justice done. As the law now stands, and as is contemplated by this bill, every man, however much entitled to exemption from draft under the provisions of the act of Congress, is subject to the caprice, malice, ignorance, or prejudice of a petty tyrant, clothed with brief authority, known as a deputy provost marshal, and from whose decision there lies no appeal. Some appellate jurisdiction is imperatively demanded for the protection of our people. Many outrages have been committed in this matter of illegal holding to military service of parties by partial, dishonest, and corrupt improvised "captains and provost marshals" of the different congressional districts. If the majority of this House has not entirely ignored the rights of the white man, then I beg leave to say with all due deference to the superior claims of the negro—slave and free, citizens of African scut—that a passing thought may be bestowed on the poor and now subordinate white man, who, in the present war for "universal emancipation," is likely to change place with the negro and become himself the slave.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move to amend the amendment by adding to it these words:

Provided, That the President of the United States shall order General Robert E. Lee not to move on Washington until the appeal is decided.

The amendment was adopted.

The question recurred on Mr. STROUSE's amendment as amended, and it was rejected.

Mr. KELLOGG, of New York. I propose the following amendment:

*And when claim is made for the discharge of a person in any manner, in military service, and under the age of eighteen years, without the consent thereto of his parent or guardian, the board of enrollment of his district shall hear evidence adduced and decide thereon, and if found by such board entitled to exemption on such claim, it shall strike his name from the enrollment: *Provided, Such person or his parent or guardian shall first pay back in such manner as shall be directed by the Provost Marshal General, all bounties, general and local, and all clothing supplied by the Government, which he may have received for entering such service.

Mr. Chairman, the main point of this proposition I submitted before; but I have changed it in some respects. I am satisfied that the committee did not understand that the amendment was being voted on when it was introduced before. I am so informed by gentlemen around me. I certainly did not understand it. I appeal to gentlemen on this floor that there ought to be some provision of this kind inserted in the bill. I appeal to their individual knowledge on that subject. We meet constantly with cases where minors have got into the service in some way without the consent of their parents or guardians. Now, boards of enrollment are acting in a judicial capacity in the matter of exemptions; and my amendment only proposes to extend their jurisdiction so as to let them examine these cases. There is no provision of any law, so long as the writ of habeas corpus is suspended, by which a remedy for this can be obtained.

I will not stop here to discuss the propriety of the suspension of the habeas corpus. Some gentlemen are disposed to revive it for the purpose of meeting cases of this kind and other cases. I do not propose it. I rest content with this provision if it be adopted. It is thought by some persons that if the writ of habeas corpus was not suspended the copperhead judges in some districts of the United States might nullify the entire objects of this bill. I hope that gentlemen on all sides of the House will so act upon this matter as to give a tribunal for cases of this description, where minors are in the service without their parents' consent.

Mr. GANSON. I would like to inquire of my colleague whether his amendment covers the case of enlisted men.

Mr. KELLOGG, of New York. It does, sir.

Mr. GANSON. I should like to know what propriety there is in conferring jurisdiction on these enrollment boards over that class of cases, making them judicial tribunals to that extent.

Mr. KELLOGG, of New York. Enrollment boards have now to pass upon the question of minors enrolled and drafted, and I do not see why they should not also pass upon the case of enlisted minors.

Mr. GANSON. As I understand, these enrolling boards thus far have had no jurisdiction over volunteers.

Mr. KELLOGG, of New York. I differ with the gentleman very much. That is not my experience.

Mr. GANSON. I ask my colleague in what respect these boards of enrollment have any jurisdiction, as the law now stands, over that class of persons in the service?

Mr. KELLOGG, of New York. In this respect: when volunteers as substitutes are produced before a board of enrollment authorized to receive them it is a duty incumbent on the board to ascertain that they are of legal age. If a person comes in and swears that he is twenty years of age, and his parent or guardian afterwards comes in and claims his discharge on the ground that he is only sixteen, and offers to produce evidence of the fact, I propose that that evidence be received and that the board act upon it. I understand that, in so far, boards of enrollment have jurisdiction already as refers to persons enrolled. I propose to extend that jurisdiction to cases where men have already enlisted through mistake, or fraud, or for any other reason, when they are under age.

Mr. GANSON. I was not aware myself that boards composed of provost marshals of the various districts had anything to do with regiments composed of volunteers. I would like to know whether I am correct or not?

Mr. KELLOGG, of New York. I think that you are not.

Mr. GANSON. Wherein?

Mr. KELLOGG, of New York. The proposition is that they shall correct the enrollment and strike from the list the names of all minors placed there by fraud or otherwise.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WINFIELD. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. SCHENCK. I shall insist upon the gentleman confining his remarks to striking out that word "service."

Mr. WINFIELD. I move to strike out the word "service," because it destroys the effect of the whole amendment; and I will speak to the proposition. I desire to say with reference to the imputation that has been cast by my colleague upon the judiciary of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, that there are copperhead judges to be found in every judicial district.

Mr. KELLOGG, of New York. The gentleman misunderstood me. I made no such remark. I said that it was alleged that some copperhead judges would defeat the execution of this bill if allowed to act.

Mr. WINFIELD. The remarks of my colleague involved an imputation upon the purity of the judiciary of the State we both come from. In defense of that judiciary and particularly of that part within my own district, I desire to say that the imputation is exceedingly unjust and entirely unfounded. I would say, if it were not for the friendship and good feeling I have for my colleague, that it was not only unjust and unfounded, but unparliamentary.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is wandering from his amendment.

Mr. WINFIELD. I will try and keep in order. So far as the operation of this law in my congressional district is concerned, it has received no embarrassment from the judiciary.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call the gentleman to order. He is not speaking to his amendment to strike out the word "service." I give notice that I will continue to object to gentlemen who are not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WINFIELD. I understand the proposition to be to prevent the exercise by the judiciary of a State—

Mr. GARFIELD. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. WINFIELD. I am approaching the question. [Laughter.] I hope that the gentleman from Ohio will bear with me.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Ohio will not bear with the gentleman, and calls him to order. He can only speak to the amendment to strike out the last word, "service."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York proposes to show reasons why the amendment of his colleague should not prevail. He proposes to strike out the last word in order to destroy it. The Chair thinks that he is in order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I understand the Chair at first sustained my point of order. [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. WINFIELD. I take this occasion to thank the Chair for the uniform kindness which has characterized—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order. [Laughter.]

Mr. WINFIELD. I was about to say when interrupted by calls to order on the other side that there is no district—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. [Laughter.]

Mr. WINFIELD, by unanimous consent, then withdrew his amendment to the amendment.

The amendment of Mr. KELLOGG, of New York, was rejected.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to amend the twenty-first section by adding thereto the following proviso:

"Provided, That the Secretary of War may order the discharge of all persons in the military service who are under the age of eighteen years at the time of the application for their discharge, when it shall appear by duly attested evidence that such persons are in the service without the consent, either expressed or implied, of their parents or guardians: And provided further, That such persons, their parents or guardians, shall first repay the Government all bounties and advanced pay which may have been paid to them; anything in the act to which this is an amendment to the contrary notwithstanding."

I think this amendment meets a difficulty which has presented itself. I presume every member upon this floor has been written to in reference to the discharge of persons who have enlisted and are under eighteen years of age. They cannot be discharged by the Secretary of War now, for the reason that the law provides that the oath of the minor shall be conclusive as to his age.

Mr. TIAYER. I move to amend the amendment by inserting the words "shall order" in the place of "may order."

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I suggest to the gentleman that he modify his amendment by substituting the words "upon due proof" for the words "by duly attested evidence."

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I accept that suggestion.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. BOYD. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded to read the twenty-second section, and commenced reading the twenty-third section.

Mr. KERNAN. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to the twenty-second section. Who shall decide whether there has been any fraud practiced in obtaining a decision of the enrollment board in favor of the applicant for exemption? And if a man is arrested as a deserter because of such decision, fraudulently obtained, who is to decide that he is a deserter, in the meaning of the section? It seems to me that here might originate a great deal of abuse. The committee will observe that the section declares that any man who has practiced a fraud or made false representation shall be deemed a deserter. Who will decide whether he has done so or not? May an officer go and arrest him without some decision by somebody? [A Voice. A court-martial.] No, sir, he is to be arrested as a deserter without any sort of evidence that he ought to be arrested as such.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a point of order. There is no question before the House.

Mr. KERNAN. Then I move to strike out that section.

Mr. WILSON. I rise to a point of order. It is that the committee had passed by the twenty-second section, and that the Clerk had commenced reading the twenty-third section; and that it is not in order to entertain any proposition to amend the twenty-second section.

Mr. KERNAN. I suggest that that is rather too shrewd practice, when the only desire is to make the section practical in its working.

The CHAIRMAN. If objection is made, the Chair decides that the committee cannot go back to the twenty-second section.

The Clerk proceeded to read the twenty-third and the twenty-fourth sections.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Michigan. I move to amend the twenty-fourth section by inserting after the word "disability," in line thirteen, the following:

And any officer, clerk, or deputy, connected with the board of enrollment, who shall receive compensation from any drafted man for any service, or for obtaining the performance of such service required from any member of the said board by the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor.

I offer this amendment for the purpose of supplying a defect in the bill; and to meet a case which occurred in the State of Michigan—

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to say to the gentleman that I think there will be no objection to the adoption of that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Michigan. I offer the following as a new section, to come in after section twenty-six:

Sec. 27. And be it further enacted, That within thirty days after the passage of this act it shall be the duty of the board of enrollment in each congressional district to cause lists of the names of each and every person enrolled under the provisions of this act, and of the act of which this is amendatory, to be printed, arranging alphabetically each and every name of such persons in the township or ward in which he resides, and that at least two copies of such lists of names of the persons in any township or ward be posted in public places in such township or ward, and that five printed copies of the full lists in each and every county be deposited for public inspection in the office of the county clerk, or of the proper custodian of the county records of such county.

I would remark that in my State there was no public exposition of the names; and that in the district in which I reside, after the names were enrolled, the record was taken some distance from the office and deposited in a safe, where no person could have access to it. In other States the lists of names were printed and posted up as this amendment proposes to require. The only object of my amendment is to make that practice uniform, so that every person who may be enrolled shall have an opportunity of knowing whether the names of his neighbors are also upon the list. Such a provision would do away with a great deal of prejudice that may be engendered against this conscription law.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 62, noes 61.

Mr. STEVENS demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BALDWIN, of Michigan, and FARNSWORTH, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 68.

The Chairman voted in the affirmative.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GANSON. I offer what I send to the Clerk's desk as an additional section to the bill.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I desire to offer an amendment to the section we have been considering, which will take precedence of a new section. I move to strike out "thirty" in the amendment which has just been adopted, and to insert in lieu thereof "ten," so as to make the time within which the lists shall be published ten days instead of thirty.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move that the committee do now rise. It is very evident that we cannot get through with this bill to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not the floor for that purpose. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GANSON] is upon the floor.

Mr. GANSON. I ask that my amendment be read.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended in any case relating to an alleged minor who has been, or shall hereafter be, enlisted or drafted into the service of the United States; and the first section of the act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863, is hereby modified so far as it authorizes the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus in the cases of alleged minors who have been or shall be enlisted or drafted into the service of the United States.

Mr. COFFROTH. I ask the gentleman from New York to modify his amendment so as to make it apply to men over forty-five years of age as well as to those under eighteen.

Mr. GANSON. I prefer to confine myself to children.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I would ask the Chair if my amendment is not in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GANSON] is on the floor.

Mr. SCOFIELD. He offers a new section; but my amendment is an amendment to the section we have been considering.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is to strike out a portion of what the committee has already inserted, which is not in order.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BALDWIN] is willing to have that modification of his amendment made.

The CHAIRMAN. The matter has passed beyond the control of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. SCOFIELD. It had not when I first made the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is upon the floor.

Mr. GANSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer this additional section notwithstanding the amendment proposed by one of my colleagues to one of the sections of the bill, which has been adopted by the committee. As I understand the amendment which has been adopted, it authorizes the Secretary of War, upon affidavits being furnished relative to the age of drafted men, to discharge them from the military service, provided they are under the age of eighteen years.

Now, from the experience I have had since I have been a member of this House, I think this would add very much to our labors, and would, in fact, raise a member of Congress to the dignity of an errand boy employed at $3,000 a year. It would also add very much to the labors of the War Department. We know now that that Department has more work than it can well and properly do. I think, also, that it would put parties having claims of this description to too much trouble, expense, and delay. I hope the House will adopt this additional section, because I deem it eminently just and proper. It cannot lead to any abuse, in my judgment, and even if there should occasionally be some abuse, it will be insignificant compared to the injustice daily done in every neighborhood within the northern States, as every gentleman upon this floor well knows.

Mr. SMITH. Is an amendment in order to that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to the amendment is in order.

Mr. SMITH. I move, then, to add to the amendment of the gentleman from New York the following:

Provided, Said enlistments are not compulsory or against the will of the persons thus enlisted.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from New York by inserting after the word "twenty" the words "and all over forty-five."

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. ASHLEY. I move to strike out "twenty" and insert "eighteen."

Mr. GANSON. I will inform the gentleman from Ohio that the word "twenty" is not to be found in my amendment.

Mr. ASHLEY. Then I move to amend the amendment by inserting the words "minors under eighteen years of age."

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on Mr. GANSON's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I propose an additional section, to come in after the twenty-seventh section.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have an amendment to offer to the twenty-seventh section.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise for the purpose of moving to strike out the twenty-seventh section, as follows:

Sec. 27. And be it further enacted, That nothing contained in this act shall be so construed as to prevent or prohibit the enlistment of men in the States in rebellion under the orders of the War Department.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SCHENCK. In the first place I do not quite understand that there are any "States in re-billion under the orders of the War Department." [Laughter.] But that is not my objection to the section. If gentlemen will read it they will see that it actually means nothing at all. It was left out of the substitute on that account.

Mr. COLE, of California. I move to amend by inserting at the end of the section the following:

And the Secretary of War is directed to offer a bounty of $100 for each and every recruit to the Army of the United States that may be obtained from the condition of actual slavery, which bounty may be increased to the amount offered for other recruits, one half to be paid to the recruit, or his family, if he have a family, and the other half to meet the expenses of the enlistment.

Mr. Chairman, we are now nearly through this bill; and although there are abundant provisions for raising troops in the loyal portions of the United States, there seems to be no provision for raising troops in the portions of the United States that are in insurrection. There are, however, in the insurrectionary States large classes of people who would very gladly exchange their present condition for that of United States soldiers. This amendment is to provide for that case. It does not propose to exercise any compulsion over them, but to let them volunteer to become soldiers of the United States. It seems to me that this will supply a defect in the bill, and help to perfect it.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I move to strike out the twenty-seventh section, and insert the following in its place:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That any person who, for the purpose of procuring or aiding in the procurement of a substitute under the provisions of this act, or for the purpose of procuring or aiding in the procurement of any volunteer for the service of the United States under any call or requisition of troops by the President of the United States, makes any false statement or representation in writing, or any affirmation or oath in respect to the age of the proposed substitute with the intent of procuring the acceptance of a substitute or volunteer who by reason of his being under the age of eighteen years is legally disqualified from the military service of the United States, or who by reason of his being between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one years is disqualified in the absence of the consent in that case required by law, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction before a court of competent jurisdiction, be subject to a fine or penalty of not less than $250, nor more than $1,000, and to imprisonment or commitment until such fine or penalty shall be paid. And it is further provided, That any person who, with the intent of procuring the acceptance of a substitute or volunteer, shall falsely represent himself as the father or guardian of any minor proposed as a substitute or volunteer, and shall in such assumed character give the assent required by law, such person so offending shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction in manner before provided, be subject to a fine of not less than $300, nor more than $1,000, and to commitment until such fine shall be paid, and in addition thereto to such imprisonment, not more than six months, as the court shall direct.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to strike out the twenty-seventh section and insert the following:

All able-bodied male persons of African descent, between the ages of twenty and forty-five years, whether citizens or not, resident in the United States, shall be enrolled according to the provisions of the act to which this is a supplement, and form part of the national forces. And when a slave shall have been drafted and mustered into the service of the United States his master shall have a certificate thereof which shall entitle him to receive $300 from the United States, and the drafted man shall be free.

Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment, and I hope it will prevail. I think that that class of persons ought to form a part of the national forces. I know that they are now taken, as in Maryland for instance, and I suppose they will be in other places. I do not say that it is contrary to law, but I prefer that it should be done under a known law. If we are to use these persons—and I think we ought to use them—it should be in pursuance of the action of Congress rather than under the direction of any executive branch of the Government.

Mr. BOYD. I suggest that the gentleman from Pennsylvania alter his amendment so as to pay loyal men only for their slaves.

Mr. STEVENS. I modify my amendment in that respect, by adding the words, "provided that the slaves of loyal men only shall be paid for." My amendment will not only make this class of persons bear their part of the fighting burden of the nation, but it will also tend finally to eradicate slavery from all the States; eradicate it under necessity, and with compensation to the masters. Although we are now doing it—I will not say against law, but I do not precisely know under what law—I think it right that it should be done according to law. Of course this refers only to the loyal States. We are not legislating for the Confederate States, although I am told by gentlemen about here that they are still in the Union. We are not legislating for them just now. We are legislating just as if they did not exist. This, therefore, applies to Maryland, Delaware, Kentucky, and Missouri. I hope, therefore, the amendment will prevail.

Mr. CLAY. I hope that the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not insist upon that amendment. You have told us in the border States, when we have appealed to you, that you intended to respect the laws and constitutions of those States. The enemies of the Union, those in those States called secessionists, have charged against the northern people that it was their intention to seize upon all of our slaves; with or without law; that they intended to seize the personal property and finally the real estate of the slaveholding States. These charges have been made in my State against the Government. We have denied them. We have stated that there was no such intention; that the northern people proposed to respect our constitutions and laws; and that we had no fear when the case was presented justice would be done to us.

Now, when good feeling exists in those States, and is increasing, why should we pass these radical laws? If you pass them you will detract from that increasing good feeling; you will excite and confuse the communities there, and throw a stumbling-block in the way of the restoration of a general Union feeling on the part of the people of the border States. Why should you do this? I would prefer to have you come out at once; however, for I do not like this indirect mode of legislation. Let us know what you are at, so that we may not be any longer deceived. We told the people when the charges were made to which I have referred, we, the friends of the Government, who occupy seats upon this floor, that when this matter was properly presented, with the exception of a man scattered here and there, the people of the North would be disposed to respect the laws and the constitutions and the rights of the border States under them. We told the people of those States that when the question was presented in the courts the people of the North would do justice to the people of the border States, and to their rights of property under their constitutions and laws. If you are going to legislate on the subject, if you intend to do this thing, do it, so that we may not be longer deceived. Let us, when we return to our constituents, say that we have presented the case, and that there is no trust to be placed in the northern people to do justice to the border States.

We do not object to your taking the slaves of those who are engaged in this rebellion, or to using them for a legitimate purpose. But we do object to your taking slaves from any loyal man, because the constitution of Kentucky says that you shall not take the property of any of its citizens unless you first compensate them. I read the speech of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] who took the position now advanced. He sought to advocate it as coming from the great statesman of Kentucky, Henry Clay. He stated that what the law made property was property. Why then do you propose to take our slaves without compensation?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to strike out "$300" and insert "twenty-five." I desire to say in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky that in the laws of Kentucky, so far as I know, slaves were recognized as property but still recognized as persons; and I think that we have reached that emergency when men in the border States should understand, at least so far as I am concerned, that slaves as inhabitants of the country are to be used as other men are used to put down this rebellion. No constitution or law of any State shall stand between me and what I believe to be my duty to my country.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. Mr. Chairman, as I understand existing laws, the Government, when it deems it to be necessary, may seize the property of any citizen and use it for the purpose of prosecuting this war. I see no difference between seizing the property of the northern States and that of the border States. I do not see why the property of the border States should be exempted.

Mr. CHANLER. I now move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House, with the recommendation which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves that the committee rise and report the bill to the House, with a recommendation that it be referred to the Military Committee with certain instructions. While an amendment is pending in Committee of the Whole such a motion is not in order.

Mr. CRESWELL. I desire to say a word or two in reply to the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky. The matter of negro enlistments has been carried on in Maryland to an extent which I suppose Kentucky has not yet experienced. As far back as six months ago the matter was there canvassed, and received not only the attention of the people of Maryland but such attention as induced a conference with the War Department in this city. The people of Maryland after canvassing the subject in every light, after having borne the burdens of this war as they had done up to that time without intrenching in any way upon the slave interest of the State, determined that the time had arrived when that portion of our population should be called upon to perform its duty in endeavoring to crush out this rebellion.

In Maryland, as in most of the other border slave States, there are two classes of population, the one the slaveholders, and the other the non-slaveholders. In the district which I represent, having a total population of 146,000, there are 92,000 whites, 28,000 free negroes, and 25,000 slaves. Out of the 92,000 free white people there are not more than 4,000 slaveholders. In my district there are, between the ages of sixteen and sixty of male slave population, some 6,600 capable of bearing arms. In my district alone there had been, previous to the last draft ordered in October, some five or six thousand, perhaps eight thousand white men furnished for the service of the United States.

When the draft of October was ordered the question came home to my people, and the issue was then definitely presented as between the non-slaveholders and the slaveholders. The slaveholders furnished comparatively few men for the war. They either paid their commutation money or furnished substitutes. But when the non-slaveholders were drafted, in number nineteen or twenty to one, they were compelled to go because most of them were destitute of the means wherewith to pay the commutation. Gentlemen will remember that in assigning the quota to the several States the population was first reduced to federal numbers, and the assignment made upon that ratio, and that in assigning the proportion among the several districts and counties federal numbers were also regarded, so that the free white people of my district during this war have been compelled all the while to furnish men to represent not only their ninety-three thousand whites but the other fifty-three thousand—twenty-eight thousand free negroes and twenty-five thousand slaves. They labored under that burden until the last draft was ordered, and that, too, without grumbling.

And not only that, but the non-slaveholders in Maryland have submitted to taxation to support this institution almost unparalleled. If gentlemen will turn to-day to the code of public laws of Maryland they will find that in every case of the conviction of a slave in any court of an offense punished by death or sale it is the duty of that court to assess the full value of the slave to the end that payment may be made to the master out of a fund derived from taxation levied upon the whole county. They will find further that under the code of Maryland all property except slaves is assessed by sworn assessors to its full cash value.

Cries of "Go on," "Go on," and "Object," "Object."

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made, the gentleman cannot proceed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. In the first place the Government will only pay loyal white men $100 bounty after the 1st of March next. It is only by virtue of the joint resolution passed a few weeks ago that $300 bounty is being paid until the 1st of March for the purpose of filling up the old regiments. I certainly am not going to put $300 into the pocket of the slaveholder because he puts his slave into the Army when it is his duty to put him into the Army anyhow without bounty. We of the North have put our sons into the Army.

Mr. CRESWELL. Will the gentleman allow me one word on this question of the compensation of slaveholders?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. CRESWELL. The question of the value of slaves was recently fairly tried on the death of one of the distinguished Carroll family in my State. An appraisement of his property became necessary, and respectable gentlemen acting under oath set down the value of the negroes at five dollars apiece.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will this interruption come out of my time?

The CHAIRMAN. It will.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Then I must decline to yield further.

Mr. Chairman, we pay no bounties to the loyal colored men in the northern States who enlist, and we pay them only seven dollars a month wages; and I am not going to vote to put money into the pockets of slaveholders and not into the pockets of loyal black men at the North. Furthermore, I am a little opposed to buying slaves anyhow.

Mr. SMITHERS. Mr. Chairman, I rise simply for the purpose of expressing my opinion very briefly upon the subject which now attracts the attention of the House. Coming from what is ordinarily termed a "border State," a State in which the institution of slavery exists, I beg leave to say to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] that we have no scruples there in relation to this question. I know not how it may affect other States. I speak only for my own.

Mr. CLAY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question, just to show how the system he supports would operate?

Mr. SMITHERS. I will answer a question with pleasure, but I do not desire the gentleman to interpolate a speech into my five minutes.

Mr. CLAY. I will just ask a question. We have been discussing here day after day propositions to equalize this thing of putting men into the United States Army. Now suppose that one man owns one negro and another ten negroes, will you take all the negroes of the man who has ten?

Mr. SMITHERS. I will say in relation to that, that when Maryland was subjected by the War Department to a draft of her slaves, Delaware was left out, and a deputation from Delaware came here and requested the Secretary of War to extend the order in relation to Maryland to Delaware also. We were anxious that the slaves in our State should be put into the Army of the United States and form part of our quota. I can see no reason myself why a slave should not be taken just as much as the son of the white man. I agree entirely with the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWEN] that while under the laws of particular States a slave may be property, yet he is nevertheless a man, and I say to you without hesitancy that no proposition could emanate from this House that would be more popular in Delaware than one to take her slave population from her.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move to amend the amendment by striking out so much of it as provides for the payment of $300 to the owner of the drafted slave. I do it upon this ground: if the slaves are liable to military duty at all they are liable to military duty on the same ground as every person is who owes obedience to the laws; on the same ground that the citizen of the country, the subjects of the country, the denizens of the country, owing temporary allegiance to the Government, are bound to defend it. If they owe military service we owe the master nothing for taking what the slaves owe. If they do not owe military service to the country I do not mean, for one, to buy slaves for soldiers. In my judgment they do owe military service to the Government. Can anybody contend for one moment, in the eye of reason and common sense, that four million men, strong, stalwart, and energetic, and who have proved themselves on the field of battle to be as courageous as white men, more amenable to discipline, and more inured to the vicissitudes of climate and to daily labor—can anybody suppose that that great body of men are not liable to be taken by the law for the defense of our country? If they are it is because they owe the duty to the Government; and if they do we owe the masters nothing for taking them.

Gentlemen say—and I am ready to meet the objection—that you are likewise taking the property of the owner. I beg pardon, sir. The son owes to the father labor by the law of every State in the Union as assuredly as the slave owes the master labor. We do not make the slave a freeman by taking him for a soldier. We may make provision that he shall be free thereafter. The obligation of military service is not at all inconsistent with the obligation of service to the master afterwards. When the son is taken, when the apprentice is taken, somebody is taken who is quite as dear, quite as necessary, quite as valuable to the father and to the employer as when the slave is taken from the master. In other words, where the obligation of military service rests, the law pursues it and insists upon it, leaving the burden of other losses to follow the necessities of the times. For these reasons I make that motion.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Chairman, I think that no legal proposition is better established in this country than that property is held in slaves. I do not mean that the person of the slave is property and can be used as property, that he can be killed and eaten like a hog, but that men own property in the labor and service of slaves in this country. The gentleman from Maryland has lived his whole life, I believe, in States where this law exists, and where, I have no doubt, he has held to the validity and correctness of that law, to its existence, at least if he believed the law ought not to have existed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I have never disputed for a moment.

Mr. MALLORY. The President of the United States, in a conversation that I had with him on a remarkable occasion, observed to me, "I do not believe that property in slaves ought to exist; but I know that property in slaves does exist, and is held by a tenure as strong as that by which any other property is held; and I know that the Government of the United States has no more right to deprive you of that property in slaves, of the labor of your slaves, without that just compensation mentioned in the Constitution, than the Government has to take from you any other property without a just compensation."

I think, Mr. Chairman, that the question is narrowed down simply to this: if the Government of the United States have the right to take from me my property in the service and labor of my slave it is restricted and limited by that provision of the Constitution which says that private property shall not be taken without just compensation. Then, I ask the gentleman from Maryland, how is just compensation ascertained? Is it done by a law of the Government fixing it, or by any ex parte proceedings of that kind? He knows it is not. He knows that that would be unjust and unconstitutional. If you propose to compensate the owner of a slave you must ascertain the value of the property as you do the value of any other property that the Government chooses to take for its use. You must ascertain the value of that property as you ascertain the value of land taken for a road, by a jury summoned under a writ of ad quod damnum. The amendment of the gentleman from Maryland ignores this right, violates it in a plain, distinct, and palpable manner, and is contrary to the Constitution of the United States. And that gentleman, if he would speak his opinion freely, would acknowledge that. I oppose the amendment.

Mr. ODELL. I move that the committee do now rise. This is a fresh subject, and I want to start fresh on it.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAVIS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration, as a special order, the bill of the Senate (No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed an act (S. No. 85) to provide for the examination of certain officers of the Army; and an act (S. No. 100) authorizing the holding of a special session of the United States district court for the district of Indiana; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Mr. DAWSON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at fifteen minutes past five o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 11, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE ON NAVAL SUPPLIES.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the select committee on naval supplies to offer the following resolution; which I wish to have considered now:

Resolved, That the select committee of the Senate on naval supplies have leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON MANUFACTURES.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced the appointment of the following Senators as the Committee on Manufactures under the resolution yesterday:

Mr. SPRAGUE, Mr. MORGAN, Mr. RIDDLE, Mr. WILKINSON, and Mr. HENDRICKS.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the memorial of Joshua C. Brown, praying that he may be authorized to locate upon and acquire title to certain parcels of lands in Utah and Nevada Territories upon the same terms and conditions that he could acquire title thereto if such lands were open to private entry and could be purchased at private sale; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JOHNSON presented a memorial of a committee of the Board of Trade of Baltimore, Maryland, praying that the amount of tax upon leaf tobacco may be accompanied with a corresponding drawback on exportation; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, presented the memorial of Edward De Rue, praying that proper fencing masters may be appointed to instruct officers and privates of the Army in the use of their arms; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of citizens of Newton, Massachusetts, praying that the father, mother, and sister of Lieutenant Eber White, who was murdered by John Southron and his son at Benedict, Maryland, on the 20th of October, 1863, while recruiting colored troops, may receive a portion of the proceeds of the estate that is liable to confiscation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented the memorial of Henry Charles De Alma, praying an investigation into the causes of his being deprived of his rank and pay as colonel of volunteers in the United States service; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a memorial of the Suffolk Medical Society of Massachusetts, signed by the president, D. Humphreys Storer, and by the secretary, David W. Cheever, praying for the passage of the ambulance bill now before Congress, and that hereafter belligerents should regard surgeons and their assistants and the men of an ambulance department while engaged in their humane calling, as inviolable in their persons and property, and never, save under extraordinary circumstances, to be retained as prisoners of war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of men and women of the United States, praying for the speedy and universal emancipation of all persons of African descent held to involuntary service or labor in the United States; which was referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. ANTHONY. I present a memorial of boatswains, gunners, carpenters, and sailmakers, warrant officers of the Navy, asking that some definite rank be assigned to them. The memorial sets forth that they are intrusted with grave, responsible duties, frequently with military authority over the crew, and that in emergencies sometimes the actual command of a vessel may devolve on them. They ask that for five years' service they may rank with ensigns; after five years, with masters; and that after faithfully serving the country ten years they may receive a commission not in conflict with the present commissioned officers. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

ALMOND D. FISK.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am instructed by the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom were referred the papers in the case of Phoebe Ann Fisk, widow of Almond D. Fisk, deceased, to report a bill for her relief, and by instruction of the committee I ask that the bill be now considered.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 112) for the relief of the heirs of Almond D. Fisk, deceased, was read twice, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize Phoebe Ann Fisk, as executrix of Almond D. Fisk, deceased, who obtained a patent for a new and useful improvement in coffins, dated November 14, 1848, for fourteen years, which has now expired, to apply to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of the patent for seven years, under the rules and regulations now in force for the extension of patents, as if she had made application previous to its expiration as required by law; and the Commissioner is to investigate and decide the application for extension on the same evidence and in the same manner as other applications for extension are decided, notwithstanding the surrender and reissue of March 6, 1860; but the application for extension is to be made within thirty days from the approval of the act, and the decision of the Commissioner is to be rendered within ninety days from the filing of the application in the Patent Office. Nothing contained in the bill is to be so construed as to hold responsible in damages any persons who may have manufactured coffins containing Fisk's improvement between the expiration of the patent and the approval of the act.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a former report.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to hear that report.

Mr. HOWE. Let me explain to the Senator from Illinois that this bill is one which was reported by the same committee at the last session of Congress, and passed the Senate then. The committee report back the same bill, and they make the same report they did then. If the Senator wants to hear that report read, very well.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That will state the case, I suppose.

Mr. HOWE. It does state the case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read a report made by Mr. SAULSBURY on the 14th of January, 1863, from which it appears that Almond D. Fisk received a patent on the 14th of November, 1848, as the inventor of a metallic coffin, or burial case; that after the issue of the patent, and to enable him to commence the manufacture of those cases, he erected buildings and provided machinery at an expense of over ten thousand dollars; that in the fall of 1849 these buildings were in the night time destroyed by fire, together with nearly all his machinery, tools, and the cases in process of finishing; that by this calamity Fisk lost his entire capital, and by exposure at the time of the fire he took a severe cold, from the effects of which he died in the month of October, 1850, leaving a widow, this petitioner, and four infant children.

After the fire, and before the death of Fisk, he borrowed about the sum of fifteen thousand dollars to enable him to erect other buildings and procure other machinery, stock, &c., to secure the payment of which sum he mortgaged his patent and buildings in course of erection, machinery, and stock. In September, 1850, he put the mortgages into possession of the mortgaged property. The assignees of the original mortgages surrendered the patent and obtained a reissue on the 6th day of March, 1860, for the remainder of the term it had to run. Before the expiration of the term, the petitioner applied to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of the patent for seven years, as it stood upon the record; but the Commissioner decided that he could not extend the reissued patent of 1860. This decision was made only a few days before the expiration of the original patent, so that sufficient time was not left to give the required notice of application for its extension.

It appears from the evidence that the invention has been valuable to the public and profitable to the assignees, but that the widow and children of Fisk have never received any benefit therefrom, with the exception of a small sum as a gratuity from the assignees.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would rather have this bill postponed for a few days. There may be adverse parties who are not aware that this bill is now pending.

Mr. HOWE. I cannot object, of course, to its postponement if it is insisted upon; but I think after all we had better pass the bill now. I know there are adverse parties; but I suppose the contest must arise before the Commissioner of Patents. I so understand.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it had better arise here before we suffer the bill to pass.

Mr. HOWE. If there were any doubt about the bill being right, of course I would not object to its going over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If objection be made it must go over under the rule.

Mr. HOWE. If it is desired to examine it, I have no objection to its going over. It is too late, however, I apprehend, for a single objection to carry the bill over under the rule.

Mr. GRIMES. What is it for?

Mr. HOWE. A patent burial case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks a single objection carries it over. The bill has had its second reading to-day, and cannot have a third reading if objection is made.

Mr. HOWE. The Chair asked if there was any objection to the consideration of the bill at this time, and none was made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first question was whether there was any objection to the second reading of the bill to-day, and, like every other bill, it was then subject to an objection, and if an objection was made it could not have a third reading on the same day. It goes over now, objection being made.

COURTS IN CALIFORNIA AND OREGON.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask the consent of the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 51, which has been reported by the Judiciary Committee with amendments. It will not take a very long time to consider it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 51) amendatory of and supplementary to an act to provide circuit courts for the districts of California and Oregon, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863. It directs that a term of the circuit court of the United States for the districts in California shall be held in San Francisco on the first Mondays of February, June, and October, of each year; and in the city of Monterey on the first Mondays of April, August, and September of each year; and that a term of the circuit court for the State of Oregon shall be held at Portland on the first Mondays of January, May, and September of each year. Each term is to continue until the fourth Saturday after its commencement, inclusive, unless all the cases ready for trial or hearing be sooner disposed of. If all the cases ready for trial or hearing be not disposed of, the term may be continued as much longer as, in the opinion of the court, the public interest shall require.

Whenever the circuit judge is absent, or, from any cause, is unable to hold a term of the circuit court, it is to be the duty of the district judge of the district to hold such term. No term of the circuit court in one district of the tenth circuit is to be deemed to be ended from the commencement of a term in another district. A circuit court may be held in the different districts at the same time. The circuit judge of the tenth circuit may, at his discretion, appoint special sessions of the circuit court, to be held at the places where the stated sessions thereof are to be holden, by an order, under his hand and seal, addressed to the marshal and clerk of the court, at least fifteen days previous to the day fixed for the commencement of the special sessions, which order is to be published by the marshal in one or more of the gazettes or newspapers within the district where such sessions are to be holden. At special sessions it is to be competent for the court to entertain jurisdiction of and hear and decide all cases in equity, cases in error, or on appeal, issues of law, motions in arrest of judgment, motions for new trial, and all other motions, and to award executions and other final process, and to do and transact all other business, and direct all other proceedings in all causes pending in the circuit court, except trying any cause by jury, in the same way and with the same force and effect as the same could or might be done at the stated sessions of such court. At such special sessions the court may also try and determine all issues of fact in cases in which, by the stipulation in writing of the parties, or their attorneys, and filed with the clerk, a jury shall be waived.

The clerks of the circuit courts for the districts of California are to be appointed by the circuit judge of the tenth circuit. The appointment is to be in writing, under the hand and seal of the circuit judge, and is to be filed in the clerk's office and entered at large upon the records of the court. The circuit judge may revoke the appointment at any time by filing in the office of the clerk a notice in writing under his hand and seal, stating that the appointment is revoked, which revocation is to be entered on the records of the court. The clerk, before entering upon the discharge of his duties, is to take the oath of office prescribed by the act "to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862, and such oath is to be indorsed upon his appointment. The clerk is also to execute a bond to the United States with two or more sufficient sureties in such sum as the circuit judge may designate, conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties. In case of a vacancy in the office of clerk, the district judge is to have power to fill such vacancy by appointment, which is to continue until an appointment is made by the circuit judge. The clerks of the circuit courts of the United States for the districts of California are to be ex officio clerks of the district courts of the United States for those districts, and are to have all the powers and perform all the duties and be subject to all the liabilities of the clerks of district courts of the United States as prescribed by law.

The clerks of the circuit courts of the tenth circuit are to have power to appoint one or more deputies, who are to have the same authority in all respects as their principal, and to take the same oath. The clerks of the circuit courts and district courts of the United States for the districts of California are severally to be entitled to charge and receive for the services they may perform double the fees and emoluments allowed to the clerk of the southern district of New York for like services.

Issues of fact in civil cases may be tried and determined by the circuit court without the intervention of a jury whenever the parties or their attorneys of record file a stipulation in writing with the clerk waiving a jury. Upon the trial of an issue of fact by the court, its decision is to be given in writing and filed with the clerk, and the facts found and the conclusions of law are to be separately stated. The review of the judgment or decree entered upon such findings by the Supreme Court of the United States upon appeal or writ of error is to be limited to a determination of the sufficiency of the facts found to support the judgment or decree entered, and to the rulings of the court in admitting or rejecting evidence offered, and in the construction of written documents produced and admitted. The Supreme Court may affirm or modify or reverse the judgment or decree entered, or may, in its discretion, order a new trial or further proceedings to be taken.

All proceedings under the act "to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California," approved March 3, 1851, and acts supplementary to or amendatory thereof, for the confirmation of claims to lands situated wholly or in part within the city and county of San Francisco, pending before the district court of the United States for the northern district of California, are to be transferred to the circuit court for that district; which is to proceed to hear and finally determine such proceedings, and the validity and extent of the claims, and the correctness of the surveys made of the lands confirmed.

A term of the district court for the southern district of California is to be held in the city of Monterey, on the first Mondays of February, June, and October of each year; and a term of the district court for the northern district of California is to be held in San Francisco on the first Mondays of April, August, and December of each year; and a term of the district court for the district of Oregon is to be held at the city of Portland on the first Mondays of February, June, and October of each year. Each term is to continue until the fourth Saturday after its commencement inclusive, unless all the cases ready for trial or hearing be sooner disposed of. In case the business of the district court of any of the districts shall not be disposed of by the day fixed for the holding of a term of the circuit court of the United States in the district, and the circuit judge of the tenth circuit is not present to hold the term of the circuit court, it is to be the duty of the district court to adjourn over its business to some future day, to be designated, in order that the district judge of the district may hold such term of the circuit court.

In case proper rooms in which to hold the courts and for the chambers of the judges be not otherwise provided in any of the districts of California and Oregon, together with attendants, furniture, fuel, lights, and stationery, suitable and sufficient for the transaction of business, the district judge of the district may direct the marshal of the district to provide such rooms, attendants, furniture, fuel, lights, and stationery; and the expenses thereof, certified by the district judge to be correct, are to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, and the money is appropriated for that purpose; but no rooms for any of the courts or chambers are to be hired for a period exceeding six months, without the previous approval of the Attorney General of the United States.

This act is to take effect on the first Monday of May, A. D. 1864.

The first amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was in section one, line nine, to strike out the word "September," and insert "December."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirteen of section one, after the word "year," to strike out:

Each term shall continue until the fourth Saturday after its commencement, inclusive, unless all the cases ready for trial or hearing be sooner disposed of. If all the cases ready for trial or hearing be not disposed of, the term may be continued as much longer as, in the opinion of the court, the public interest shall require.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section four, line twenty-one, after the word "judge," to strike out:

The clerks of the circuit courts of the United States for the districts of California shall be ex officio clerks of the district courts of the United States for said districts, and shall have all the powers, and perform all the duties, and be subject to all the liabilities of the clerks of district courts of the United States as prescribed by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section eight, in the following words:

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That all proceedings under the act entitled "An act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California," approved March 3, 1851, and acts supplementary to or amendatory thereof, for the confirmation of claims to lands situated wholly or in part within the city and county of San Francisco, pending before the district court of the United States for the northern district of California, shall be, and are hereby, declared to be transferred to the circuit court for the said district; and said circuit court shall proceed to hear and finally determine such proceedings, and the validity and extent of the said claims, and the correctness of the surveys made of the lands confirmed, and is hereby invested with full power and jurisdiction for that purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section nine, line fourteen, after the word "year," to strike out:

Each term shall continue until the fourth Saturday after its commencement inclusive, unless all the cases ready for trial or hearing be sooner disposed of. In case the business of the district court of any of said districts shall not be disposed of by the day fixed by this act for the holding of a term of the circuit court of the United States in said district, and the circuit judge of the tenth circuit is not present to hold the said term of the circuit court, it shall be the duty of the district court to adjourn over its business to some future day to be designated, in order that the district judge of the district may hold such term of the circuit court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section ten, as follows:

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That in case proper rooms in which to hold the courts, as herein designated, and for the chambers of the judges, be not otherwise provided in any of the districts of California and Oregon, together with attendants, furniture, fuel, lights, and stationery, suitable and sufficient for the transaction of business, the district judge of the district may direct the marshal of the district to provide such rooms, attendants, furniture, fuel, lights, and stationery; and the expenses thereof, certified by the district judge to be correct, shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, and the money is hereby appropriated for that purpose: Provided, That no rooms for any of said courts or chambers shall be hired for a period exceeding six months, without the previous approval of the Attorney General of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section twelve, line two, after the word "May," to strike out the words "anno Domini," so that the section will read, "that this act shall take effect on the first Monday of May, 1864."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. In the first section I move to strike out in the sixth line and in the eighth line, the word "first," and insert "second" in their places, so as to read, "the second Monday of June, and the second Monday of August."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. In the ninth section, to make it correspond, I move to strike out "first" in the ninth line, and insert "second;" and in the thirteenth line to strike out "February," and insert "March;" in the same line to strike out "June" and insert "July;" and in the fourteenth line to strike out "October" and insert "November."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will put the questions on these amendments in one motion.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HARDING. In the sixth section, line three, after the word "California," I move to insert the words "and Oregon," so that the clerks of the courts in Oregon as well as in California shall be entitled to receive the fees provided for in that section.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is no objection to that. The same reasons apply in Oregon as in California.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARDING. I have one other amendment which I desire to offer to this bill, to raise the salary of the district judge for the district of Oregon. His salary is now $3,000, and as a matter of justice to ourselves we ought to adopt an amendment to raise his salary to $3,500 per annum. My amendment is to add to the bill as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the salary of the district judge for the district of Oregon shall hereafter be $3,500 per annum.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am sorry the Senator from Oregon has offered this amendment. It will lead to an effort to raise the salaries of all the judges. The salary of the judge in Oregon at this time is $3,000. There cannot be a very large amount of business, I think, in Oregon; and if we once commence raising the salaries of judges there will be a great pressure upon Congress to raise the salaries of other officers; and in the midst of this war, at this time, I trust the Senator from Oregon will not press it. Let it go over until we get in a better condition.

I will state to the Senator from Oregon that the salary of the district judge in Oregon is already much higher than that of many of the district judges. Some of them have but $1,500, and some $2,000, who sit a good part of the year. I think the salary of the district judge of Connecticut, and who holds court in the city of New York a good part of the year, is only $2,000. If we once commence raising these salaries, we shall find it very difficult to stop. I trust the Senator will not press the amendment.

Mr. HARDING. On an examination of the facts, I supposed that the district judge of the northern district of California had a salary of $5,000; and the district judge of the southern district of California had a salary of $3,500. Our State judges in Oregon receive a salary of $2,500, payable in gold. That is higher than the district judge of that district receives when you take into consideration the difference between gold and greenbacks. His salary being paid in Government currency, it falls below $2,000 in gold, while our State judges receive $2,500. If, however, the judges in California receive only $3,000, I do not think myself we should ask that the judge of Oregon should receive any more. My understanding is that the judge in the northern district of California receives $5,000; the judge of the southern district $3,500.

Mr. CONNESS. I believe the judge of the northern district of California at present receives $6,000. It was $5,000 previous to 1860, when an act was passed increasing the salary. It will be remembered that the business of that district is very large. As for taking the southern district of California in comparison with the district of Oregon or any other, I do not think it will do very well, because I am of opinion myself that we should have no southern district in California. I think that one district in the State is enough, and that we are paying one salary too much in that State. I shall very gladly support a bill that shall give us one district there instead of two. I have not felt disposed to introduce such a bill, because it might be interpreted as against myself as a stroke against the gentleman who is occupying the position of judge in that district, for whom I have a great deal of respect and consideration. So much on the subject of salary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon.

The amendment was not agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes nine, noes not counted.

Mr. CONNESS. I have one more amendment to offer to the sixth section. It will be observed the compensation of the clerk of the northern district of the circuit court is fixed at double the fees and emoluments allowed to the clerk of the southern district of New York for like services. I want to change the verbiage there by simply striking out all after the word "double" in the fourth line and directing attention to the act under which compensation is allowed by inserting the words "the fees and the compensation allowed by the act entitled 'An act to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed the clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes,' approved February 26, 1853." I propose the amendment simply to make it more specific.

Mr. HOWARD. I will suggest to the Senator from California, in case of the repeal or modification of that act relating to the district in New York—

Mr. CONNESS. This does not repeal anything.

Mr. HOWARD. But in case that law should be repealed, what would be the rule in regard to the court in California?

Mr. CONNESS. We shall have to take care of that in the future. It is more specific in this language, because it refers to the title of the act, than it is in the bill as it now stands, and we prefer it to the language of the bill.

Mr. HOWARD. But suppose that act that you incorporate in this bill should be repealed?

Mr. CONNESS. I apprehend that will not occur. We are willing to take risk on that. It would not affect this act at any rate. It allows the clerk the fees provided by a specific act named, and even if it were repealed I do not think it would affect this measure.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have not looked into the act to see what the effect of this amendment will be; but I should like to inquire of the Senator from California whether the fees fixed by the act of 1853 are the same as are now allowed to the clerk of the southern district of New York?

Mr. CONNESS. They are the same fees.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then I have no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was read the third time, and passed.

POST ROADS IN NEW JERSEY.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads had referred to them some days ago a bill (S. No. 102) to establish certain post roads, and to regulate commerce among the States, and for other purposes. It is a bill involving the exercise of large powers, and raises the question of the conflict of jurisdiction between the United States and the State authority in relation to roads, involving large constitutional questions. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads find no occasion for any action on the subject in relation to their department, because by law now every railroad is made a mail route. The railroads, then, being mail routes, we have no further occasion to act upon the bill. I am therefore instructed by the committee to ask that they be discharged from the further consideration of this bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, to which the question belongs.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to know what the bill is. I have no objection to the discharge of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads that I know of; but I should like to know what bill it is that is being sent to the Judiciary Committee. That committee is not certainly organized for the purpose of giving legal opinions.

Mr. COLLAMER. We get them from you pretty often.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to know what the title of the bill is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The title will be read.

The SECRETARY. A bill to establish certain post roads, and to regulate commerce among the States, and for other purposes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. A bill to establish post roads certainly has no business before the Committee on the Judiciary. The bill relates also it seems to commerce. The bill then certainly belongs to the Post Office Committee or to the Committee on Commerce. Surely the Committee on the Judiciary has nothing to do with it, and I object to its taking any such disposition. Manifestly a bill relating to post roads belongs to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads; and there is nobody in the Senate, I am sure, better capable of framing a bill in reference to post roads, so as not to interfere with the conflicting jurisdiction of New Jersey or of other States, than the very able Senator from Vermont who has had charge of this bill. I am quite sure that the Senate would have as much confidence in the result of his examination into a bill of that character as they would in any other member of the Senate. I object to its going to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COLLAMER. I had hoped to save the time of the Senate in making the brief statement I did; but as the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary seems to object to the reference of this bill to that committee, I must occupy more time.

It seems, Mr. President, that in the early history of railroads in this country, the State of New Jersey granted a charter for a railroad all within that State from Camden to Amboy, and to induce them to make the road they provided that no other road should be granted without their consent, which should interfere with the carrying business between New York and Philadelphia through that State. Subsequently they granted another road, with the consent of the Camden and Amboy road, which is now much used, the Trenton road. Afterwards they made two other railroads, subject to this same provision in their grant; that is, they granted a road from Camden directly east to Atlantic City; and another one from somewhere down upon the New York bay within their own State to join with the Delaware bay. They cross each other. During this war there have been some troops and munitions of war conveyed by that route between New York and Philadelphia, coming down through New York bay by steamboat about twenty miles, then taking this road till it strikes the Atlantic road, and then following that road to Camden. The chancellor of that State has, I believe, granted an injunction upon that route against carrying between those two States, as being in contravention of the grant to the Camden and Amboy road.

This bill seems to be somewhat complicated in its purposes. It invokes the exercise of the power of Congress to regulate commerce between the States. It invokes the exercise of the power of Congress in relation to the making of military roads, and also of mail routes. It proposes to declare that circuitous road by way of the Atlantic road a highway of the United States, a mail route, and I do not know but a military route, in the exercise of these various, different powers of Congress. Great questions arise whether the power of Congress to regulate commerce between the States extends to the regulating of the railroads within a State different from the provisions of the State authority, interfering with that authority, or controlling it in the view of preventing monopoly; in short, involving the great questions of conflicting jurisdiction, the largest we have ever had before us, between the States and the General Government in relation to concerns within the body of the State itself.

Now, Mr. President, so far as the bill relates to mail routes, I before said, and I now state again, that we have a general statute which makes every railroad a mail route.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will pardon the Chair. It becomes the duty of the Chair at this hour to call up the special order. If there be no objection upon the part of the Senate, however, the Chair will proceed with the unfinished business of the morning hour.

Mr. COLLAMER. Let us dispose of this.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator will proceed.

Mr. COLLAMER. I say so far as the bill relates to mail routes nothing is necessary to be done. The general law has provided for all that is wanted in relation to the mails on any road. Every railroad is declared a mail route, and that is all we can do with it.

But that is not what the bill desires. It proposes a settlement of the great question whether a State can create what they call a monopoly within the State itself, or whether Congress can have the control of that subject under the exercise of the various powers contained in the Constitution, and the exercise of which is invoked by the present bill. They are great and important questions, and they are judicial and legal and constitutional questions, not relating to the Post Office at all. I think it properly belongs to the Judiciary Committee, and I have been directed by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to ask to have it referred there. Because of their direction, I do ask to have it so referred, and I think it a very reasonable request.

Heretofore it has been the usual rule for the chairmen of committees in the two Houses of Congress to watch and see to it that none of their business was sent away from them; to see that they magnified and justified their own jurisdiction, and laid claim to all that could properly belong to them. This bill properly undoubtedly belongs to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the chairman of that committee, instead of trying to get rid of it, should take it magnanimously and consider it, as it belongs to him. As to what is said in relation to myself and my committee that we are competent to consider all questions of this kind, I merely say I do not disclaim that. I have not the exceeding modesty to disclaim it at all; but I would say this: this body has selected another board for that purpose, and did not put me on it, and I do not therefore think it proper to undertake a duty of that kind to which I have never been selected by the body, however much I ought to have been. I leave that as another question entirely. I hope, Mr. President, the subject may take its proper direction.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the Senate to take up—

Mr. COLLAMER. Let this question first be disposed of and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will ask a division of that question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A division of the question is asked. The first question, then, is on discharging the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads from the further consideration of the bill. The second question will be on referring it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President, this is "a bill to establish post roads and to regulate commerce among the States, and for other purposes." The whole subject-matter of the bill is the establishment of a postal and military road through the State of New Jersey. I think it is now before the committee to which it properly, in my judgment, belongs, and I hope it may remain in that committee. I do not think it is a question that should be referred to the Judiciary Committee. Every matter touching this bill is a matter for the proper consideration of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads; and even should constitutional questions arise, growing out of the establishment of this or any other road as a post road, that committee certainly are as competent to settle it as the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Judiciary Committee is not organized for the purpose of settling legal questions that may arise in other committees. That is not the purpose, in my judgment, of its organization. Each committee of this House, when a proper subject-matter is referred to them, should settle all the legal questions arising upon it. The idea of sending a bill establishing post roads to the Judiciary Committee is certainly to me a novel kind of proceeding. I think it is now before the proper committee and the only committee to whom it should have gone. I think they should retain the bill, and make their report upon it; and I know of no committee in this Senate more competent to discharge that duty than the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. Even were the gravest constitutional questions to arise upon it I know of no chairman of a committee better competent to settle them than the honorable Senator from Vermont, the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. I hope that this bill may be allowed to remain with the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and that it may not be sent to the Judiciary Committee. In my judgment the Judiciary Committee have nothing to do with it, and should not have.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no knowledge of this bill except that derived from a very cursory reading of it and what I understand to be its title. It has three substantial provisions: one of them relates to commerce, another relates to military matters, and the third relates to the Post Office Department. It may be true, and certainly is true, that each one of those subjects when it is before the Senate very often presents a legal inquiry. No legal questions are more frequently presented than those which are involved in all financial propositions. So in Post Office propositions; and so in military propositions. I understand the honorable chairman in whose hands the whole bill is supposed that it should go to the Committee on the Judiciary because of their supposed fitness to dispose of all merely legal questions, whether those questions involve the construction of the Constitution or the meaning of any of our statutes. That cannot be true, as a general proposition, I submit to my honorable friend from Vermont. All questions relating to the judiciary are proper questions for the consideration of that committee, because they do relate to the judiciary. All questions relating to the Post Office for the same reason belong to that committee; and all questions relating to finance or to military matters belong to the respective committees of Finance and Military Affairs. The fact that there are or may be in all such measures legal questions is no objection to the jurisdiction of the respective committees. If it was, it is difficult to imagine how any measure proposing to change the existing law could go to any other committee than to the Committee on the Judiciary. If that were the case the function of the other committees in the Senate would be at an end; their vocation would be gone. That cannot be so.

I understand my friend from Vermont to say that so far as relates to that part of the bill which affects the Post Office establishment by providing the roads over which the mail is to be carried, the law which is proposed is unnecessary because it is still the law. In that I have no doubt the Senator is, as he always is, very correct. That is a very good reason for reporting against that part of the bill, and if he reports upon that ground, that it is unnecessary, if the law is still as it is proposed to make it, and the honorable member thinks that committee is not in a condition to dispose of what may be termed the military part of the bill or the financial part of the bill, he has the right, it having been referred to him, and I submit it is the proper function of the committee when they find themselves in a condition of that kind, to report against the whole bill. It can afterwards be introduced so as to provide for each of the other two provisions which, as I understand, propose to incorporate into the law of the United States that which is not now a part of the law of the United States.

I agree with the honorable Senator from Vermont that there is a question involved in one of the measures of very great constitutional importance, and perhaps a very great constitutional difficulty. On that question I do not propose to commit myself, because really I have no opinion on the subject; but, as I understand it, the roads that are now constructed through New Jersey have been constructed under the guarantee of a charter which stipulated that New Jersey should not at any time thereafter, or for a period of time, I forget which—

Mr. COLLAMER. A period of time.

Mr. JOHNSON. For a period of time authorize the construction of any other road. It may be—I am not prepared, as I have stated, to say whether it is so or not—it may be that that constituted a contract as between the present roads and the State which is protected by that clause of the Constitution of the United States which guards a State against impairing the obligation of contracts. But there is another question behind that.

Mr. COLLAMER. I beg the gentleman's pardon for a moment. The roads that ask our interference here now do not claim that they have any grant by the State inconsistent with those other grants.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was about to say that I so understand.

Mr. COLLAMER. This is not a breach of the contract of the State.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was about to say, without looking to the road to be affected by this bill, or what are claimed to be their rights, that it may be, and perhaps is, a very grave question whether a State can by contract deprive itself of the power over its own internal improvements in this way. I know that the particular road which is to be affected by this bill is a road constructed under a charter which does not present that difficulty. There is, as I understand, no objection at all to the validity of that charter.

Mr. COLLAMER. None at all.

Mr. JOHNSON. But the holders of that charter, or those who may be interested in it, although they are willing to have it conceded for the sake of the argument that the charter under which they are acting gives no authority to them to interfere with the exclusive franchise granted to the antecedent road, believe that that object may be accomplished by calling upon Congress to give them the power to do under their charter that which, without the authority of Congress, they would be unable to do.

That presents the question I was about to state. Congress—it has always been the received doctrine, certainly for many years, at any rate—Congress has within the last thirty or forty or fifty years through every branch of the Government before whom the question has arisen—I mean the executive and legislative branches of the Government—denied that there existed in the Government of the United States any authority under the power to establish post offices and post roads to construct roads. General Jackson took that ground in his Maysville message, and, as far as we know anything on the subject, certainly Congress have sanctioned it as the true meaning of that term. I am not prepared to say it is a true meaning; but it presents a very grave question.

If the power is not to be found under the authority to establish post offices and post roads, the next question is whether it is to be found under the war power. It is, I know, contended that under the war power whatever is necessary to facilitate the operations of the armies of the United States to bring to a successful termination the war may be done, however it may conflict with what otherwise would be the admitted rights of a State; and that upon the ground of necessity. That I can understand. But one would suppose that when that necessity is to terminate, whatever has grown out of the necessity is to die with it, because otherwise the power to establish roads, construct internal improvements, or do anything else which is supposed to be involved in the power to declare and carry on a war becomes a substantial power in the Constitution of the United States, and controls, not only during the period of the emergency, but during all time, the authority of the State.

To illustrate: Maryland has constructed, at very heavy expense, a railroad system. Pennsylvania has constructed her canal system to even a greater extent, and her railroad system. New Jersey has done the same thing. New York has done the same thing. The great West has done the same thing at, I believe, a still more heavy expense. If, under this military power, you can say that any road in New Jersey is to be a military road you can say that all railroads in the country are hereafter to be military roads, and take them under your own charge; and if, because of the authority to do that during the period which exists now, because of the necessity which may be supposed to exist now, of which the Congress and the Executive can alone judge, you can take all these roads to yourselves and enlarge the authority which the charters gave, and give to the corporations powers which the charters did not give to them, why you make the war power not a temporary but a continuing source of authority.

I have said all that I contemplated saying on this subject, except this: that I think it would be better that these two subjects, which are not, as I admit, legitimately before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, should be reported to the Senate, the Post Office Committee discharged from their consideration, and they should be referred to their appropriate committees—the Military Committee and the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have nothing further to say, except this: after all, the remarks of the gentleman, so far as they have been heard, show most conclusively that this subject is one with which the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads have nothing in the world to do, relating to the military power of this Government and the duty of regulating commerce between the States. It is claimed that that power extends to the regulation of roads within the States. All the law that is needed to make any of these roads post roads already exists. There is no occasion for any further law. I did not wish, and the committee did not wish, to make a report on the merits of other parts of the bill, or to say that we report entirely against it. If we show there is no occasion of our having it in our hands for Post Office purposes, I think we should be discharged from its consideration.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I do not see why the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads should desire to be relieved from the consideration of this bill. It is certainly prima facie the proper committee to take it into consideration; and if there be any question of constitutional law growing out of it I am very certain that committee is as competent to decide that question as any other committee of this body. I shall, therefore, vote against the motion to discharge the committee, because I think the matter belongs to them appropriately, and that it does not belong to any other committee of the Senate as appropriately as to that committee.

Mr. COLLAMER. I think the gentleman could not have heard what I said.

Mr. HOWARD. Perhaps I did not.

Mr. COLLAMER. I say that so far as the bill relates to post offices and post roads there is no occasion for any action by us on any part of it at all.

Mr. HOWARD. Then I can hardly imagine why that part of it is here.

Mr. COLLAMER. There is no occasion for our action, because the railroad which it is suggested to make into a mail route is now a mail route by law.

Mr. HOWARD. Then if it is a mail route already by law what is the use of this bill so far as it purports to make it a mail route? Why is it here? Why refer it to any committee?

Mr. COLLAMER. Because it contains two other various and important subjects besides.

Mr. FOSTER. I can see no possible objection to discharging the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. Indeed, I think they ought to be discharged from the consideration of this bill. The residue of the bill, from the statement of the honorable chairman of the committee, seems to belong a part of it to the Committee on Military Affairs and a part of it to the Committee on Commerce. The Judiciary Committee have nothing to do with either of those questions. I hope the question to discharge the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads may be assented to readily, for I see no objection to it.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to discharge the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads from the further consideration of this subject.

The motion was agreed to.

THE VICEPRESIDENT. The question now is on referring the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question being put, there were, on a division—yeas 16, noes 15; no quorum voting.

MR. CONNESS. I call for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

MR. TRUMBULL. As it seems this is to become a question of dispute, and the yeas and nays are to be taken, I wish Senators to understand it. It is simply a question whether, when bills come before the Senate that committees desire to get rid of they are to be put upon the Judiciary Committee. There has been a good deal of that practice. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] smiles. He has, I believe, been a party to some of these motions before.

MR. FESSENDEN. I beg my friend to specify a case, as he makes a charge against me.

MR. HOWARD. They are so numerous that they cannot be specified.

MR. TRUMBULL. I think I can specify a case. I think I could be able to show, if it were necessary, that the Senator from Maine urged the reference to the Judiciary Committee at this session of Congress of a resolution in regard to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] with which the Judiciary Committee had nothing to do; and also a bill for bounties, introduced by the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WILKINSON.]

MR. FESSENDEN. It was to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MR. TRUMBULL. It was referred to the Judiciary Committee; and I think the Senator from Maine advocated it. He is mistaken if he supposes that he has not been engaged in it. If he wants more specifications perhaps I could specify more; but there are two cases within a few weeks.

It has now become a question, and the yeas and nays are called upon it, whether a bill on which a constitutional question can be raised shall be sent to the Committee on the Judiciary. Is there any bill that we cannot raise a constitutional question about? When the Senator from Maine at the last session of Congress brought in a bill to make Treasury notes a legal tender was not that a constitutional question? Was it not argued here on that ground? Why did he not ask to discharge the Finance Committee from the consideration of that subject, and refer it to the Judiciary Committee, because possibly somebody doubted the right to make a Treasury note a legal tender? When a bill is before the Committee on Commerce to appropriate money for the improvement of rivers and harbors, because somebody doubts the constitutionality of the appropriation, why is not the Committee on Commerce discharged from the consideration of that subject, and it sent to the Committee on the Judiciary? I will tell you why it is not done. Whenever these questions arise incidentally out of a bill which properly belongs to a certain committee, the committee never shirks its duty and never seeks to refer it to another committee because a constitutional question may be raised. It has never been done. The Judiciary Committee has nothing more to do with this question than any other committee of the Senate. It is organized to take charge of matters relating to the courts and the judicial business of the country; and if constitutional questions arise out of bills of that character they consider them. But because a constitutional question arises in a financial matter is the Committee on Finance to be discharged from its consideration? By no means. That has never been the practice of the Senate; and until very recently these attempts to turn bills of that character over to the Judiciary Committee were never made.

Now, sir, here is a bill relating to post roads and military roads; and because a question may arise as to the authority of Congress to make a post road or a military road of a certain railroad, therefore the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads ask to be discharged from its consideration, and the chairman of the committee tells us that there is no occasion for a bill to create such a road as a post road. Very properly then that committee may be discharged from its consideration. But because another question might by possibility arise, whether there was any authority, if a road was needed, to construct the road, or for the Government of the United States to take charge of it, therefore it is to be sent to the Committee on the Judiciary. For what purpose? I really cannot see any purpose to be accomplished by it, and I trust the Senate, upon the yeas and nays, will give it no such reference.

MR. FESSENDEN. I really feel that an apology is due from me to the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. I only feel it because he seems to have taken such offense at an involuntary smile that I gave when he commenced his remarks. This motion is made by the honorable Senator from Vermont. I have taken no part in it. I have said nothing. I have sat quietly in my seat and listened to the debate; but because when the Senator commenced his remarks and seemed to think that the Judiciary Committee had been practiced upon I could not help smiling, the Senator has addressed all his remarks of obfuscation—if I may so call them—to the Senator from Maine.

Now, sir, it is very possible that on one or two occasions I have moved that bills should be sent to the Committee on the Judiciary because I thought they ought to go there, and I believe the Senate sustained me in sending them there. I cannot see that I committed any very great offense against parliamentary propriety, or really subjected myself to censure from the honorable Senator. Let me say, however, that the reason why I have made such motions was simply because I thought the Committee on the Judiciary was so ably constituted and possessed so much learning in reference to all those matters, and were so abundantly able to deal with questions of this description, that I really thought it was a duty to send questions of this description to that committee to be investigated. It seems that my thinking so has given offense; and therefore, by way of apology, I take it back, and say that the Judiciary Committee is not, in my judgment, (because that will suit the Senator better,) fit to have charge of questions of this description.

MR. CONNESS. I voted this morning in the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of this question, and also to move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary. I beg to say simply—

MR. DAVIS. Tell us what occurred.

MR. CONNESS. No, sir; I will not tell what occurred in committee; but I beg to say that the motive there was simply this: this being an important bill, the question involved in it being of the first consequence, we desired to get the benefit of the great ability and learning of that committee upon the great question involved in it. It was not from any desire to shirk labor in the premises at all. I say that in great sincerity. It is a question in which I feel a good deal of interest as to whether a State may not only say who shall do business within its borders, but who shall travel or trade between two of the great cities of the Union, and whether a State can control that question. I am sincerely desirous, and the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads are desirous, that that question should now at this time be examined by the Committee on the Judiciary. I hope that it will go there, and I beg to assure the committee that we were most sincere in the recommendation that we made.

MR. POMEROY. While I would not say anything about what was done by the committee particularly, yet I will say there was no disposition on the part of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, nor on the part of any one that I know of, to give this bill the go-by, or to assume that there was anything asked for in the bill that should not be granted.

MR. CONNESS. Quite the contrary.

MR. POMEROY. The committee simply desired the expression of the Judiciary Committee on certain constitutional questions. It need not be imagined from this motion that this subject of having at least two lines of road, of which this is one of the links between here and New York, is to have the go-by, or is to be voted against. I do not think that is the sentiment of Congress or the country. I believe they are prepared to consider that question; and if there are no constitutional objections in the way I think public policy and public interest will demand it. It is simply a question whether we can do it constitutionally, and upon that question it was supposed that the Judiciary Committee could express their opinion.

MR. FOSTER. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him a question?

MR. POMEROY. Of course.

MR. FOSTER. I wish to ask whether the opinion of the Judiciary Committee upon the power of Congress to do this would not, after all, depend upon the necessity of the case; and whether, in his judgment, it would not be best first to get the opinion of the Military Committee whether it was necessary to have this road; or if it proposes to regulate commerce to get the opinion of the Committee on Commerce as regards the necessity of that case?

MR. POMEROY. I do not think the opinion of the Judiciary Committee on the constitutionality of the bill would depend upon any necessity of the case; because necessity does not make constitutional what would be otherwise unconstitutional. Necessity may be a reason why we may override the Constitution; necessity may be a reason why we may do a great many things; but the Judiciary Committee will not declare a thing to be constitutional simply because we think it is necessary. My own conviction with regard to the matter is that it is both within the Constitution and necessary, and I think the Judiciary Committee will so decide.

MR. FOSTER. If it should be constitutional but not necessary would not the labor of the Judiciary Committee be all lost?

MR. POMEROY. Then it will become a question for the Senate, after the committee decide that it is constitutional, to say whether they think it is expedient or not. The objections to it will be removed, I judge, when men find that this measure is within the provisions of the Constitution. It is clearly a part of the public policy, I think, to have better facilities between here and New York, and to increase them and have more of them; and it is simply a question of public policy, provided it does not interfere with any constitutional restrictions.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to refer this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, and upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Pomerooy, and Ramsey—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Carlile, Chandler, Davis, Foster, Hale, Harding, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Powell, Richardson, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Wilson, and Wright—27.

So the motion was not agreed to.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. What disposition will the Senate make of the bill? It is now before the Senate.

MR. WILSON. I move that it be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. Reports from committees are still in order.

MR. WILSON. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army. That is the regular order of the day.

MR. TRUMBULL. I desire to make a report. I believe that is in order.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts insist on his motion before the morning business is disposed of?

MR. WILSON. The morning hour has passed some time ago.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour has gone by long since, but the morning business is not yet finished.

MR. WILSON. I withdraw the motion for the present.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. Reports from committees are in order.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (No. 225) making an appropriation for rebuilding the stable at the President's, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. COLLAMER, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 62) to remove all disqualification of color in carrying the mails, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 55) in relation to the circuit court in and for the district of Wisconsin, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 110) for the relief of John H. Shepherd and Walter K. Caldwell, of Missouri, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. DAVIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 113) to provide for ascertaining and adjusting claims against the Government for injury or destruction of property by the Army of the United States or by military authority during the present rebellion, and for settling the claims of the State of Kentucky against the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

REBUILDING OF PRESIDENT'S STABLE.

The bill (H. R. No. 225) making an appropriation for rebuilding the stable at the President's, was read twice by its title.

Mr. GRIMES. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to ask for the present consideration of that bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It requires the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill at the present time.

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill, which appropriates the sum of $12,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the Commissioner of Public Buildings to cause the stable at the President's to be rebuilt forthwith.

Mr. GRIMES. In order to explain fully the necessity for the passage of the bill at this time, and the amount that is specified in it, $12,000, I desire to read a letter addressed by the Commissioner of Public Buildings this morning to the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House of Representatives. It is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS,
CAPITOL OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, February 11, 1864.

DEAR SIR: The stable attached to the Executive Mansion was destroyed by fire last night. It is very necessary, for the convenience of the President, that it should be rebuilt as soon as possible. At an interview with him, early this morning, he expressed a desire that I would bring the matter to the attention of Congress to-day, if possible, that measures might be taken to have it rebuilt.

Isaiah Rogers, Esq., the Architect of the Treasury, with a master bricklayer, accompanied me to the ruins, and after a careful examination Mr. Rogers came to the conclusion that it would cost $12,000 to rebuild it, and has given me a written estimate to that effect, which accompanies this letter.

The walls of the stable are of the best pressed brick, but are so cracked and warped that nearly the whole will have to be taken down. The inside of the stable is entirely burned out. The window caps and sills are of brown stone, and most of them so injured that new ones will have to be procured.

The stable cost originally, I understand, about seventeen thousand dollars.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

B. B. FRENCH,
Commissioner of Public Buildings.

Hon. JOHN H. RICE, Chairman Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, House Representatives United States.

I also have in my hand the estimate of Mr. Rogers, the Architect of the Treasury, which accompanies the letter of the Commissioner of Public Buildings and corroborates the statement made in that letter.

Mr. JOHNSON. How many horses will the stable accommodate?

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know.

Mr. JOHNSON. Twelve thousand dollars is rather a large sum for a stable.

Mr. GRIMES. It cost originally $17,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COLONIZATION OF TEXAS.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I now move that the Senate take up Senate bill No. 45, for the purpose of making it a special order for Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 45) to set apart a portion of the State of Texas for the use of persons of African descent.

Mr. SUMNER. I think we had better not go into the consideration of that bill now. I have not had an opportunity of reading the report of the Senator on the subject. It is one of the most important subjects that can be presented to the Senate. It involves the question of the treatment of freedmen, of colonization, and I fear also a very considerable expenditure of money. But I do not wish to anticipate the discussion. I simply suggest to the Senator from Kansas that he had better let the bill lie a little longer, until we have had at least an opportunity of reading his report.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. In answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts I have this to say: I shall be compelled, on account of sickness in my family, to leave here next week for home, and I desire to submit some remarks to the Senate on the subject of this bill. After that I shall let it take such direction as the Senate may desire.

Mr. CLARK. We will take it up at any time for that purpose.

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator wishes merely to state the case I certainly have no objection to that. I had supposed that the Senator proposed to make it a special order with a view to press it to a vote, and I thought the Senate were not ready for that.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The Senator from New Hampshire suggests that the Senate would take it up at any time. I have already stated that I shall be compelled to go home next week. It is uncertain whether I can have it taken up at any time, and as I design to start perhaps on Wednesday I should like to have it a certainty.

Mr. CLARK. I meant simply to say that, after his statement, we would take it up at any time to accommodate the Senator, whenever he desired to address the Senate upon it, without making it a special order. I will vote to hear him now if he desires to go on at present.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I am not prepared now. I should like very much for the Senate to make it a special order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. For what day?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. For Tuesday next.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas moves to postpone the further consideration of this bill until Tuesday next, and make it the special order for that day at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; two thirds of the Senate concurring.

BRITISH SCHOONER GLEN.

Mr. SUMNER. There is a little bill which I ask the Senate to take up and act upon now, which will cause no debate. It is House bill No. 144, to indemnify the owners of the British schooner Glen.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill, which directs that there be paid to the owners of the British schooner Glen the sum of $17,150 66, the same being the amount awarded as an indemnification to the parties interested by the district court of the United States of America for the southern district of New York, for costs, damages, and expenses by reason of the illegal seizure of that vessel and cargo as prize.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIEUTENANT GENERAL.

Mr. WILSON. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 26) reviving the grade of lieutenant general in the United States Army.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to revive the grade of lieutenant general in the Army of the United States; and authorizes the President, whenever he shall deem it expedient, to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commander of the Army, to be selected, during war, from among those officers in the military service of the United States, not below the grade of major general, most distinguished for courage, skill, and ability; and who, being commissioned as lieutenant general, shall be authorized, under the direction of the President, to command the armies of the United States; and respectfully recommends the appointment of Major General U. S. Grant, of Illinois, for the position of lieutenant general.

The lieutenant general thus appointed is to be entitled to the pay, allowances, and staff specified in the fifth section of the act approved May 28, 1798; and also the allowances described in the sixth section of the act approved August 23, 1842, granting additional rations to certain officers; but nothing in this bill contained is to be construed in any way to affect the rank, pay, or allowances of Winfield Scott, lieutenant general by brevet, now on the retired list of the Army.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill with several amendments. The first amendment of the committee was in line seven, section one, to strike out the words "commander of the Army," and to insert "lieutenant general;" and in line eight, after the word "selected," to strike out the words "during the war;" so that the clause will read:

And the President is hereby authorized, whenever he shall deem it expedient, to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a lieutenant general, to be selected from among those officers in the military service of the United States, not below the grade of major general, most distinguished for courage, skill, and ability.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That amendment involves the whole character of the bill and its importance, as it seems to me. The bill as it came to us from the House of Representatives was intended not simply to confer the honor of lieutenant general upon the person who should be selected by the President of the United States as most distinguished for his courage, skill, and ability, but it was intended also in conferring this high honor upon him to give him some command corresponding with the title conferred by it. If you strike out these words as proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs you deprive the resolution of its value so far as it is intended to place the lieutenant general in command over other generals. I suppose it is competent for the Congress of the United States to determine by law the powers which the officers in the Army shall exercise. For instance, we have provided that a brigadier general shall have command of a brigade. We cannot place the brigadier general over the brigade; we cannot appoint the brigadier general; the President selects the man; but we provide, by Congress, what authority the brigadier general shall have when he is selected by the President.

The virtue of this bill to my mind is the principle contained in it, which gives the lieutenant general when selected command over the armies of the United States. I am as willing as any one to confer honor on General Grant. He has performed distinguished services; he has done well for his country; he deserves well for his gallant deeds any honors that Congress can confer upon him. But, sir, when we are conferring honors upon him and placing him in a position at the head of the Army, as this bill proposes, I propose that you shall give him the authority which the position is entitled to. One of the excellencies of this bill to my mind is that provision in it that when he is made lieutenant general he shall be commander of the armies of the United States under the President. I speak of General Grant because the bill as it comes to us from the House recommends General Grant. We cannot compel the President to confer this honor upon him. He has the selection; and it would be in his power to select some other individual. But whoever is selected by him as most distinguished for courage, skill, and ability during this war, let that individual when selected by the President and confirmed by the Senate have command of the armies of the United States, under the authority, of course, of the President, who is Commander-in-Chief by the Constitution.

I hope the amendment of the committee will not be agreed to. I desire for one, and I will not disguise it, that the armies of the United States shall be commanded by a different person from the one who now exercises authority over them; and if you strike these words out you do not accomplish that object. What will the bill amount to as amended by the Committee on Military Affairs? Simply to confer upon General Grant the empty honor of being called lieutenant general; that is all. Sir, I want him when the honors of the lieutenant generality are conferred upon him to have the power to command the armies of the United States; and therefore I trust this amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. NESMITH. I differ with the Senator from Illinois in relation to the construction that he puts on the amendment which was made in the Committee on Military Affairs. I do not apprehend that it is necessary in a bill creating additional rank for an Army officer to determine in the terms of that bill what his rights shall be as a commanding officer. If a lieutenant general is appointed he will be superior in rank to any officer that we now have in the United States Army, and in virtue of that superiority he will be entitled to command all other officers while in service with them. The bill which we passed at the last session of Congress providing that the President might select any one of two officers of the same grade serving in the same field or in the same department, and place him in command of that field or department without reference to his relative rank with other officers of the same grade in the service, does not apply to the lieutenant general, as there is no lieutenant general now; and if the rank is created there can be but one. The plain inference to my mind is, that if a lieutenant general is created he is the superior military officer in the Government, subordinate only to the President of the United States, who is Commander-in-Chief, and that all other officers are subordinate to him. There is no power by law now to make him subordinate to any major general, or to place him under the command of any other officer.

Now, sir, I am opposed to providing by law that any single individual shall be commander of the armies of the United States, for this simple reason: the contingencies and the incidents which are always occurring in war sometimes make it necessary to have changes. Suppose you pass this bill with a provision that the lieutenant general shall be the commander of the armies of the United States. During the recess of Congress a dozen contingencies might arise which might render it necessary that some other person should have the command of the Army; that this officer should be retired from active duty, or at least deprived of his command. I think with all these contingencies, all these probabilities likely to arise, that the President should not be deprived of the discretion of determining in a time of great public danger when Congress is not in session who should exercise that command. I shall vote for no bill that provides that any particular individual shall be the commander of the Army of the United States for these very reasons.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Oregon will allow me to inquire of him if it would not be within the power and discretion of the President at any time to dismiss him if during the recess of Congress or at any other time he was found not to be a proper person to command the Army?

Mr. NESMITH. I apprehend he would have the power to strike him from the rolls.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then it is in his discretion.

Mr. NESMITH. Admitting that point, circumstances may arise wherein it would be proper to deprive him of his command as commander of the armies of the United States, and where it would be very improper to strike him from the rolls and dismiss him from the service. Many contingencies of that kind may arise.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Would not that be entirely within the President's discretion if the bill passed?

Mr. NESMITH. It would not.

Mr. GRIMES. Let me answer the question. He might strike him from the rolls, but he could not remove him as he removed General McClellan from the command of the army of the Potomac. If there had been an act of Congress making General McClellan lieutenant general instead of General Grant he would have been lieutenant general in command of the armies by act of Congress, and not by the appointment of the President of the United States. The President can strike him from the roll, but he cannot detach him, if you pass this law, from having command of the Army.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not agree with the Senator from Iowa or the Senator from Oregon on that subject. The Commander-in-Chief could displace him at any time; could relieve him of his command and put him on trial before a court-martial or before a court of inquiry. The fact that Congress designates this officer as being the commander is no more of a designation than that which is made in the law in regard to a brigadier general or in regard to the Quartermaster General. Have we not provided by law that there shall be one Quartermaster General to have charge of the quartermaster's department? Is it not an occurrence within the knowledge of us all that the Quartermaster General has been sent to remote parts of the country, and the duties of the office devolved upon others? Has it not been so in the commissary's department? And yet the law reads that there shall be one Quartermaster General, one person with the rank of general at the head of that department who is to have charge of that department. Is there any trouble about it practically? Will the Senator from Iowa undertake to say that it is not competent for the President of the United States in his discretion to relieve that Quartermaster General?

Mr. GRIMES. There is no analogy between the cases.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not see why the analogy is not complete. The Quartermaster General has just as supreme control over the quartermaster's department by act of Congress as this bill proposes to give to the lieutenant general as commander of the Army over the Army.

Mr. GRIMES. Show us the law that gives the Quartermaster General that power.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I can refer to the law. I think it will be found so in reference to several of the Departments of the Government.

Mr. NESMITH. I will ask the Senator from Illinois if it is not in the power of the President to make any major general, to say nothing about the rank of lieutenant general, commander of the armies of the United States? If the President already has that power, where is the necessity of repeating it in a law of this kind merely establishing the rank? The President already has the power. General Grant, or any other general who succeeds in obtaining this rank, by virtue of the rank will be entitled to exercise the authority, whether you look to this law or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RICHARDSON called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON (when his name was called) said: Am I at liberty to state the reason for my vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It can be done by unanimous consent. ["No objection!"] The Chair will hear the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, sharing as I do in common with every man in the country an admiration and gratitude for the services of Major General Grant, yet I am by no means certain that this bill does not go, if the amendment is not adopted, further than perhaps it is in our power to go, or, if in our power, further than it is expedient to go. Independent of legislation, it has been a question whether the President could dismiss from the service an officer of the Army. You have by legislation given him that power. If it requires legislation to give the power, it is the function of legislation to take from the Executive the power. The difficulty that I have is not as to General Grant, because I hope he may be selected, and I hope he may be put in command of the Army, but whether you do not take from the President, if you pass this bill as it stands, a power which he ought to have, of dismissing any officer of the Army, particularly in a time like this, who shall in the future prove to be unfit for the particular service. I do not anticipate that that will be the case with General Grant; but still it may be. He is but one of ourselves, human, and he may be found to err in the future. He may lose the confidence of the Army, and if he does it would be very improper that he should continue in the command of the Army. Now, what influences me in the vote which I am about to give, and I submit it to the Senate, is, that perhaps without this amendment you take from the President the power which I think he ought to have, of dismissing whoever he may select, whether it be General Grant or anybody else; and I think so for this reason: assuming the right of Congress to give the power to dismiss, it necessarily carries with it the other power, the power in Congress to take away the right to dismiss. The language of the resolution as it comes from the House of Representatives is:

"And the President is hereby authorized, whenever he shall deem it expedient, to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commander of the Army to be selected during war from among those officers in the military service of the United States, not below the grade of major general, most distinguished for courage, skill, and ability; and who, being commissioned as lieutenant general, shall be authorized, under the direction of the President, to command the armies of the United States."

Now, I should greatly fear whether, if you say that the lieutenant general who is to be appointed is to be by your law authorized to command the armies of the United States, you give or reserve to the President authority to take from him the command merely by the provision that his command is to be under the direction of the President. To direct a commander and to dismiss a commander are entirely different things. If, therefore, you by legislation say that the lieutenant general shall command and put no restraint upon that command except that it is to be under the direction of the President, I submit it is plain that it will not be in the power of the President to take from him that command or to interfere with it in any way except to direct the manner in which the command shall be conducted. Being under that impression, I am obliged most unwillingly to vote in favor of this amendment.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called) said: As unanimous consent was given to the Senator from Maryland to make a remark, I presume the Senate will yield the same privilege to me. I decline to vote on this question for this simple reason that in my capacity as a Senator I will have nothing to do with President-making.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call will proceed. All debate is out of order.

The calling of the roll was then concluded, and the result announced—yeas 25, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Dixon, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, and Wilson—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Conness, Doollittle, Hale, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Richardson, Sherman, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wright—15.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in line eleven, after the word "ability," to strike out the following words:

And who, being commissioned as lieutenant general, shall be authorized, under the direction of the President, to command the armies of the United States; and that we respectfully recommend the appointment of Major General U. S. Grant, of Illinois, for the position of lieutenant general.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is it competent to call for a division of that proposition? It contains two distinct clauses. If so I desire a separate vote on each of those clauses. I desire to retain the last clause of the proposed amendment and to strike out the first clause.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is competent for the Senator to call for a division, or to move an amendment to the committee's amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. In order to raise the question directly, I will move that the amendment of the committee be so amended as to strike out the first clause, retaining the second.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved by the Senator from Ohio that the amendment of the committee be so amended as to strike out from the amendment recommended by the committee the following words:

And who, being commissioned as lieutenant general, shall be authorized, under the direction of the President, to command the armies of the United States.

The question will be on striking out these words. Mr. SHERMAN. My only objection submitting this amendment is to retain the compliment designed by the House of Representatives to General Grant. This is really a compliment and nothing more, since the Senate have by a decided vote taken from the rank of lieutenant general the command which formerly followed that rank in the case of General Scott and also in the case of General Washington; that is, the command of the armies of the United States, under the President. That seems to have taken out of the bill all its vitality except simply the compliment. I wish to retain in this bill the compliment to General Grant, which is nothing more nor less than a recommendation of Congress that General Grant be appointed to this high position. There is only one man who has so distinguished himself in the Army of the United States during this war as to deserve this rank, and I wish to designate that man by an act of Congress, so that it shall be clearly a compliment tendered to General Grant personally. I have no doubt that the President would appoint General Grant if the words were omitted, but I wish to make the compliment marked.

Mr. NESMITH. If the Senator from Ohio will allow me I will ask him if he thinks it is competent for Congress to pass an act designating to the President whom he shall nominate to an office?

Mr. SHERMAN. I say, emphatically, no; Congress has no power to appoint any one; but Congress may request, by a vote, the appointment of a particular person to a particular office. We may in our individual capacities do so. Now here we are passing a compliment to General Grant. There is nothing more nor less in it. You give him by the bill, as it is now emasculated by the Committee on Military Affairs, nothing but a compliment. You give him increased pay, it is true, but you give him no command, no additional rank.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, we do. Is not the rank of lieutenant general an additional rank?

Mr. SHERMAN. What command does it carry by law? None whatever.

Mr. GRIMES. It gives him additional pay.

Mr. SHERMAN. It gives him additional pay, but no additional rank, no right to command. It simply confers on him the title of lieutenant general, and nothing more, without any additional rank.

Mr. NESMITH. I will ask the Senator from Ohio if General Grant would not be entitled to command the armies of the United States if the President appointed him lieutenant general under this act?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will read it to show precisely what it is:

That the grade of lieutenant general be, and the same is hereby, revived in the Army of the United States; and the President is hereby authorized, whenever he shall deem it expedient, to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a lieutenant general, to be selected from among those officers in the military service of the United States, not below the grade of major general, most distinguished for courage, skill, and ability.

This bill does not define his powers or the extent of his command, or what rights are conferred by it. Then the next clause of the bill provides:

And who, being commissioned as lieutenant general, shall be authorized, under the direction of the President, to command the armies of the United States.

That is proposed to be stricken out. The first clause of the House bill gave the rank of lieutenant general; the second clause gave the right to command the armies of the United States; and the third was a petition by Congress to the President to appoint a particular person. The Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate have stricken that all out except a mere titular rank of lieutenant general, without fixing the extent of that command.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator will allow me, does not the very designation of the rank of lieutenant general place him above a major general, which is the highest rank we have now? If the lieutenant general and a major general should meet in one command, would not the lieutenant general be supreme? Suppose we create the rank of captain; does it not follow that that controls the rank of lieutenant? In the same way a lieutenant general controls the rank of major general. It is a perfectly well understood distinction.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then what is the object of striking out? If the legal effect of making him lieutenant general is to give him command of the Army, why do you strike out the very words that make him the commander of your Army? The only object, as I understand, of the vote of the Senate is to take away from him something he would have had under the House bill, but which the Military Committee for some reasons do not propose to give him; that is, the command of the Army. If the rank of lieutenant general carries with it the command of the armies of the United States, why did you strike it out by your vote?

Mr. FESSENDEN. As I voted for it I will answer the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. All I desire is information.

Mr. FESSENDEN. For the simple reason that I do not think it proper to control by act of Congress the President in his unlimited power under the Constitution to be Commander-in-Chief of the Army, to provide by law that another man shall command the Army in the field.

Mr. WILKINSON. It is to be under his direction.

Mr. SHERMAN. The words which the Military Committee propose to strike out do not limit the power of the President.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They do. They provide that the lieutenant general shall command the Army.

Mr. SHERMAN. Under the direction of the President. The President is still Commander-in-Chief.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But the President could not take away the command from him if it was deemed necessary, because it is conferred by Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. If General Grant was appointed lieutenant general under the act of Congress, he might be assigned to duty in the city of New York and a major general allowed to command a particular army in the east, and another in the west, and another in the south. They are all officers under the command of the President. That will be the effect of it if you pass the House bill in the very words in which they send it here. It clearly appears to me to be so. But even if the view taken by Senators is correct, what objection can there be to inserting in this law a designation of the particular officer whom we desire to compliment and elevate to this rank? The words I wish to retain are certainly respectful to the President:

And that we respectfully recommend the appointment of Major General U. S. Grant, of Illinois, for the position of lieutenant general.

Now, sir, I have no doubt General Grant is an unambitious man. I do not believe he desires this position of lieutenant general. I know he did not ask it. I doubt very much whether he desired it. I have some doubts myself whether we ought to confer it until the war closes and until the great hero is designated, if he should be designated in the progress of the war. I have had some doubts about voting for the proposition at all; whether it would not be proper to postpone it until the end of the war; but if we do pass a resolution of this kind, I wish in the resolution to designate the officer, so that he may have the full force and benefit of the compliment; that he may have the vote of both Houses of Congress designating him, as the whole country has designated him, as the man who has won the highest honors of this war. Therefore, if we pass this resolution at all—I shall vote for it—I think we ought to retain this designation of General Grant personally, and make the compliment personal, and not leave it simply to the designation of the President. It is true he may overrule the recommendation of Congress, he may refuse to appoint a lieutenant general at all, or he may designate any one else in spite of our recommendation; but I do not suppose he will do so. The only effect of making this designation is to add to the value of the compliment.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to have the Secretary report the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

The Secretary read the amendment, to strike out the first clause of the amendment, in the following words:

And who, being commissioned as lieutenant general, shall be authorized, under the direction of the President, to command the armies of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee propose to strike out the whole of the last clause of the first section; but the Senator from Ohio, in order to retain a part, proposes to strike out of the amendment the words which have been read.

Mr. HOWE. The amendment would have an effect directly the contrary to what the Senator desires, it seems to me. He proposes to strike out the first clause of the amendment proposed, and that, if the particular amendment carried, would retain that clause in the bill, and would strike out the latter clause, which is the very clause the Senator wishes to retain.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no. If you strike out the first clause you leave the remaining clause; and then the vote can be taken on the recommendation of the committee.

Mr. HOWE. Then the proposition is simply to strike that clause out of the bill, and not to strike out the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I cannot understand the Senator precisely. If a majority of the Senate vote with me in favor of striking out the first portion of the amendment of the committee, as a matter of course that will be stricken out, leaving nothing remaining of that portion of the bill except the compliment to General Grant, and then we can vote to retain that.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator will understand me in a moment. The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee, which is to strike out these two clauses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HOWE. That was the question before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the question now before the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir, that is the question now; I am trying to get at it. The Committee on Military Affairs reported by way of amendment a recommendation to strike out these two clauses. I understand that the Senator from Ohio moves to amend that amendment by striking out from it the first clause, which if it carries will then leave the amendment of the committee to be to strike out these words: "and that we respectfully recommend the appointment of Major General U. S. Grant, of Illinois, for the position of lieutenant general."

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish to appeal to the Senator from Ohio to withdraw his amendment. It places us in a false position to move to strike out those words. Let us take the vote directly, as he first proposed. I do not suppose we should like to record a vote to strike out those words, though I agree entirely with the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection at all to take the vote on the whole.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That will relieve it of all complication.

Mr. SHERMAN. I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment being withdrawn, the question recurs on the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I wish to say one word upon the amendment proposed by the committee as it now stands. I expected, I wished, I could even have hoped that the Senate would not concur in the amendment; but by the indications given by the last vote, I suppose I must be prepared to anticipate that the Senate will concur, and yet I shall regret it extremely. Whether it was or was not wise to bring forward this measure at this time, and to vest in the President of the United States the power to grant such a commission as is here contemplated, we are not called upon now to discuss or to consider. The measure is here, and we must act upon it. The proposition would never have been brought forward, I take it, at this time, but for the single fact, to which none of us can shut our eyes, that there was just one general in the armies of the United States who had rendered such distinguished services, who had achieved such brilliant deeds, deeds not merely brilliant, but deeds of such decided and transcendent value to the whole country, that the eyes of the whole country had been fixed unalterably upon the transcendent merits of that man, and desired to confer upon him some decided and unmistakable evidence of that public appreciation. It is to that cause that is to be attributed the bringing forward of this measure at this time.

Does the cause exist? Is there any such general? No one controverts it here. No one says here or elsewhere but that there is a general worthy to wear this title and to adopt this rank and to fill this command to-day.

If we make a lieutenant general at all it seems to me we should make him for some other purpose than merely to wear a new title or to draw an additional sum from the Treasury. We can dispose of all the money we can collect without making a lieutenant general, and we can find objects enough throughout the country to wear all the titles we see fit to confer, and who are good for nothing else but to wear titles and to absorb money. General Grant, to my understanding, has proved himself capable of doing something different from either of these. He has proved himself capable of filling commands the highest; and it is because he has that it is proposed to confer this title and this command upon him.

Now, Mr. President, there are those in the Senate who say that they are entirely willing to see the pay and the title conferred upon General Grant, but they hesitate about expressing a wish to see the command of the Army conferred upon him. I put it to every Senator here to say if he would deem it an honor conferred upon him to have his Government say that he had earned a different title from that which he now bears, and was entitled to more pay, but was not entitled to any higher trust. I put it to the Senate if it would not be a rebuke and a reproach to General Grant, rather than a compliment or an act of justice, to say, "Sir, you have done well; you have won from the rebellion an empire; we are grateful to you; you have led our armies further and faster and surer than any other man toward victory; we are grateful for this; we will give you a new title; we will give you additional pay; but we dare not trust you with any additional command; we will give you a title which signifies in itself the highest command in the Army; we will give you the highest pay given to any officer in the Army; but we will not trust you with the highest command." I put it to the Senate if that is not anything but a compliment; I put it to the Senate if that is not a distinct rebuke and a reproach.

But it is said that to do this thing transcends the power of the Legislature. I conceive that the Legislature has already set us a precedent upon this very subject. I have before me the original act which created the rank of lieutenant general; I read from the fifth section of it:

"That whenever the President shall deem it expedient, he is hereby empowered to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commander of the Army," * * * "who, being commissioned as lieutenant general, may be authorized to command the armies of the United States," &c.

This is no new precedent; and I did not understand the force of the answer made to the question put by the Senator from Ohio. It is said here by one portion of those who insist upon striking out these provisions, that without them the lieutenant general will ex officio have command of the armies of the United States. The Senator from Ohio then put the question: why do you wish to strike out these words? I do not understand what answer is made to that. If it be the direct effect of creating the grade of lieutenant general and filling it to give the lieutenant general the command of the armies then the insertion of these words effects nothing whatever.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will answer the Senator's question. It is to leave with the President the power of depriving him of the command of the Army, if he sees fit so to do, at any moment.

Mr. HOWE. I ask again how he gets command of the Army. We make him a lieutenant general. That does or does not give him command of the Army. The Senator says it does give him command of the Army.

Mr. FESSENDEN. With these words in it does.

Mr. HOWE. But without these words?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It does of necessity because he is the highest officer. Nobody else is in command while he is present.

Mr. GRIMES. Was not General Scott in command of the Army when lieutenant general?

Mr. WILSON. It puts him over everybody else.

Mr. HOWE. The rank of lieutenant general does or does not carry with it the authority to command the armies of the United States. If it does carry with it that authority, these words carry with it no more than that authority, and the President's power over the lieutenant general, it seems to me, remains just as absolute and as unconditional as it is over every other officer. He is still liable to be dealt with by military law, and can be suspended from command just the same as any other officer can.

Mr. GRIMES. Let me say to the Senator what I understand the law is. If the President of the United States details or directs a lieutenant general to go into the field, nobody can command him; the lieutenant general is entitled to the command; but, without the provision which gives him the command, the lieutenant general can be left in retirement by the President, and a major general can be put in command of the Army, just exactly as it was in the case of General Scott. The Senator has read the law under which General Washington was made a lieutenant general, but he has failed to read to us the law under which General Scott was made a lieutenant general. That did not include any of the provisions which the Committee on Military Affairs have very properly proposed to strike out of this bill which has been sent from the House of Representatives, and did not confer the rank which it is attempted here to confer upon General Grant in the first instance. Under that General Scott could be sent to the field and no other person could be put in command over him. If they saw fit to retain him here he would be in command of the armies of the United States; or they could use some other person's services in the place of General Scott. That is all that I as a member of the Senate want to reserve to the President the right to do in this instance.

Mr. HOWE. I am not here to trench at all upon the constitutional powers of the President; but I do oppose, I do resist, and will resist so far as I can, the idea of making officers with nothing to do, of making officers without office, or without any authority. When you make a brigadier general you make him for the purpose of commanding a brigade. When you make a colonel you make him for the purpose of commanding a regiment. But because you make them for this purpose it does not repeal the power of the President to relieve them from their commands or dismiss them from their offices. When you make a lieutenant general you make him to command the armies of the United States, and he is no more independent of the President than another officer under him. I must insist on that. I cannot see how, because you designate the authority which the lieutenant general is to fill you therefore take away from the President the power to relieve him from that authority. I feel, as I said in the outset, that the striking out of this clause is really a reproach to this gallant officer. I dislike extremely to see the words go out of the bill.

Mr. WILSON. I am sure, Mr. President, that the Senator from Wisconsin is altogether mistaken in the views he has expressed. There is no reproach intended, and there certainly is no reproach in the amendments themselves. I hope that the amendments proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs will be accepted by the Senate, for the bill as thus amended makes a lieutenant general who commands the armies of the United States under the authority of the President. Full, ample, and complete authority is given. If General Grant should be appointed—and everybody knows that he will be appointed—

Mr. WILKINSON. Then why not say so?

Mr. WILSON. Why should you say so? Why is it proper for the Congress of the United States to tell the President whom he shall nominate? There is an impropriety in it, if not an indecency in it toward the President. There is certainly an impropriety toward the Senate of the United States that is to pass upon the nomination in putting into the act a declaration that a certain man is recommended for the appointment. Everybody knows that the country expects that General Grant will be appointed. We expect it. The President expects it. The President is willing and anxious to do it; he intends to do it. Then why should we put this provision in this act? Why not trust the President? Why not trust the man who has stood firmly by General Grant? If General Grant should be appointed, as he will be appointed, there will be no man in America who can give an order to him but the President of the United States. General Halleck could not give him an order; nobody could give him an order. General Halleck cannot command the armies with a lieutenant general in the field. The President of the United States had no authority to make a junior brigadier or major general command a senior brigadier or major general until we gave him that authority nearly two years ago. Now the President has authority when officers meet in the field to designate which officer of the same rank shall command, but he cannot make a brigadier general command a major general. The President of the United States cannot put any major general under the command of a brigadier general. There is no law in the country authorizing him to do it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question, so that we may understand this matter. Suppose the amendments of the Committee on Military Affairs be adopted and the bill is passed and General Grant is made a lieutenant general and is in the field as such, can General Halleck command him?

Mr. WILSON. No, sir; no, sir; and no other man in the country can command him but the President of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts does not extend to the amendment, but simply extends to the whole bill, because his argument will defeat the whole bill.

Mr. WILSON. My argument is that the bill as proposed to be amended by the Military Committee is framed in the proper manner and uses the proper language. By it the authority of the Executive is not trenching upon; the proprieties in regard to the Senate are not interfered with; and the bill in that form makes a lieutenant general who cannot be commanded by anybody but the President. He will be the commander of the Army unless the President of the United States chooses to set him aside and send him to some special command, retire him; in other words, disgrace him. The bill as proposed to be amended gives him the entire power, under the President of the United States, to command the armies, and the President has not the power to put any major general over him.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Senator from Massachusetts propose to make a lieutenant general whom the President may at any time dishonor and displace by putting a major general in command over him? If so, I would not vote for such an honor as that.

Mr. WILSON. He cannot do it.

Mr. SHERMAN. If we take the bill precisely as it is reported by the Military Committee will it be within the power of the President to place in power over General Grant a major general?

Mr. WILSON. No, sir; the President cannot put a major general over the lieutenant general. He cannot put an officer of inferior grade over an officer of superior grade, and I would not vote for a bill giving him that power.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then if we take the bill as it comes from the House of Representatives will it not stand precisely as the Senator says it ought to stand? I see no distinction.

Mr. WILSON. We understood that it did not do so, that it forced an officer upon the President, and that the language in which it was couched was improper, and that it ought not to be passed in that form; but by this bill as we propose to amend it we make him the first military officer in the country.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me to make an inquiry of him?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to know, if the Senator can give me the information, if the bill as reported from the Military Committee conforms to the bills that were passed when Washington was made a lieutenant general and when the same rank was conferred on General Scott, or whether the House bill conforms to them or either of them?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I can inform my colleague, if the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me to do so. I have before me the statute of 1798 that authorized the appointment of a lieutenant general, and this resolution as it passed the House of Representatives is drawn in strict conformity with it. I will read it:

"That whenever the President shall deem it expedient he is hereby empowered to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commander of the army which may be raised by virtue of this act, and who being commissioned."

"That is the language of this bill—

"and who being commissioned as lieutenant general may be authorized to command the armies of the United States."

This bill as it passed the House of Representatives was modeled, as near as it could be to adapt it to the present condition of things, upon the law passed in 1798 and the resolution in regard to General Scott.

Mr. JOHNSON. Permit me to ask the Senator a question. Is he perfectly certain that this bill as it passed the House of Representatives and now before us is identical with the resolution passed in 1798?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think in principle it is identical.

Mr. JOHNSON. The language of the act of 1798 is "may be authorized;" this is "shall."

Mr. TRUMBULL. "Who, being commissioned as lieutenant general, shall be authorized, under the direction of the President," is the language of this bill. I do not think that alters it at all. Whether the language is "shall be authorized, under the direction of the President," or "may be authorized," makes no difference. The words "under the direction of the President," are left out in the act of 1798. They are inserted in this House bill, and I think the word "may" and the word "shall" would have the same meaning in that sentence. I am sure that the Senator from Maryland is too good a lawyer not to know that it would not be changed by the changing of those words in that connection and in connection with the other words which are inserted.

Now, sir, the resolution under which Major General Scott was appointed a lieutenant general did not authorize the creation of a lieutenant general except by brevet. It was a different thing entirely. I will read that resolution:

"That the grade of lieutenant general be, and the same is hereby, revived in the Army of the United States, in order that when, in the opinion of the President and Senate, it shall be deemed proper to acknowledge eminent services of a major general of the Army in the late war with Mexico, in the mode already provided for in subordinate grades, the grade of lieutenant general may be specially conferred by brevet, and by brevet only, to take rank from the date of such service or services: Provided, however, That when the said grade of lieutenant general by brevet shall have once been filled, and have become vacant, this joint resolution shall thereafter expire and be of no effect."

That was the joint resolution under which General Scott was breveted a lieutenant general. It will be found on examination that the words are not identical, as the Senator from Maryland says; but in principle there is no difference, I venture to say, between the bill as it passed the House of Representatives and the act of 1798, under which General Washington was appointed lieutenant general. I have that appointment before me. The appointment of General Washington at that time was, if possible, broader than the law. I do not think it could give any additional power; but it shows how the men of that day understood the Constitution and the authority of Congress to provide by law for a commander of the Army. John Adams, then the President of the United States, in making the nomination to the Senate used this language:

"I nominate George Washington, of Mount Vernon, to be Lieutenant General and Commander-in-Chief of all the armies raised or to be raised in the United States."

That was the communication sent by President Adams to the Senate when General Washington was nominated for lieutenant general; and it will be observed that by the act of 1798 it was declared that the person appointed lieutenant general should be commander of the army "which may be raised by virtue of this act, and who being commissioned as lieutenant general may be authorized to command the armies of the United States, and shall be entitled to the following pay," &c.

"May be authorized" was the language of that act, and "shall be authorized under the direction of the President" the language of this. The Senator from Maryland undertakes to draw a distinction. I cannot see it. If a person may be authorized to command the armies of the United States by the act of 1798, does he get any greater power when the act of 1864 says he "shall be authorized to command under the direction of the President?" It is all left to the President. He cannot have this authority without the President's direction.

Now one of two things is true in regard to this bill. If, as the Senator from Massachusetts says, when the bill is amended as the Committee on Military Affairs propose to amend it, General Grant will still as lieutenant general have a right to command all the armies of the United States, then leaving the words in does not alter it at all. The very fact of your making a lieutenant general, according to the Senator's argument, places him above every other officer in the Army of the United States, and the President has no power to put any other officer over him. The Senator asserts that. If that be so, the House bill does no more. Why then amend it? I am rather inclined to think that the Senator is right; that it will come to that; because I observe that this joint resolution declares that "the grade of lieutenant general be and the same is hereby revived." How is it revived? It is revived as it once existed according to the acts of the Congress of the United States, that is, the act of 1798. We revive that act. That act declares that he may be commander of all the armies.

Mr. FESSENDEN. "The grade is hereby revived." We do not revive the act, but the grade.

Mr. TRUMBULL. "The grade is hereby revived in the Army of the United States." If the grade is revived it is revived with its incidents, probably; but I will not undertake to say, and I think it is much safer to leave the words in the resolution as it stood when it came from the House of Representatives.

Mr. NESMITH. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois if the word is "may" or "shall" in the act of 1798.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is "may." I have stated it two or three times; but the construction of those words, in the same connection, is precisely the same.

Mr. NESMITH. Very well; then why not use the same word here?

Mr. TRUMBULL. For myself I have no sort of objection to putting in the word "may" here. I am perfectly willing to strike out the words "shall, under the direction of the President," and to insert the word "may," if that will satisfy my friend from Oregon and my friend from Maryland. If we can have their votes to retain this proposition, I, for one, will agree to strike out "shall" and insert "may," and also to strike out the words "under the direction of the President," and let it read exactly like the act of 1798. Let us all harmonize then upon that, if that will satisfy gentlemen, and not dispute about words.

Mr. GRIMES. Would you not be content with the act of 1847?

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir; I would not be content with the act of 1847. There is no act of 1847 that I know of in regard to this matter. I suppose the Senator alludes to the act authorizing the brevet rank of lieutenant general to be conferred on General Scott.

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir; I will not vote for empty honors for General Grant. General Grant has achieved a reputation for himself independent of Congress, and it is not in our power to take it away. He has won it by his bravery and skill and daring at the head of our armies. He has led them to victory too often to be affected by any resolution that Congress may pass here refusing him a command. I do not think since we have already passed a resolution thanking him for his gallantry that a great deal will be added to his laurels by this resolution as the Military Committee have reported it—the mere empty honor of the title of lieutenant general. If the revival of the grade does not carry with it any power it simply entitles him to be called lieutenant general, and nothing more.

Now, sir, I think we shall be safe if we follow the precedents of the fathers. I do not think they supposed in 1798 that they were encroaching on the constitutional prerogative of the President, and I trust that the Senate will consider before it strikes out the words which are now under consideration. If it is desirable to change these words to conform to the very language of the very act of 1798, for one I have no objection to it.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I am surprised to hear Senators talk about degrading General Grant. We have seventy major generals and we propose to make a lieutenant general who shall rank all these major generals; and by the consent of the country, by the consent of Congress, by the intention of the President, without opposition from any quarter, it is proposed to single out General Grant and make him a lieutenant general. That puts him over every officer and every soldier in the armies of the United States, and gives $1,100 a month as compensation—thirteen or fourteen thousand dollars a year. He is to be selected from among all the major generals of the regular or volunteer forces of the country, made a lieutenant general ranking everybody in the country, and no man can be put by the President over him, and any order he receives must be from the President of the United States. But because we want to put this bill in proper form, to couch it in proper language, it is said here on the floor of the Senate that there is a disposition to degrade General Grant. Sir, I know that the Committee on Military Affairs had no desire to degrade General Grant. Every member of that committee entertains for General Grant, and they have all expressed that opinion, profound respect, admiration and gratitude for past services, and a willingness to give him the honors of the country, and to place him in a position to command the armies of the country. I am sure I speak the sentiments of every member of that committee when I make this declaration.

I therefore express the hope that we shall amend the bill as proposed, and the hope that the other House will concur in the amendments, and that the bill thus amended will become the law of the land, that the President of the United States will promptly nominate General Grant, that the Senate will unanimously confirm him, that he will take the place the law will give him at the head of the military forces of the United States, and that in the future as in the past he will win victories for the Republic.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. President, I have a very few words to say in reference to this question, and I propose to confine them principally in reply to the remarks that have fallen from the Senator from Massachusetts. The bill as it came from the House of Representatives so far as regards the point we are now discussing conforms to the act that was passed in 1798; and I know therefore no reason why we should amend it in the particulars reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

If this is to be a mere empty honor conferred on General Grant I am not so anxious to have the bill passed. In order that we may make it available to the country I desire to see somebody in command of our armies who will concentrate them. I believe that if General Grant shall be nominated and placed in command he will concentrate our forces and make them available, as he has made his army in the West available, and strike blows and strike them fast. I want to get done with this thing. I want to have it over. We have armies enough in the field if we had them concentrated now to soon end it. I desire to see somebody in command of our armies who will concentrate our forces and not scatter them from Maine to the Rio Grande, and expect small bodies of men to meet the combined forces of an adversary who combines his forces on a given point.

It is for that reason that I desire to pass this bill. I think General Grant has won the distinction that is sought to be conferred upon him. So far as the amendments proposed by the Senate committee are concerned, they have this effect: while General Grant may be made lieutenant general, if he is not by virtue of that appointment placed in command of our armies subordinate only to the President of the United States, if he is sent off into a particular department, into the department of Texas or Arkansas or Mississippi, where, if the Senator from Massachusetts is right, no other general in the Army could command him, some other general in the Army could command all the other departments; and General Grant, although he might be lieutenant general, would only command the department in which he was placed. It is for the very purpose of placing him in command of all the departments that I desire to see the bill as it came from the House of Representatives in this particular retained; and it is for this reason that I voted against the first proposition made by the Military Committee to amend the House bill.

The Senator from Massachusetts has stated, and stated correctly, as I think, that it is true General Grant, if a lieutenant general, would outrank all the other officers of the Army; but while thus outranking them, if he shall be placed in command of a department and not in command of the whole, a major general may command all the other departments, but he cannot command the lieutenant general in the particular department that is set apart for him.

Mr. HOWARD. I should not, sir, by my silence, suffer it to be inferred that the Committee on Military Affairs were perfectly unanimous in suggesting the amendments contained in the bill reported by them. They were not unanimous. There was at least one dissenting member, and that was myself. I could see no propriety in making these amendments.

As I understand the bill as it came from the House of Representatives it only creates a general who shall be second in command to the Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the United States; and although I am not sure that the amendment suggested by the committee, adding the words "lieutenant general," and striking out the words "commander of the Army," does not effect the same end, still I am satisfied, for one, that we had better not, if we can avoid it, suffer this bill to go back to the House of Representatives to become there the theme of discussion hereafter. That House, like this, has much other business of great importance on its hands, and unless there be some reason more weighty than any I have heard here for sending it back I shall vote against amending it.

I do not regard the amendment which has been concurred in by the Senate, striking out the words "commander of the Army," as of any importance whatever. I look to the subsequent clause of the bill which is also recommended to be stricken out by the committee reading as follows, referring to the lieutenant general:

"Who being commissioned as lieutenant general shall be authorized under the direction of the President to command the armies of the United States."

If that language be tantamount to the mere expression "lieutenant general" then there is no necessity for striking it out, and we may as well save the time and attention of the House of Representatives from a reconsideration of this question.

The objection is raised to the bill as it come from the House of Representatives, that it recommends to the President the appointment of Major General Grant as a fit person to occupy the position of lieutenant general created by the bill; and it is said by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs that this is both an indelicacy in reference to the President and an impropriety in reference to ourselves, an "indecentry."

Mr. WILSON. In regard to the President.

Mr. HOWARD. I perhaps do not state the precise language of the chairman on that subject. But, sir, I do not so regard it. It seems to me this comment of the Senator from Massachusetts contains in itself a refinement of delicacy that is unintelligible to many others; it certainly is to me. Is it an indelicacy for the Senate of the United States respectfully to recommend to the President the appointment of a man who from the beginning of this contest to the present time has given the highest evidences of military talent and a heroic genius such as raised him, in my judgment, far above even the expectations of nine tenths of the other commanders in the field? Is it an indelicacy in us to ask that the armies of the United States may have the benefit of the talents of that general who has already distinguished his career by the capture of more than one hundred thousand prisoners and a vast amount of artillery, who has gained for us the Mississippi river, given us command of it, and enabled our commerce to float safely up it and down it? Is it an indelicacy in us, although we may have possibly to judge upon his fitness when he shall be nominated to this place, to ask that a man of this character be appointed lieutenant general to command the armies of the United States?

Sir, I think it is not indelicate. I think it is necessary. I think the President of the United States can have no ground whatever to complain either of indelicacy or indecency on the part of the Senate in making this respectful request to him. Give us, sir, a live general; give us some man who has talent, who has character and force enough within him to give a successful direction to the enthusiasm of the armies of the United States, and who will, if properly supported here, give us victory even upon the Rappahannock, and not let us be dragging along under the influences such as have presided over the army of the Potomac for these last many tedious and weary months—an army oscillating alternately between the Rappahannock and the Potomac, defeated to-day and hardly successful to-morrow, with its commanders changed almost as frequently as the moon changes its face. Sir, for one I am tired of this; and I tell you and I tell Senators here that the country is getting weary of it, and unless we do something in order to remedy this evil and do it speedily, we shall hear such clamors from our constituents as we have never heard thus far. I go for retaining the bill in all its forms and expressions as it came from the House of Representatives.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. With the permission of the Senate for a very few moments, I will endeavor to state what is the present position of the question.

The House of Representatives passed a joint resolution creating the rank of lieutenant general and making him, in the terms of the resolution, the commander-in-chief of the armies of the United States, and recommending to the President the appointment of General Grant to that office. That resolution when it came up to the Senate was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The committee proposed two amendments, going to the points, first, whether we should not make him by law commander-in-chief of the armies of the United States, and, secondly, that we should not by law of Congress recommend any man for appointment by the President.

In reference to the first one of these amendments I have only to say that I have no doubt if the bill shall pass General Grant will be appointed the lieutenant general. I hope so. I think that so far in the history of this rebellion he has shown himself the successful hero; but "let not him that girdeth on his harness boast himself as he that putteth it off." Is it proper that the Senate of the United States shall make a commander of the armies of the United States—a commander over whom the President would have no power? Under the Constitution of the United States the President himself is the Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the United States. You now propose by law to create the office of commander and say he shall command your armies. What power will the President have over him? It may at least be doubtful whether he is not made commander forever, and whether, instead of a republican general, he is not clothed with the powers of a Roman dictator. I am unwilling to do any such thing.

The course of the debate seems to indicate that the Military Committee are opposed to General Grant and to the appointment of General Grant, and that they do not recognize his transcendent services. Nothing is further from the truth. We wish to compliment General Grant and hope he may be appointed. We wish to compliment him by the creation of this grade of lieutenant general; nor can we see that there is any possible disparagement in that. What is the law on that subject? There is no kind of doubt about it. Under the Army regulations prior to the rebellion officers commanded when they were thrown together according to seniority; that is, the oldest officer commanded all junior officers.

Under the law of 1862 the President of the United States was authorized to assign officers of equal rank, the one to command the other, and so it stands to-day. But if General Grant is appointed lieutenant general there can be no officer of equal rank, and consequently no man can command him; but the President of the United States has a right to dispose of him at any moment under the amendment of the committee, and that right he should have. We should never for a single moment deprive the President of the power to say who shall command the armies of the United States, for the Constitution makes him the Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the United States. Even if we were disposed to do it, I should doubt the power and much more the expediency of any such legislation.

Another provision of the House bill was to recommend by act of Congress the appointment of General Grant. I have no objection to that appointment; Congress has no objection to it; but is it dignified in the Congress of the United States to recommend to the President by an act of Congress whom he shall appoint to office? Under the Constitution he nominates officers to us for confirmation, and his duty there ends and ours begins. But shall we anticipate that duty by saying to him in advance whom he shall appoint to command the armies of the United States? I, for one, am unwilling to do it. It does not comport with the dignity of the Congress of the United States to engage in any such huckstering for office. So it seems to me.

But, Mr. President, we are told there are precedents, and high precedents, for that which is asked in reference to General Grant. The act creating the office of lieutenant general and making General Washington the commander-in-chief of the armies was conferred under far different circumstances. He had been tried in the fires of the seven years' conflict of the Revolution prior to conferring that rank upon him. He had been tried as the Chief Magistrate of the nation for eight years prior to conferring that rank. He was an exceptional case in the history of the country, in the history of the world, in the providence of God, and I might be willing to confer that power upon him which I would not confer this day upon any living man upon the earth. Congress then forbore to recommend this mode. They left out this recommendation which the House put in their joint resolution. How did that amendment get into the House joint resolution? It was not in the original bill; it was not reported by the Military Committee of the House; but it was put in as an amendment in the House of Representatives in Committee of the Whole. It has not had the sanction of any committee of even the other House; and we are asked to-day to descend from our high place and the pride of our position to become legislative recommenders for office to the President of the United States. There is, as the Senator from Massachusetts has well said, as it seems to me, an indelicacy in it. To-day we recommend the appointment of General Grant. He is sent in for confirmation. To-morrow we believe he should not be confirmed. Our hands are tied, for the President turns upon us and says, "Here by a solemn act of Congress you have requested me to appoint this man to office."

I, for one, will have neither part nor parcel in any such legislation as this. Is it not enough to follow the precedent in the case of General Scott, where the rank was not conferred, but simply the power given to confer a brevet rank? Does General Scott stand lower in the history of this country than General Grant does? What satisfied General Scott and his friends in 1847, it seems to me, is no empty compliment to General Grant to-day; and yet in this resolution the House have passed over the precedent in the case of General Scott and gone back to the precedent in the case of General Washington. General Scott, when this rank was conferred by brevet, not by an act of Congress, felt honored and complimented. The whole country felt that it was a just tribute of a great nation's gratitude and affection and confidence in that great man. And who was General Scott? Was he disparaged by the passage of this resolution that we are told is a reflection on the great military talent and achievements of General Grant? Sir, the history of the Niagara campaign, when he first made his name familiar to the American people, at Lundy's Lane and at Queenstown Heights, and the triumphant close of the Mexican war, marked him as one of the grandest captains of the age and the world. He was not complimented by an act of Congress making him lieutenant general and commander of the armies. He was not complimented by an act of Congress requesting his appointment as lieutenant general; but simply a law was passed authorizing the President to confer by brevet rank this honor upon General Scott.

Now, sir, it does seem to me perfectly apparent that the report of the Committee on Military Affairs should be adopted, and that it is all that should be required. We should not in advance tell the President who he shall appoint. I have no doubt he will appoint General Grant, and I should rejoice at the appointment; but I am unwilling to pass an act of Congress recommending him for it. I have no doubt he will be placed by military law and usage in the command of the Army of the United States; but I am not willing to tie the hands of the President and say he shall not displace him the very first moment he finds him incompetent to the task imposed upon him.

I am not willing that this discussion shall assume the shape that all those who sustain the report of the committee are necessarily opposed to General Grant. There was no such feeling in the committee. We wished to compliment General Grant according to the legislative precedents heretofore established. We wished to compliment General Grant, always reserving our own proper self-respect and the dignity of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. NESMITH. It is perhaps proper that I should join in the declarations which have been made by members of the Military Committee in relation to the feeling of the committee at the time this bill was pending before them. There was no disparaging remark made there toward General Grant; neither was there any intention manifested to deprive him of any honor. As I took the initiative before the committee in suggesting the amendments which have been reported, it is perhaps proper that I should make this statement. I had no intention to offer any indignity to General Grant; neither have I any intention of offering him any now when I advocate the adoption of the amendments proposed by the Military Committee.

This has been constantly treated as a resolution. It is a bill; it will be, when passed, an act of Congress; but whether it were a bill or a resolution, this Congress could do nothing derogating from the great attainments of General Grant. General Grant's reputation rests upon something higher than mere acts of Congress. Congress can neither confer honor upon him nor deprive him of honor by the mere passage of acts here. His own acts have been such as to commend themselves to the country, and I have no doubt that if we pass this act with the amendments of the Military Committee the President will recognize what is the universal expression of the country and appoint him to the office. But while I so believe, and while as an individual I would to-day sign a petition to the President to appoint General Grant lieutenant general, I would not in my capacity as legislator incorporate that recommendation in a bill when we are only a coördinate branch of the Government. Every bill requires the sanction of the President of the United States. Now, suppose the President of the United States should be impressed with the propriety of creating the rank of lieutenant general, and at the same time should be impressed with what I conceive would be equally a matter of propriety, that the Congress of the United States had no right to encroach on his executive authority by designating in a bill the person whom he should nominate to fill that office, would it not be clearly his duty (while he was in favor of creating the rank) to veto the bill as an encroachment upon executive power?

I appreciate the services of General Grant; I am anxious for the passage of the bill, and I am anxious that General Grant shall have the appointment. There is no honor that I would not confer upon him, as I expect myself to vote for him for President of the United States; and being willing to cast a vote of that kind I should not be willing to do anything here to-day which tended to degrade him. This talk about degradation is mere talk; there is no point in it. The facts are, as has been ably demonstrated by the Senator from Indiana, that other officers who have been appointed under previous acts or resolutions of Congress were not designated in those acts or resolutions, and it was not considered as derogating anything from their character or their reputation, because there was no such intention.

We pledge ourselves by the passage of this bill to the confirmation of a man in advance of his nomination. Suppose that between the time of the passage of this bill and the time when it receives the executive sanction, or before the nomination is sent to the Senate, General Grant should do something which rendered it clearly proper that he should not be confirmed, we shall have placed ourselves in the position of having determined in advance that he should be appointed, and then in the end be compelled to turn around and vote against his confirmation. There is another consideration. General Grant is a man occupying a very distinguished position in this country. If he is appointed his nomination is to come before the Senate in executive session. You now thrust him before the Senate in open session. Suppose that some gentleman here—which I do not apprehend is the fact—should entertain objections to General Grant's appointment, it would scarcely be proper in open session in advance of his nomination to discuss that question. I say no Senator would like under the circumstances to discuss openly a question around which is thrown all the sacredness of secrecy, and matters which every Senator has a right to divulge in secret session there would be an impropriety in his alluding to or discussing in open session.

As I stated before, Mr. President, I have no desire to detain the Senate on this question. I shall vote for the bill establishing the rank of lieutenant general, but I shall not vote for any bill which makes him permanently commander of the Army; neither will I vote for any bill designating the person who is to fill that high place.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I have listened to this debate with great interest, and as far as I can understand the views of Senators all agree in the purpose and object of this legislation. All agree that there ought to be a lieutenant general with the grade, the rank, and the power of a lieutenant general, and all agree that General Grant is the man for the place.

Now, Mr. President, all the question that arises is the question of arriving at this result. For myself, I am very frank to say that I would not vote for a bill creating the rank of lieutenant general now were it not for the express purpose of conferring that grade upon General Grant. I would not create such an office now but for the purpose of putting General Grant into it. The question, therefore, arises whether, because in the act creating the office Congress chooses to express its opinion upon the fitness of General Grant for the office which it creates there is anything improper, anything disrespectful to the President, or anything undignified so far as we ourselves are concerned?

I do not see it in the light in which some Senators see it, or I should doubtless vote as I suppose they will vote on this question. I do not believe that it is unconstitutional for us to express our opinion upon a military officer, and to say in the expression of that opinion that we believe he is the officer who should be appointed to fill a rank which we ourselves are about to create. There is nothing in the language which is disrespectful to the President. It is barely the expression of opinion on the part of Congress, and the very terms are used, "we respectfully recommend the appointment of Major General U. S. Grant, of Illinois, for the position" which we now create.

Nor do I look upon it in the light that some gentlemen do, that we as Senators are acting an undignified part in giving our advice, if you please, in advance to an appointment. The Senate of the United States under the Constitution is to advise and consent to every appointment; and what is there improper that the Senate of the United States as a body should express an opinion to the President, and say to him that in their judgment such a person would be a proper person to fill a given office? If we express that opinion it would be nothing more than the Constitution authorizes us to do. Besides, so far from this being expressed with any feeling of opposition to the President or to the power of the President, I believe on the contrary it is in fact and would be received in no such sense whatever. I believe it would be a relief to the President to know the opinion of Congress on a matter so important as this. What subject, I ask, has there been on which there has been so much denunciation of the President as the very question of the men he has made in fact commanders of our armies. When McClellan was called here and made the General-in-Chief of the armies under the President, and now that General Halleck is retained here as General-in-Chief of the armies, what subject is there upon which the President has been, through the country, more criticised, more denounced, if you please, by certain parties than on that subject, and what subject is there upon which the President would be more desirous of having the united expression of both Houses of Congress than on this most important of all questions, who shall command the armies of the United States?

I do not believe it is undignified. I do not believe it is unfriendly toward the President, nor do I believe that it would be accepted in any unfriendly sense. It is no encroachment, it seems to me, and no want of dignity on our part to express frankly in the law itself what we all here express on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. President, my honorable friend from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] it seems to me, has demonstrated, and I have as yet heard no answer to his demonstration, that if the words of this bill are not identical with those of the act of 1798, the powers conferred by that act were the same as are contained in the clause now proposed to be stricken out by the amendment of the Military Committee. By the act of 1798 it was declared by law that the lieutenant general should be the commander of the Army, and may be authorized to command all the forces now raised and hereafter to be raised. The language of this provision sought to be stricken out is that "he shall be authorized." But that word is qualified "under the direction of the President." The old act was "he may be authorized." By whom and under whose direction but under the direction of the President? So it comes to precisely the same thing when you critically look into the language of the act of 1798 and the language contained in this bill as it came from the House of Representatives. He shall command "under the direction of the President." That is precisely what we want, and I, for one, am willing to take the responsibility of saying so.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The Senator will pardon me one moment. That law did not recommend anybody for command.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That I acknowledge. There is nothing contained in that act recommending any particular individual. In this act as it came from the House of Representatives there is a recommendation of General Grant, and I do not think it is unconstitutional for Congress to express its opinion in this way. I do not think it would be regarded as unfriendly to the President, nor do I think that it could by any possibility be accepted by him as unfriendly to him, for the power would certainly remain in him to make the appointment, and when he is appointed the President commands him. He must command "under the direction of the President," and the President can command him in every act, in every military proceeding, in every step he takes. He is still under the command of the President. I do not understand this act to clothe him with power above the President, that is, to make him a dictator and commander above the President, above the Constitution; but a commander under the Constitution and under the direction of the President.

I, for one, feel satisfied that we shall not make a mistake if we say that we create the office of lieutenant general, and that General Grant is the man to fill it. For two years in succession he has done nothing but win victory—from the capture of Fort Donelson, at Grand Gulf, on Black river, at Jackson, around Vicksburg, and last and not least, at the last battles of Chattanooga, where he secured, in my opinion, forever within our military possession Eastern Tennessee. He has gained and earned by two years of continual success this rank and grade, and he is the man whom the war has demonstrated to be the proper man, and which all concede has demonstrated to be the proper man to be next to the President and under the President, the commander-in-chief of our armies. As a friend says, he has won seventeen battles, he has captured one hundred thousand prisoners, he has taken five hundred pieces of artillery, and innumerable thousands of small-arms on all these fields. He has organized victory from the beginning, and I want him in a position where he can organize final victory and bring it to our armies and put an end to this rebellion. I have nothing to do, Mr. President, with the political question which seems to be raised here by our friends SAULSBURY from Delaware, and NESMITH from Oregon. They seem to give out some intimations that this question has something to do with the Presidency.

Mr. NESMITH. I did not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will recollect that it is not in order to refer to a Senator by name.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 38.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I withdraw, then, all I said in that light.

Mr. NESMITH. I made no such suggestion.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It was Mr. SAULSBURY, of Delaware, that made that insinuation, I think.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I do not deem it necessary to disclaim any purpose in what I have said or in what I am about to say to disparage General Grant or the President of the United States. The former has covered himself all over with a renown which the country recognizes. The latter is the President of the United States, and as such is entitled to our respect; and whatever rights may belong to him in that capacity it is our duty and it should be our pleasure to recognize. Nor is it my purpose to reflect upon what has been the conduct of other officers in whose charge our military operations have been conducted. It might be possible, if I was disposed to indulge in any remarks of that description, that whatever faults they may have committed, whatever errors they may have fallen into, might be attributed perhaps to defects in the Executive, interference on the part of the Executive,—not an interference that the Executive thought they had not the right or it was not their duty to make, but an interference that may have been unfortunate, because, as happens no doubt in this case, nobody would be more ready to acknowledge it than the President of the United States. He has not been educated to the military service, and he does not claim to have been born a soldier. He has done the best: he has fulfilled the measure of his ability, and it would be in my judgment an ungracious task if I were to assume it, to call in question at all the propriety of his conduct, at least as things now are. The sole question before the Senate is whether it is proper that the Senate should pass the bill that came from the House of Representatives without the amendments suggested by the military committee.

If I thought by amending this bill in any particular in which we had the authority to pass it there would be by any implication, the most remote, a reflection upon the character and reputation and patriotism and skill of General Grant, I would leave the bill to stand as it is; but for the soul of me—it may be because I am not as enthusiastic naturally, it is not a part of my temper, as other gentlemen, members of the Senate—for the soul of me I am unable to discover how any possible disparagement can be supposed to arise from the amendments contemplated by the committee. Suppose the bill had passed the other House as the Senate committee propose to amend it, and it had come to this House, and had been passed exactly as we propose to amend it, would General Grant have been disparaged then? Everybody will say, certainly not. When would he have been honored? Not by passing the bill, but when the President should have appointed him under the bill a lieutenant general, and he would then have been honored precisely as Major General Scott was honored when he was appointed to the brevet rank of lieutenant general under the resolution of 1855, and precisely as the Government of the United States and the people of the United States tried to honor more than he had honored himself, Washington, when Washington was appointed a lieutenant general under the act of 1798. And because we propose to alter this bill so as to put it in the shape in which there may be conferred, if the Executive shall think proper to confer it, an honor upon General Grant precisely under the same circumstances in which a like honor was conferred upon Scott and upon Washington, is it to be supposed, can the most sensitive when he throws aside the peculiar and acute sensitiveness of the moment imagine, that any reflection will be cast upon the conduct of General Grant?

Having said so much, Mr. President, I proceed to answer very briefly the suggestion which fell from the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee, [Mr. TRUMBULL.] He did me the favor to intimate that I was too good a lawyer to place any other construction upon the words to be found in the act of 1798, as compared with those to be found in the bill upon your table, than the one which he gave to them. I must run the hazard of forfeiting in this particular instance the estimate which the learned Senator thought proper to place upon whatever legal ability I may have, by saying that I cannot put the same interpretation upon those words; and if I had designed to couch the bill upon your table so as to render it more imperative, so as to give to it a different effect from that which it would have if it was drafted in the words of the act of 1798, I would have used the words which are to be found in the bill upon your table. What are they? The President of the United States is to select from the major generals most distinguished for courage, skill, and ability one who, "being commissioned as lieutenant general, shall be authorized, under the direction of the President, to command the armies of the United States."

My friend the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary tells us that the word "shall" there is synonymous with the word "may" used in the act of 1798. There are, I know, every lawyer knows it, every intelligent and educated man knows it, various occasions in which the word "may" is to be construed "shall;" but that depends upon the subject-matter; that depends upon the context. If the thing to be done is provided for so as to make it a clear and imperative duty then it often happens that the word "may" is equally imperative with the word "shall," but not because the word "may" standing by itself means the same thing with the word "shall," or because the word "may" standing in connection with some subject other than that which becomes an imperative duty is equivalent to the word "shall."

Now, sir, what is the object that Congress has, or is supposed to have, according to the interpretation given to the word "shall," as it is here found, by the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee? The object is to appoint a lieutenant general. What for? To supersede the President of the United States? Certainly not; because the Constitution of the United States would render any act of that description upon our part wholly nugatory. The Constitution of the United States provides, as against Congress, that the President "shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States." Then it is not the purpose by this bill to constitute a lieutenant general in order that he may interfere in any way with the paramount authority of the President to command the armies of the United States, paramount to the legislative power, and to any other power known to the Constitution. It is intended to do something else. It is intended to create an officer who is to be, in that respect at least, subordinate to the President. How subordinate?

As I stated when I was up before, it was for a long time a question of doubt, and is still considered as a question of doubt, irrespective of legislation, whether the President of the United States, merely because he is as President Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the United States, has a right by his own mere will to dismiss a military officer without trial. I do not speak from any distinct recollection now of any particular case; but there are one or two decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and more to be found in elementary writers upon the Constitution of the United States, in which that power has been very seriously questioned; but as crimes against the United States may be punished under laws which Congress may think proper to adopt, and as it is within the province of legislative power to say when a man shall forfeit an office the tenure of which is not secured by constitutional provision, it has been held, and you have acted on that construction, that it is competent for Congress by legislation to provide that the President of the United States may dismiss an officer. If not saying so that power would be a doubtful one, if it becomes a clear one only because you do say so, it follows as equally clear that if you say any particular officer shall command the armies of the United States you take from the President the power to interfere with him. He can interfere because as the President of the United States he is ex officio Commander-in-Chief, but how interfere? Only interfere by taking away from him the particular command, by going into the field in person, directing all the military movements himself; and by doing so, being chief in command under the Constitution, all subordinate authority must submit to him.

Now, what do you say by this provision? Appoint him, and, being appointed, you tell the President when he appoints him that he shall command, or "shall be authorized, under the direction of the President, to command the armies of the United States." To what do the words, "the direction of the President," as these words are there used, refer? Do they refer to the incidents connected with the office itself? Not as I understand them. They mean only that the President may direct the movements of this lieutenant general, tell him where he shall go and where he shall not go, what he may do and what he may not do; but he cannot interfere with him as lieutenant general. There he will remain without any responsibility, as far as the mere office is concerned, to the President or to the Government of the United States until the law shall be repealed.

My friend from Illinois maintains that these words mean only what was meant by what he supposes to be the synonymous phraseology of the act of 1798. A word or two on that point. The language of the bill, as it came from the House of Representatives, is that the general selected "shall be authorized, under the direction of the President, to command the armies of the United States." The language of the provision in the act of 1798 is:

"That, whenever the President shall deem it expedient, he is hereby empowered to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commander of the army which may be raised by virtue of this act, and who, being commissioned as lieutenant general, may be authorized to command the armies of the United States."

Does the word "may," as there used, say that the President of the United States shall give him the command of the armies of the United States? The chairman of the Judiciary Committee says it does. Now, if I stopped here I would submit as perfectly plain that the word "may" was intended to mean only what its ordinary import implies, to mean discretion, discretion to be vested somewhere. But I am not obliged to stop at that part of the section which I have read, because it is followed afterwards by a provision which shows that in the view of the Congress who passed the act of 1798 they knew and they intended to express a different purpose in using the word "may" from that which they would have intended to express by employing the word "shall," as the Senator will see in a moment:

"May be authorized to command the armies of the United States, and shall be allowed all the pay," &c.

They had the two words before them. When they intended to impose it as an imperative obligation on the Government, and to give an absolute right to the officer, they said that that right should be his. They intended to give him the right to the additional pay, and they intended, of course, to create upon the Government the obligation to give that additional pay; and when they designed that they used the word "shall" as contradistinguished from the word "may" in the immediately preceding part of the clause. I maintain, therefore, with all the respect which I feel for the judgment of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, that the word "may," as there used, was intended to be a very different thing from the word "shall" as the word "shall" is used in the bill upon your table.

Now, Mr. President, a word upon the other part of the bill which the Military Committee move to strike out—the clause in which the Congress of the United States recommend to the President of the United States that he appoint Major General Grant. In the first place it would be sufficient to govern my conduct that such a thing is unexampled in the legislative history of the Government. Everybody knows how certain it is that a bad precedent once set is sure to be followed by subsequent mischief. The Senate of the United States especially, in my judgment, to say nothing of the other House, should keep themselves altogether clear from all possible embarrassment in acting upon the official acts of the President of the United States which, under the Constitution, are to come before the Senate for approval or disapproval. They should reserve to themselves the whole measure of their own authority, and because they should do that they should studiously avoid—I speak it very respectfully—interfering with any portion of the authority of the President.

The honorable member from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] has told us that he sees nothing unconstitutional in this particular clause of the bill. Nobody has said it was unconstitutional. But why is it not unconstitutional? It is only because it has no operation whatever; I mean no legal operation whatever. If it had the effect of controlling the President legally or constitutionally, or if that was the purpose of the provision, and the words in which the provision was made were words which would effect that purpose if the power existed, everybody would say that the whole was an idle attempt, because the Constitution of the United States stood as a barrier between the legislative department of the Government and the President as far as such provisions are concerned.

How are you to start? This war may not end for a year or two, or if it does, nobody can tell how soon we may be involved in other wars. Glories in the future, as well as in the past, may be won upon the ocean as well as upon the land. Other Scotts may arise, other Grants may spring up, and thousands of other people may fancy themselves Scotts and Grants, and they may come to Congress, they and their friends, and besiege every member of the Senate to recommend them for promotion. The case of each man is in his own judgment and the judgment of his friends an exceptive case. He doubts the President, is afraid to trust his claim to promotion to him, but through his immediate representatives upon this floor or in the other House he thinks he may be able to bring to bear upon him an influence which he will be unable to resist.

A presidential election is coming on. He who holds the presidential chair may be looking to a reelection. A popular man is brought up for promotion, one who stands high and deep in the affections of the people. Ingratitude as against him, or any reason for charging ingratitude as against him, upon the part of the incumbent of the presidential chair, strikes at his popularity and will tell at the ballot box; and if he be one of the mere ordinary men whom ordinary times bring upon the public arena he may not be superior to such a temptation; he may be willing to sacrifice the interest of the country to promote his own political ends, to win power, win a continuance in office rather than to perform the full measure of his duty, and he yields his conscience and his judgment and he appoints the man that you recommend.

But suppose he does not. If he is made of the stuff of which Presidents should be made he would not. Suppose he does not, what a conflict is that to bring about as between the President of the United States and his official advisers! How do both stand before the country when that condition of things is brought about, the Senate of the United States voting for a law like this or any other law amounting to the same thing in substance, telling the President of the United States whom he shall appoint to one of the highest offices in the gift of the people of the United States, and he sending in another? I do not speak of the present Senate: courtesy would of itself alone restrain me from speaking of the present Senate; and more than courtesy, a full sense that no such conduct could be attributed to the present Senate of the United States. Yet who knows in the course of time who may fill these chairs and constitute a majority, and try to master the President, to control him in this admitted, exclusive, constitutional function, by telling him virtually, "Take our man or take the consequences."

I submit, because it strikes me as very obvious, that to proceed in that way will be to open the door to thousands and thousands of ills that may result in very great public calamity. But more than that, my honorable friend from Wisconsin tells us, and I always listen to what he says with the highest respect, that he cannot see how the provision which the committee recommends to be stricken out reflects upon the President. In one sense it does not, because it approaches the President with words of respect; but in another sense it seems to me that it does very materially, more particularly when the provision is to be construed with reference to this debate, and the debate which I believe took place in the other House. The honorable member has said (every member has said who has spoken, I believe, except myself, and I have expressed no opinion upon the subject) that there is no man in the United States connected with the Army who ought to be selected for the place but General Grant. The glowing eulogy passed upon him by the honorable member from Wisconsin, not overstated except perhaps in the number of small arms which he said were captured. I think he put these at some fifteen or twenty millions more or less, [laughter,] "innumerable!"

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I could not count them. Mr. JOHNSON. He says, however, in that eulogy, that he stands above all the military men of the age; that the whole country points to him. What is the use, then, of putting this provision in unless it be that the President has not the sense or the gratitude or the discernment of the whole country? The President is a pretty shrewd man; just at this time, perhaps, he would be particularly shrewd on anything that affects the public pulse. And if it be true—it is not for me to deny it—that the public finger points to this man and to no other, do you not think the President of the United States will follow the guide of the public and make the selection which they designate? If you do not, what a reflection it is upon the President! If you suppose that he would not—and this provision finds its way into this bill because you suppose that he does not—what an imputation upon the President; the only man in the United States, if the honorable member from Wisconsin is right, who doubts at all that General Grant should be selected.

But, sir, not only is it, as I think, a reflection upon the President of the United States and a dangerous innovation upon his actual authority, (an authority with which the Senate of the United States as a Senate should not interfere,) but I submit, as clear to my mind, that it is rather disparaging to the stand which General Grant himself is supposed to hold in the public estimation. It is as much as to say that it is by no means certain that General Grant's claim to popular confidence and executive favor, to the gratitude of the country and to the gratitude of the Government will be sufficient to induce the President to give him this office. It is as much as to say, "Upon that point we doubt, and we prefer, therefore, in order to serve Grant, to accomplish for Grant what we think it is possible might not be effected without our aid, to tell the President that of all the men in the world Grant is the only one whom he should select for this high place."

I submit, then, with entire respect, that on every ground in which the subject strikes my mind, it is our duty, our clear duty, to accept of the amendments proposed by the committee.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I suppose there will be no vote taken upon this bill to-night. ["Move an adjournment."] I desire to submit an amendment that it may be printed, which I shall offer when this bill comes up for consideration again.

The amendment was received informally, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONNESS. I now move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope the honorable Senator from California will withdraw that motion. The Committee on Finance have some important appropriation bills before them which it is desirable should be submitted to the consideration of the Senate at an early day. I trust we shall be able to act upon some of the measures from that committee to-morrow, and hence I must object to an adjournment over. I hope my friend from California will withdraw his motion.

Mr. CONNESS. I withdraw the motion.

On the motion of Mr. HENDRICKS, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 11, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ILLNESS OF MR. LITTLEJOHN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

OSWEGO, NEW YORK, February 8, 1864.

MY DEAR SIR: I had hoped to so far have recovered my health by this time as to have resumed my duties in the House of Representatives, but my physician now tells me it will be imprudent for me to leave here in less than two weeks.

This being so, I most respectfully resign my position on the Committee on Rules, fearing my prolonged absence may embarrass the committee in case of differences of opinion in regard to the revision or amendment of the rules. Very truly yours, D. C. LITTLEJOHN.

HON. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker House of Representatives, Washington.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York being already on two committees has, under the rules, the right to resign, and no vote, therefore, is required on his resignation.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. LOAN. I ask the consent of the House to make a personal explanation.

There was no objection.

Mr. LOAN. Before proceeding with my explanation, I will send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read a paragraph from the Globe of the 8th instant.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"A Senator from my own State [Mr. Brown] presented what purported to be a memorial from members of the Legislature of Missouri, and a protest of four Representatives from that State, against the confirmation of General Schofield as a major general. I do not mention this circumstance to comment on the extraordinary and most unbecoming declaration contained in that protest, in which these four members claim to be the only representatives of the Union men of Missouri, for there is nothing in the character or history of either of them to warrant this arrogant assumption, but for the purpose of exposing a covert assault upon the President under the pretext of defeating the confirmation of General Schofield. If it had been the object to effect the latter purpose this paper would have been presented in executive session, where nominations are considered, and not in the open session of the Senate, as it purports to have been done, when no such matter can properly come before that body. The memorial and protest contained only matters which had been previously submitted to the President by a great committee of radicals, which visited Washington for that purpose; and these statements had been examined into by the President, who, in his reply, plainly declared that he did not believe them to be true. Yet the President is arraigned upon these same stale and discredited statements before the country upon the memorial of members of the Missouri Legislature and four members of this House, under the pretense of asking that General Schofield should not be confirmed, and that, too, after an agreement was had with the President that no opposition should be made to Schofield's confirmation, but that he should be, on his own request, relieved from the command in Missouri. The President, I presume, in his desire for peace among those who professed to be loyal, was willing to make this concession; but after accepting the concession, these parties flew from their agreement, under the dictation of bolder and more open enemies of the President and his Administration, who would not permit the opportunity for assailing him to pass."

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. With the consent of my colleague, I wish to make a suggestion before he proceeds. I learn from the paragraph just read by the Clerk, that the purpose of my colleague is to make some explanation or reply to something that has been said by my colleague, [Mr. BLAIR,] who is absent at this time. I suggest, therefore, to my colleague that he defer his explanation or reply until the return of General BLAIR. I understand that he is out of the city, but that he will return this evening or to-morrow. I make this suggestion in justice to my colleague who is absent.

Mr. LOAN. I would be more than pleased to comply with the suggestion of my colleague, but the circumstances are such at this time as not to permit it. It is a direct personal charge against me.

Mr. KING. I rise to a question of order. I ask if my colleague can be permitted to proceed at this time if objection be made?

The SPEAKER. When the gentleman from Missouri rose, the Chair asked if there was objection to his proceeding; and no objection was made. It is now too late to object.

Mr. KING. Then I ask the Speaker whether, after my colleague has concluded his explanation, other members from Missouri will be permitted to reply?

The SPEAKER. That will depend on the consent of the House.

Mr. LOAN. I would be more than pleased, as I said, to postpone this matter, were it possible in justice to myself to do so. But, sir, this charge containing a direct personal assault upon me is published in the papers without my knowledge and against my consent. I have waited a sufficient length of time to enable that gentleman to be present, and it is not my fault that he is not present here at this time. Why he is absent I know not. It is enough for me to know that my duty to myself and my constituents requires me to make this explanation at this time.

The attack contained in the paragraph which has been read at the Clerk's desk is introduced with a great deal of ingenuity, not as he alleges, for the purpose of defending the President from a covert attack, for none has been made, but it was for another and a very different purpose. It was to strike at individual men under the plea of defending the President.

But, sir, I have yet to learn whether a bare statement of facts can ever be construed into an assault on any officer of this Government.

The complaint which he makes here, and urges as reason why it is really an assault upon the President, is that a memorial was presented in open session in the Senate. In answer to that I have to say that it was no fault of mine. I did not publish it. I said it, as I had the right to say it, to the proper tribunal, for the information of that body in an important matter on which they were called to decide. If they have seen fit to publish it, the responsibility of the publication is with them; and not with me.

My colleague alleges that this matter had been submitted to the President by a body of radicals which appeared here in September last. Well, sir, I was one of that body of men, and was present when we presented our address to the President; and I heard him say in the presence of that delegation that he believed the facts stated in that address were true. We have numerous witnesses who will bear testimony to that statement. The President said, "I decline to examine witnesses, because I believe the statements are true." If he has ever denied those charges since I have no knowledge of it.

But, sir, I differ with the gentleman in believing that the address presented to his excellency the President last September and the protest presented to the Senate are the same in purpose and substance. Those charges are entirely different, and bear on different subjects, and if the President has ever denied them I have no knowledge of the fact. I should regret to believe that the President has ever denied them, as they relate to General Schofield. I speak now of the protest. Did the President deny the signal failure of General Schofield as a district commander in Missouri? I do not believe that he would deny it. Does he not know the marchings and counter-marchings of that army? Does he not know the gallant fight made by General Herron at Prairie Grove? Does he not know that that occurred when General Schofield was absent in the city of St. Louis? I think that he was then providentially afflicted with sickness so that he could be kept away from the army. It was to that providential interference that we owe the great victory at Prairie Grove.

The President could not deny that he transferred General Schofield to the army of the Cumberland. Will he deny that he has failed to perform anything which gives the promise of success in that field of action? Will he deny that the Senate has confirmed General Herron and General Blunt for their gallant conduct in the field when they refused to confirm General Schofield? Will he deny all of these facts? Will he deny that he took General Schofield from the army of the department of Missouri, and that General Curtis was removed without any reason being assigned? If he does, then he will deny his own official acts that are well known to the history of the country. Will he deny the signal failure of General Schofield's administration? Will he deny the delegation from the loyal people there? Will he deny the presence of the delegation which visited him in July last? If he does, he is as reckless in his statements as the gentleman himself. But these are matters which cannot be denied, and I do not believe that the President has denied them, the declaration of the gentleman to the contrary notwithstanding. They are not to be denied. These were the charges of that protest.

The gentleman was not content with that. He went further. He says that the President has been arraigned on these stale charges. He says more, that it was done after agreement had been made with General Schofield to be confirmed. I do not know who made that agreement. That statement, so far as I am concerned, is unqualifiedly false in every particular, without color or pretense to excuse it. But I do not believe that the President is so far capable of disregarding the duties of his office as to bargain official influence for a consideration. I admit that the gentleman is more intimate with the President than I am; that he has had opportunities of knowing him better, and that he may estimate him more justly. I am free to say that I have never believed, nor do I now believe, the President is capable of so dishonorable a proceeding. I do not believe that any contract, agreement, or understanding has ever been made by the President for the confirmation of General Schofield.

He charges us further with acting in this matter at the dictation of other gentlemen. I can deny that statement, and do deny it, by saying that there was no person concerned except those whose names are indicated. They believed it to be their duty to advise the Senate and to furnish the necessary evidence to protect their constituents.

Mr. BOYD. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object.

PRESIDENT'S STABLE.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported a bill making appropriation for rebuilding the stable at the President's; which was read a first and second time.

The Clerk read the following letter:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS,
CAPITOL OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, February 11, 1864.

DEAR SIR: The stable attached to the Executive Mansion was destroyed by fire last night. It is very necessary, for the convenience of the President, that it should be rebuilt as soon as possible. At an interview with him, early this morning, he expressed a desire that I would bring the matter to the attention of Congress to-day, if possible, that measures might be taken to have it rebuilt.

Isaiah Rogers, Esq., the architect of the Treasury, with the master bricklayer, accompanied me to the ruins, and after a careful examination Mr. Rogers came to the conclusion that it would cost $12,000 to rebuild it, and has given me a written estimate to that effect, which accompanies this letter.

The walls of the stable are of the best pressed brick, but are so cracked and warped that nearly the whole will have to be taken down. The inside of the stable is entirely burned out. The window caps and sills are of brown stone, and most of them so injured that new ones will have to be procured.

The stable cost originally, I understand, about seventeen thousand dollars.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

B. B. FRENCH,

Commissioner of Public Buildings.

Hon. JOHN H. RICE, Chairman Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, House Representatives United States.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. The committee have considered this matter this morning, and, regarding it as a case of emergency, and by the special request of the Commissioner of Public Buildings and of the President, they have seen fit to report this bill and ask that it be passed this morning, so that the work may be commenced upon the building immediately. I think there will be no objection, and I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAXES ON GOVERNMENT LANDS.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask unanimous consent to report a joint resolution, and ask that it be put on its passage now.

No objection being made, the resolution was introduced and read a first and second time by its title.

The bill provides that for the purpose of paying taxes on lands owned by the United States the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. What lands does the joint resolution refer to?

Mr. STEVENS. I ask leave to state the reasons which make the appropriation necessary.

Mr. BROOKS. I know nothing about this matter, but I do not object if I can understand it thoroughly.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not propose to call the previous question. I only wish to state the reasons for bringing in the bill. The Government of the United States owns a little land liable to taxes in the States the same as lands of individual owners. Some tracts have already been sold for taxes, and now several other tracts are advertised for sale, and will be sold in a few days if the taxes are not paid. The Department asks for $20,000 to pay those taxes. If anybody objects I have nothing more to say.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not wish to object to anything that is necessary; but the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not prepared to state where these lands are, or to give us any information on the subject. And besides, if the bill is admitted it must be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly; if any gentleman asks for it. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order for to-morrow after the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL REVENUE BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask leave to report back from the Committee of Ways and Means the bill (H. R. No. 122) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. STILES. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. I merely wish to report it back that some time may be fixed for its consideration.

Mr. STILES. I object.

FACILITIES FOR TRANSPORTING TROOPS.

Mr. CHANLER. In accordance with a request of the Assembly of the State of New York, I ask leave to introduce a resolution calling for information.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas the facilities for convenient and expeditious travel and transportation of troops between the cities of New York and Washington, especially between New York and Philadelphia, are at present notoriously inconvenient and inadequate; Therefore,

Resolved, That the Military Committee of this House be requested to inquire into the expediency of making immediate provision for an increase of the facilities for transporting troops between the cities of New York and Washington.

Mr. BROOKS. I must object to the reference, as there is a special committee upon that subject now.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I am glad to see that New York is moving in this matter.

Mr. BROOKS. If the gentleman will refer the matter to the select committee I will not object.

Mr. CHANLER. I will modify the resolution by striking out the words "Military Committee" and inserting "select committee heretofore appointed on that subject."

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

LOUISIANA ELECTION CASE.

Mr. SMITH. I am directed by the Committee of Elections to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House the sum of $1,500 as compensation in full to A. P. Field, a claimant for a seat in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the State of Louisiana.

Mr. UPSON. I rise to express my dissent from the resolution as reported. It is a report in a different form of the resolution which was referred to the Committee of Elections, and which was originally intended to give full pay and mileage to the gentleman from Louisiana. It may be that it is rather discourteous to raise an objection to an allowance of this kind in any case, but I find that the circumstances in this case compel me to dissent from the report of the committee, and I find no reason to justify me in giving my vote in its favor. If the gentleman from Louisiana is entitled to anything he is entitled to his full pay and mileage, and that full pay and mileage, as I am informed by a member of the Committee on Mileage, would amount to $4,487. I suppose that in order to entitle a claimant to his mileage and per diem there should be at least some shadow of a right on the part of the claimant to the seat which he seeks. In this instance the applicant simply presented himself with a certificate made out in the city of Washington, subsequently to his arrival here, signed by a gentleman who had no authority whatever to give such a certificate, and stamped with his own seal instead of the seal of the State.

I consider, Mr. Speaker, that it was an outrage on the part of the Clerk of the late House of Representatives to place on the roll of members the names of the gentlemen mentioned in that certificate. The Committee of Elections unanimously reported against the right of any of these claimants to a seat here. There was not a dissenting voice in the committee. There was not even the semblance of an election there; no canvassing of votes, no authority on the part of any one to canvass votes, and no authority on the part of any one to give a certificate. It was a matter that was notorious, and which must have been well known to the late Clerk of the House of Representatives, that there was no civil Governor in Louisiana, that the person claiming that office was nothing but a bogus Governor, and that he had no authority whatever to give a certificate of election. Even on his own showing he had no rights at all at the time of giving the certificate. The certificate was issued in November, but he did not even claim a right to his seat until the January following.

It strikes me, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the claimant here had not the shadow of a right to his seat, either in law or in fact, and that he was well aware of that when he presented his claim. I do not wish to say anything discourteous to the gentleman from Louisiana, nor to impeach either his loyalty or devotion to the Union; but I think that his claim could not be substantiated on any ground whatever.

The names of three gentlemen were given in this certificate. If one of them had a right to come here and make a claim, and then get compensation for making it, we may expect the other two to come and do the same thing, for each of them may have a different state of facts on which to base his claim. To show the House what evil might arise if we were to admit claimants under such circumstances I need only allude to the fact—of which I have no personal knowledge, but of the correctness of which I am assured—that one of the persons named in that certificate, Mr. Thomas Cottman, was one of those who signed the original ordinance of secession in the State of Louisiana. If, therefore, we were to encourage or to countenance applications of this kind we can see what kind of men we might be admitting to membership.

I dissent from some of the statements contained in the report of the Committee of Elections, censuring somewhat the military authorities of Louisiana. I consider that an unnecessary and gratuitous censure. I saw nothing whatever in the action of the military governor of Louisiana to justify any such condemnation. There was nothing whatever in the state of the law or the facts there to authorize the holding of an election at that time. A State may, by her own authorities, abrogate her constitution and laws, and still remain in the Union. She may repeal her constitution and her code of laws, or may take such action as will temporarily suspend their operation. The State of Louisiana did, in effect, by adopting an ordinance of secession, and by being carried away in this rebellion, abrogate, repeal, or suspend her constitution and laws, and they are not yet in operation, further than they may be recognized by the military power. Before an election can be legally held there, there must be some provision made, there must be some action on the part of loyal men in that State which will be recognized by the General Government, in the way of making an organic law, or adopting such a code of laws or such a constitution as may be conformable to the new condition of things. The constitution and laws of a State do not immediately revive on our occupying their territory by military force and establishing military government there.

There being, then, no claim of an actual election, nothing presented here but the certificate of a bogus official, no canvass of votes having been had,

I can see no propriety whatever in voting pay of any amount to the gentleman from Louisiana. If there was the least claim on his part he should be entitled to the full amount, and that amount, as I have stated, would be between four and five thousand dollars.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman why the Committee of Elections do not embrace in this resolution the other gentlemen who came up here from Louisiana at the commencement of the session?

Mr. UPSON. Their cases were not referred to the Committee of Elections. There has been but one case from that State submitted for our action. I did, however, suggest to the committee that, if this action were sustained, the others claiming to have been elected may come hereafter, claiming a like compensation upon the precedent which it is here proposed to establish. And there is nothing to prevent men coming up from all these States disorganized by the rebellion, under the election of a town meeting, or otherwise going through the form of a contest for a seat, and claiming compensation at the hands of the House.

I submit, then, that in justice to ourselves we cannot vote to pay this claim, for the claimant has utterly failed to support his claim by any show of law or right. If he had not so failed he would have been entitled to his full pay and mileage as a member up to the time his case was decided. But, sir, he has not the vote of any constituency. I see no reason for complaining of the acts of the military authorities in Louisiana in connection with this election. There was no color of law for holding that election, and if there had been there were no officers known to the law to canvass the votes.

I submit, therefore, that this claimant came here with no color of right to a seat, and as such is entitled to no compensation; while if he had a reasonable claim for a seat he would be entitled to full compensation, and I know of no rule by which the Committee of Elections could compromise the rate of compensation to be allowed.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I hope the House will pass this resolution. I shall not go into a discussion of the question which has been raised by the gentleman on the other side against it.

I do know that the claimant for this seat from the State of Louisiana came here and presented his case to the House. It was referred to the Committee of Elections at an early day. They have but recently made a report. It is true that the committee were unanimous in their report against his claim for a seat. But it was questionable in the minds of many members of the House whether he was not entitled to a seat upon this floor. There was certainly sufficient in his application to occupy the attention of the committee for a considerable length of time in their investigation, and to occupy the attention of the House after the facts were presented for a considerable length of time.

And it is a question yet whether the loyal portion of the people of Louisiana are not entitled to a Representative upon this floor. However, this question has already been passed upon; and I do not propose at this time to reopen that discussion. But this applicant has been kept here for two months, awaiting first the decision of the committee and then the decision of the House upon this question.

It does seem to me that in accordance with the precedents which this House has established heretofore this allowance ought to be made. In the peculiar condition of things in this southern country, questions of this kind must necessarily arise, and perhaps some man may be kept from coming here to claim a seat in this House who may be entitled to it because he cannot afford to do it at his own expense. In their peculiar position such questions, I repeat, must continually arise, and although we may have properly denied to this applicant his right to a seat, yet I ask whether it is proper to discourage all applicants who may have been legally elected in those States from coming here and allowing the House to pass upon their claims without the necessity of doing it upon their own expense?

It seems to me from the peculiar circumstances of this case it is but reasonable to allow the compensation now asked for. I am willing to believe that the Committee of Elections, who have not only examined the claim of this gentleman to a seat, but who have examined his right to compensation, have reported in favor of allowing this sum. He came here not as a mere contestant, without any right to a seat, but he came here representing what he conceived to be the right of a constituency.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I propose to say a few words in the hour allowed me under the rules to close this debate. While I do not believe that Mr. Field was entitled to a seat upon this floor from the State of Louisiana, yet I believe that he has come here for a good purpose, honestly believing that he was entitled to be received as the Representative of his people. There was a difference of opinion in that State among Union men, not as to the result, or the end they were both working for, or to the means by which they were to arrive at it. There was nothing before the committee in the way of testimony or speeches which did not accord to Mr. Field the highest devotion to the country from the beginning. Speeches were made the other day upon this floor, as the House will remember, bearing the strongest evidence in his behalf to his early expressed determination to sustain the Federal authority when the Federal troops arrived in the city of New Orleans.

It is said that there were few votes cast. That is true. Some were prevented from voting. It was in evidence before the committee that one third of the State of Louisiana was under the jurisdiction of the Federal authority; and it was also in evidence that at the last session of Congress Representatives from that State presented themselves and were admitted to seats upon this floor with a greater or less vote. At this election upon which Mr. Field based his claim for a seat in this House, the people not only voted for members of Congress, but for municipal officers and members of the State Legislature. Members of Congress, judges, and members of the Legislature were all elected at the same time, and those judges are now sitting upon the bench adjudicating upon the rights and property of the people of Louisiana. Not only that, the loyal people of the State of Louisiana have been compelled to pay into the United States Treasury the sum of from four to six million dollars. These people, recognized as loyal people, were alone the men who voted at this election. It was not thought by the committee that a sufficient number of votes were cast to entitle the members elected to seats upon this floor. But it was admitted that those who did vote were good and loyal men. Now, I put it whether it is not the duty of members of Congress to pay this claimant under the circumstances.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I understand that the usage has been to pay the contestant where the opinion is entertained by the House that the claimant had such ground of contest or claim to a seat as to leave the inference that he acted honestly and fairly in presenting himself before the House. In all those cases, so far as I know, pay and mileage have been granted. If that be so, I ask why the report of the committee has fixed a specified sum, and not provided for pay and mileage?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I can answer the gentleman. I recollect a case where the seat of the Delegate from Nebraska was contested by Mr. Chapman. We then refused to pay him the whole pay and mileage, and voted him a fixed sum of $2,000, when he was entitled to something like $5,000.

Mr. SMITH. I cannot recollect at this time of contestants who have been paid. In looking over the reports of contested-election cases from various parts of the country I find that the House has not only paid the whole amount, but it has paid a fixed sum to those who came here to contest the seats of members. In this case there was an honest purpose on the part of the people of the State of Louisiana to send a Representative here. They wanted to be heard. They were and are a loyal people. They had been subjugated. They had been oppressed. They had been ground to the dust; and I believe as firmly as I am here today that there are good and loyal people in every one of the southern States to whom we give encouragement by our speeches and action here.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let me say a word. I desire to know from the Committee of Elections whether there is any precedent, any case presented, where compensation has been paid to an alien enemy? I desire the gentleman, moreover, to state what is the status of the individual claimant in reference to a seat upon this floor. I refer him to the common law. I refer to the additional fact that by the act of Congress a state of war exists, and that by positive enactment all intercourse of a civil character between the citizens of the loyal States and citizens of rebellious States has been interdicted. I want to know from that gentleman whether the claimant to a seat in this House, whom he proposes to compensate by this resolution, could maintain an action in our courts; whether he could make a valid contract with any member of the Committee of Elections; whether he could make a contract with any other member of this House; whether for the time being, at all events while Louisiana is under the armed occupation of a foreign force, any contract can be enforced; and whether he has any rights until we have a public proclamation and declaration that the rebellion has been suppressed in those districts? I do not say that the gentleman from Louisiana is not loyal, but I say prima facie, by presumption of law, in accordance with the common law of nations, in accordance with the act of Congress of July, 1862, and in accordance with the declaration of the Supreme Court of the United States, he stands in the position of a rebel. The presumption is against him, and when questioned upon a point entirely pertinent to this issue he stood mute. It may be he is loyal; it may be he is not. In contemplation of law he is not. In point of fact, one of his colleagues, who claimed a seat here without right, without law in his favor, and without a constituency—as this claimant is—was, by his own admission, a member of the secession convention of Louisiana, and put his name to the ordinance.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. I would ask the gentleman if he thinks all the people of the seceded States are rebels?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not.

Mr. SMITH. I can answer very definitely, as I understand it, the question suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I lay down the proposition that there is in no State that ever has been a State under the Government of the United States that has by any act of its own, either by convention or Legislature, or any other body, seceded from the Government of the United States. I lay down the proposition that whatever has been done upon the motion of that people, whether by a minority or by a majority of them, as against this Government, is null and void; and that those people who have thus acted in violation of law and Constitution are enemies of the country, are rebels to it, and can and ought to be subdued and brought back under the Government. Ay, so far as they are concerned who have acted thus, it is the duty of this Government to act summarily with them and punish them for the crimes they have committed. Yet there is a great saving clause in the Constitution of the United States, and it was exercised by the President of the United States when he proclaimed that when the Government had exercised its power, and had brought them under its control, those persons should, by an oath of allegiance, be admitted back and entitled to the privileges and immunities they were entitled to before.

Now, sir, when the State of Louisiana seceded by the action of a portion of its people, the whole country said it was wrong, that it was treason, and against the Constitution of the United States. The people rose en masse and denounced that action. Now, sir, when the Government obtained, through the agencies of its soldiers, the control of that people, the claimant in this case staid there and remained loyal. And when it was declared by the proper authority that those who were loyal should take an oath of allegiance, among the first to take that oath was this man Field. Whether he had ever done any disloyal act there was no evidence before the Committee of Elections; nor is there any evidence before this House that he had ever done any such thing. Upon the arrival of Federal troops in New Orleans he came forward and took the oath, and he has kept it, and has been true to the Union; and, so far as any man upon this floor knows, he has been as true to his allegiance to the Government as anybody.

Now, sir, these loyal people of Louisiana are not enemies, they are not belligerents, they are not out of the Union; but they are in the Union; they are friends to the Government; and it is the duty of Congress to protect them. I say if there is but one loyal man in the State of Louisiana, I care not how humble he is, I care not how poor he is, I care not how ignorant he is, if he loves his country and asks its protection it is the duty of the Government to give him protection if it requires a million men to do it. He is entitled to all the privileges and all the rights he was entitled to before. It is a matter of history that the State of West Virginia, by its Legislature, and by a convention, seceded from the Government and repudiated it. Yet I observe upon this floor three Representatives from the State of West Virginia, though West Virginia was in the rebellion by the act of the convention which was called and which carried that State out of the Union—if it could be carried out. All the members of its Legislature, or nearly all of them, proved traitors. In the Senate of the United States are representatives from the State of Virginia. They have a State organization, a Legislature, a Governor, a judiciary. They are paying their revenue to the Government, and are represented in the Congress of the United States.

What is the difference, I ask, between the State of Louisiana and the State of Virginia, except that on many bloody battle-fields Virginia has evinced most clearly her hatred to the General Government and her determination to overthrow it? A portion of the people of Louisiana have acted badly; but those of them who have acted well, those of them who have stood by the Government through fire and through storm, through treason and rebellion, should share at the hands of this people a warm and hearty welcome whenever they manifest a disposition to return to loyalty and allegiance to the Government. In giving a fair compensation to the man who came here honestly and faithfully to represent them, you say to them that while you cannot admit such persons as Representatives in Congress you at least recognize their right to appeal to Congress and to the Government, and that you are ready to give them due and proper consideration.

Mr. PIKE. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to any interruption.

Mr. SMITH. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

The objection was not withdrawn.

The question being on the substitute reported by the Committee of Elections,

Mr. STEVENS called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 88, nays 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, Baxter, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Blow, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chanler, Clay, Coffroth, Cole, Cox, Cravens, Thomas T. Davis, Dawson, Denning, Demisson, Donnelly, Driggs, Eldridge, English, Finck, Gauson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Charles M. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Fernando Wood—60.

So the substitute was adopted.

During the vote it was announced that Mr. DAWES was absent on account of sickness.

The question recurred on the resolution as amended.

Mr. BEAMAN called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 85, nays 63; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Baxter, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Blow, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, William G. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Spalding, Stevens, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Fernando Wood—63.

So the resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. SMITH moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution as amended was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONSCRIPTION.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ELIOT. I rise to a point of order. I inquire whether the morning hour has commenced?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has not yet commenced.

Mr. ELIOT. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. That can be interrupted by a motion to suspend the rules. By the 59th rule a gentleman has the right at any time to move to suspend the rules for this purpose. The usage has been not to make the motion till after the morning hour, but he has a right to make it.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. FENTON in the chair, in the absence of Mr. DAWES through sickness,) and proceeded as a special order to the consideration of Senate bill No. 36, to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, to the following amendment offered by Mr. STEVENS:

All able-bodied male persons of African descent, between the ages of twenty and forty-five years, whether citizens or not, resident in the United States, shall be enrolled according to the provisions of the act to which this is a supplement, and form part of the national forces. And when a slave shall have been drafted and mustered into the service of the United States his masters shall have a certificate thereof which shall entitle him to receive $300 from the United States, and the drafted man shall be free: Provided, That the slaves of loyal men only shall be paid for.

Mr. DAVIS's amendment was to strike out the words "which shall entitle him," &c.

Mr. STEVENS. I accept that as a modification of my amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I now propose to amend that amendment by adding as follows:

The Secretary of War shall appoint a commission in each of the slave States represented in Congress charged to award a just compensation to each loyal owner of any slave who may volunteer into the service of the United States, payable out of the commutation money.

Mr. Chairman, I submit that amendment for this reason: not because I think it is due at all to the owner of the slave, but because the President and the Secretary of War in executing the law of 1862, allowing the President to use and organize persons of African descent to suppress the rebellion, have seen fit to appoint a commission, which is now in session in Maryland, for the purpose of estimating the value of and awarding reasonable compensation to the loyal owners of slaves who may volunteer in the service of the United States under the law of 1862. That brings the volunteering of slaves into some sort of correspondence with the established policy of the Government in paying bounties to volunteers, the difference being that in the case of the slave the bounty is paid to the master instead on his freeing the slave, whereas the bounty in the case of the white volunteer of course goes to himself.

But the difference between that proposition and the proposition to pay drafted men is this: the volunteer having offered his services to the Government, the Government is of course at liberty to alleviate the burden which may be thrown upon the slaveowner, as far as it sees fit. It is a very different thing to impose upon the Government when it is driven to draft men the necessity of paying to every slaveowner a compensation for any slave that may be drafted. It is unequal, and I am sure every gentleman will see that it is in a moment. The poor man whose son works for him on his ten acres receives no compensation for that son when he is drafted into the service, while the wealthy slaveholder, who has three or four hundred slaves alongside, is to receive a compensation of $300 for every one of his slaves who may be drafted.

It is apparent that if the Government has the right to draft slaves into the service, and if the Government has the right to take the slave, it has the right to take him exactly as it takes the son, the father, or the brother of any citizen of the Republic, with no more compensation, and no less compensation for discharging the duty he owes to the country.

Mr. ANDERSON. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Maryland is an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. Then I desire to say a word in opposition to the gentleman from Maryland. Many gentlemen upon this floor know that the people of my district are in some respects situated unlike the people in any other district of any loyal State of the Union. At the very commencement of the rebellion a very large number of the people of that district having strong sympathies with the rebellion induced the able-bodied young men of the district to take their fortunes with the rebellion. And the result has been that a large majority of the young men there who were fit for military service have gone into the rebellion, and as a consequence the district has never been able to fill its quota of troops in the calls which have been made upon it by the United States Government; so that now, on the approaching 10th of March, when a draft is ordered, that district will owe the Government something near seven thousand men.

It will result, therefore, unless the slaves of rebels who have cheated the Government out of the young men it was entitled to, unless they are taken, every poor Union man who is capable of bearing arms will be sent off, torn away from his wife and children, while those who have been guilty of inducing the young men to go into the armies of the rebellion will be permitted to stay at home in peace and quiet with their families and slaves.

Sir, I am in favor of taking the slaves of rebels in Kentucky, and of rebel sympathizers. I think it is just, right, and expedient. But I am opposed to taking the slaves of Union men of Kentucky. They have suffered already sufficiently in consequence of this rebellion, and particularly when, under the circumstances I have stated in my district, every Union man there upon the enrollment list is made responsible for two rebels who have gone off into the southern army. The men in my district are unable to pay the amount of money required to be paid for the men who are drafted. It will take $1,000,000, and it is impossible for the men there to raise that amount of money. I think, therefore, it is the duty of the Government to take the slaves of these men who induced and persuaded our young men to go into the rebel army. I am willing that they should take all of the slaves of the rebels that they can reach.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, to the amendment.

Mr. FARNSWORTH demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The amendment to the amendment was adopted.

Mr. WEBSTER. I move to insert in the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania after the word "volunteer" the words "or drafted into the military service of the United States."

Mr. Chairman, the effect of this amendment is to put the drafted slave on the same footing with the volunteer slave.

Mr. UPSON. I rise to a question of order. I make the point that the amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that it is in order.

Mr. WEBSTER. I repeat that the object of my amendment is to put the owners of slaves who are drafted upon the same footing with the owners of slaves who volunteer.

Now, sir, upon the question of the right of the Government to take slaves when necessary for the military service, I have no trouble. No gentleman on this floor, however much he may be opposed to the Government exercising this right, has undertaken to deny the right.

Mr. SMITHERS. Will the gentleman tell me whether they are taken as persons or property?

Mr. WEBSTER. With a great deal of pleasure. The Government takes them both as persons and property. In my opinion they are recognized in the Constitution both as persons and property, and the Government has the right to take them either as persons or property, or as both combined. But when the Government takes the slave for military service it takes away from the master the service of the slave which is due to him, which is his property, and the case is then that of "private property taken for public use," and just compensation should be made. This my amendment proposes to give.

Now my colleague from Baltimore, [Mr. DAVIS,] in the able argument he made yesterday to the committee against compensation for drafted slaves, took the position that while the Government had the right to the military service of the slave without compensation, yet when that term of military service had expired the slave could be reclaimed by his master and he was still his property. I admit, sir, if no compensation were made, and consequently no agreement with the master for the manumission of the slave, that the conclusion of my colleague is correct. But, sir, for one I am unwilling that any man who has been lawfully clothed in the uniform of an American soldier, who has borne arms as an American soldier, who has endured the privations and dangers incident to a soldier's life, who has upheld the flag and the honor of the country and perhaps shed his blood in their defense, I am unwilling that such a man should ever again be returned to slavery. To permit it would bring shame and disgrace upon us and the Republic. It is in part to prevent this iniquity that I propose to give compensation to the master and freedom to the slave.

Sir, the question before us is not the right to take slaves for military service, but the expediency of so doing. For myself, I am free to confess that in the earlier stages of the war, when it seemed probable that the rebellion would be crushed at no distant day, and without serious interference with the domestic institutions of the States, believing as I did and do in the superiority of the white man as a soldier, I was unwilling to arm the negro. But now, sir, when we approach the end of the third year of this war, and it is still huge in its dimensions; when call for troops follows call in quick succession; when draft after draft is made, and the drain upon our people for soldiers is grievous to be borne, I am for using all the means known to the law in suppressing the rebellion. I would put arms in the hands of all men capable of bearing them. The experience of the last twelve months has shown that the negro, though not so efficient a soldier as the white man, will fight bravely, and can be made a valuable auxiliary in the prosecution of the war and the restoration of the Union. Sir, his aid is not to be rejected, at least I will not assist in its rejection.

Now, sir, while I say this I also wish to say that the loyal slaveholder, the man who has stood by you and the Government through all the changes of this war, who stands by you now, though he sees and knows that the inevitable result of the war will be to wipe out slavery, is deserving of the highest and kindest consideration at your hands. His loyalty has no condition. His devotion to his country bears tests, and endures sacrifices which other men are exempt from. He says, "If it be necessary let my property be destroyed, but let my country be preserved." For such a man, and many such there are in my district, I invoke—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KELLEY. We do not give the northern father compensation for his minor son who is drafted. We do not give the northern wife compensation for the husband whose labor was her support, if he be drafted. We do not give the northern orphan child compensation for having withdrawn the father whose labor was its support. We do not give compensation to the poor wife and child of a poor man of Maryland or Kentucky when the draft designates her husband or its father. And I cannot see that the relation of this slaveowner to his slave is one whit more sacred than that of the father to his son, the wife to her husband, or the child to its parent. Slaves are persons. They are never alluded to in the Constitution of the United States as slaves; and every able-bodied man in the country owes it military service, be he black or white, bond or free.

I am ready to appropriate money to pay for the slaves of loyal owners whose masters consent to their volunteering in the service. I will do it readily; I will aid it with my vote and voice whenever I can. But why, when under our law an able-bodied man is designated by law as one upon whom military duty is imposed, shall we hand to another the sum of $300? I hope it will not be done. I am heartily opposed to the proposition.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment, with a view to a few remarks. This is a proposition, as I understand, made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] He is an avowed abolitionist, and frankly says so; but with his abolition comes also a sense of justice. He is for compensating or establishing the position that we are entitled to compensation when our slaves are taken. After that we may consider that he is disposed to do justice to the slaveholder whenever his property is taken. To my astonishment, however, I find gentlemen representing upon this floor slaveholders in Maryland and other slave States who are for depreciating the rights of the slaveholder and the property of the slaveholder, and for turning out those of that class whom they represent to starve upon the moors and hills of their country. Sir, I contend that this is an injustice unworthy of patriots, unworthy of statesmen, and unworthy of any deliberative body. And I will say I look more for justice to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] than I do to the two gentlemen who spoke yesterday, and who represent the upper portion of Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS and Mr. CRESWELL.] I deny that you have a right to enlist or enroll a slave.

Mr. DRIGGS. I call the gentleman to order. That question has already been decided by a vote.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I contend that I am fully in order. I say I believe it will be decided by the highest legal tribunal in the land that you have not a right to enlist or enroll a slave as a soldier. If the Government chooses to take him at all the only relation in which it may take him is as property; and as property you are bound to pay the compensation which the Constitution says you shall pay for taking private property.

If you could properly enlist slaves, I am opposed to the degradation which such an act would bring upon a nation situated as this is. What are you fighting? Five million white men. You claim to be twenty million white men, and yet with such odds in your favor, and with means of blockading southern ports and almost starving them into subjection, you come here and command that the flag of your country shall be entrusted to the poor slaves. I say it is a degradation of the United States flag, and no man who duly honors that flag has heretofore ever undertaken at such odds to deprave the country and tarnish its honor by any such proceeding.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HARRIS] applies a portion of his remarks to his own colleagues from that State, touching their representation, or rather misrepresentation, of the interests of their constituents. To that they are abundantly able to answer, and I do not wish to reply. To that other part of his remarks, which charges a portion of this House with a disposition to do injustice to any portion of the people of this country by this provision of the bill, I wish to reply. Also to that other charge he makes, that we are doing injustice to the honor of the country in intrusting its flag to a portion of the black people of the country, I wish to reply. I call his attention, sir, to the fact that by the men of the Revolution, among the most prominent of whom were members from the slave States, that flag was intrusted in this identical manner to the safe-keeping and honorable conduct of the black men of the country. The pension rolls at this day show the names of black men by the side of white men who fought to establish the independence of the country. More than that, sir, the statute-book of the State of Virginia bears, up to this time, the laws by which black slaves who had fought in the battles of the Revolution were emancipated in recognition of their honorable conduct. So, too, the State of Rhode Island, which was then a slave State, expressly authorized the enrollment of black slaves in the armies of the country. This is not a new thing that we are doing. It is a thing called for by the necessities of the country at this time, and which a Representative from a slave State ought to be the last to object to.

I wish to say, further, sir, that under the Constitution of the United States we know no such thing as a slave per se, as property in the same sense as we know of property in cattle. They are known as persons, and are spoken of and described as persons, and as nothing else. When slaveholders make a claim for compensation for slaves enlisted or drafted, that compensation should be adjudged, if at all, on the basis of two fifths of their value, at the utmost, inasmuch as they represent but two fifths as property and three fifths as man. That being the fact, I say we ought not to regard this as we regard other property when it is taken for the use of the Government. There is some property known as such by all the nations of the earth. By the common sentiment of mankind certain things are recognized as property. Certain other things are recognized as property by exceptional statutes, and of that class exclusively is the property in slaves.

Under these circumstances, while I will vote for giving to loyal owners some compensation for those of their slaves who will volunteer, as an inducement to masters to encourage their slaves to volunteer—giving them deeds of manumission at the time—I cannot vote for a compensation in case of slaves that may be drafted, because that would leave masters free to obstruct the volunteering of their slaves, knowing that they would get the same compensation whether they volunteered or were drafted. Therefore, while I will vote to give compensation in the case of slaves volunteering, I am opposed to giving compensation in the case of slaves drafted.

In this connection I again appeal to history as sustaining the proposed action of the House in employing all classes of people, irrespective of color, in defense of the honor and dignity of the country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question being on Mr. HARRIS's amendment to the amendment,

Mr. HARRIS withdrew it.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "owner of any slave" and inserting in lieu thereof the words, "the person to whom the colored volunteer may owe service." I am opposed to the provision for compensation, in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland, on this ground, that I do not think the interest touched by the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania should have a superior privilege over others. I know that we have been accustomed to see conceded to it a sort of supremacy over other interests. I deny its right to such supremacy. But, passing that by, if we are to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, I wish to have it in language conforming as nearly as possible with the Federal Constitution.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts; not that I understand the amendment very well, nor that I believe it effects much in this matter, but in order that I may say a word on the subject now before the committee. I appeal to the reason of the gentlemen on that side of the House, unless reason has fled, to know why they manifest such a solicitude in this matter. In the States of Missouri, Maryland, Kentucky, and Delaware, the States in which slaves are now held in that portion of the United States subject to the authority of the Federal Government, the quotas to be furnished by them are fixed by the bill now under consideration. What does it matter to gentlemen on the other side what sort of soldiers those States furnish provided they furnish the number asked for? Says a gentleman to me, "Our people cannot consent that the white men shall fight these battles and shed their blood for the country and the flag while there are thousands of black men who can go into the Army and do this thing also."

I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the gentleman from Iowa, and the gentlemen on that side of the House what they have got to do with the matter? If we allow you to put your free negroes into the Army—and I have no objection to your putting them upon your enrollment list—what right have you to insist that our slaves in Kentucky shall be placed upon our enrollment list? You demand from Kentucky a certain number of men for the Army upon this call. We who live in Kentucky say that we have the right to decide who those men shall be. If you are in earnest, if you really desire to raise men to fill our armies, that is the course by which you will accomplish that object. But if you are not in earnest; if you have another and a different object to accomplish, covertly, by the operation of the bill; if you wish to demoralize and destroy the institution of slavery in my State, then the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is a wise one for the accomplishment of that purpose. Sir, I know the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I know him to be a bold man, I know him to be a frank and candid man, and I know this to be his argument; I know that if his simple, sole object by this bill was to raise an army he would admit that the course I have marked is the proper one to accomplish that object.

Sir, I again invoke this House, I invoke their sense of justice, if they have any remaining, if they have not determined upon a reckless crusade upon an institution, which I believe will work the destruction of my country if that crusade is persisted in, I appeal to them not to pass the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I ask it not as a boon. I would scorn to ask a boon from any party in this House, or from the Government itself. I ask it as a right of the people of Kentucky that we be allowed to fix this matter in any way we choose.

If gentlemen from Maryland choose that their slaves shall go into the Army, let them go, but let that question be determined by the State of Maryland as a State. Do not decide by a statutory enactment by the Congress of the United States who shall compose this quota in the State of Kentucky. Let Kentucky decide that for herself.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The amendment to the amendment was adopted.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move to amend the amendment by adding the following:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to any congressional district if the Representative of such district shall expressly ask that the slaves in his district be exempt from draft, letting it fall the more heavily upon the white men.

Mr. Chairman, I do not offer that amendment because I am in favor of it, but with a view of affording those who are opposed to the proposition of my colleague [Mr. STEVENS] an opportunity to put their own congressional districts in such positions as they seem to want them. I can very well understand that if gentlemen were seeking to send only a particular class of men to the war from my district my constituents would object to such a discrimination.

Mr. MALLORY: If the gentleman will make his amendment read "Governor of the State," instead of "Representative" of a congressional district, I will go for it.

Mr. BROOMALL. I cannot do that, because I find that States are divided upon this question. The Representatives of some congressional districts would not want this amendment of mine to apply to their districts, while others would.

I take it for granted those gentlemen who are opposed to the original proposition of my colleague will vote for my amendment, which I have drawn to meet their views. If any man is seriously and earnestly opposed to the original proposition, I present this as an acceptable qualification to him. I do not propose to vote for it myself. My constituents do not require any such qualification, and I may remark that should my amendment be adopted and applied to any district in any State, the voters of that district will have the question before them when the draft comes to be enforced, and they will remember to make a decision in the next election.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have only to remark that I want to see how many will vote for this amendment, because I shall consider it a test as to how many are opposed to the original proposition. I have never found the most sneaky constituent of mine who when he was drafted refused to let the blackest negro in the district go as a substitute for him.

Mr. STEVENS. I am opposed to the amendment. It is not for members of Congress or congressional districts to say what kind of soldiers we shall have. We want to select our own soldiers and get the best. Therefore I am opposed to the amendment of my colleague. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOMALL's amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. WEBSTER. I move to insert after the words "certificate thereof" these words:

The bounty of $100 now payable by law to each drafted man shall be paid to the person to whom said drafted person owes service at the time of his muster into the service of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, one word in explanation of that amendment. The enrollment act of the last Congress put a drafted man upon the same footing as regards pay and bounty as the volunteer; that is, each drafted man was entitled to the bounty of $100. I propose in the case of the slave who is drafted that the bounty shall be paid to the master, provided he is a loyal man, and provided that the drafted slave shall be manumitted by his owner. That is the whole effect of the proposition, and I think that the committee will recognize its justice.

Mr. KELLEY. I rise nominally in opposition to the amendment, but really to answer the question the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] put to me when he was upon the floor. He inquired whether it was the desire that this war should extinguish slavery.

Mr. MALLORY. I made no such inquiry. I said if it were the desire of gentlemen to fill the Army by this bill that it could be as well done without the amendment as with it; but if the House is desirous of demoralizing the institution of slavery then it will agree to the amendment.

Mr. KELLEY. My object is to obtain an army; and not only to demoralize but to extinguish the institution of slavery, because it is right and has become one of the necessities of the country. The President's proclamation having wiped it out of the whole insurgent region, and Maryland, Missouri, Delaware, Louisiana, and Arkansas having determined to extinguish it, its abolition must go over the whole country. Fate decrees it; it is in the order of Providence; and it is necessary to the peace of the country. I am willing that the $300 paid by the northern men for exemption shall be given to the slaveholders of Kentucky and the other border States if they will give us an army of colored men. I tell the gentleman that we desire to work with and not against Providence. With Providence we shall be successful; against Providence we shall be overwhelmed. The just aim of the majority of this House is to adjust the means of bringing the rebellion to a speedy termination—a termination which shall be followed by a lasting and prosperous peace. It will undoubtedly not only demoralize, but extinguish human slavery within the limits of our country. [Here the hammer fell.]

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 67, noes 44.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Some gentlemen would seem to consider this a small matter, and I want to call attention to its magnitude so far as my State is concerned. In 1862 the whole property of the State was valued at $516,000,000. The year before this rebellion broke out, that is, in 1860, the slave property of Kentucky was valued at $107,000,000. Therefore one-fifth of the whole property of Kentucky is included in the subject on which you are now legislating. It is owned principally by women and children, and here is a proposition to take it away from them. For what? Because we have not furnished our quota with the balance of the States? No, sir; that is not the case, because you have not given us an opportunity. To do this at this time would show that you have another motive than to fill the Army of the United States. I put it to the conscience of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] whether he would vote for a proposition of that character?

Mr. KELLEY. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. CLAY. I cannot yield. I want the House to know the magnitude of this subject. We feel that private property cannot be taken for public use without just compensation. We do not deny that it can be taken. You might as well tell me that you have a right to burn a house in the State of Maine, while the army of the enemy is down in Tennessee, and call it a matter of military necessity. Now I am opposed to this whole thing. I am opposed to establishing a recruiting office in my own State. Why? Because it would demoralize that whole population. It will create a civil war among us. It will lead one neighbor to shooting another neighbor; and it will result in compelling the Union men to leave the State. What is the necessity of doing this thing? It will crush out the Union sentiment which is growing up there, and will embrace in its effects the population of the adjacent States. You are in danger of creating a state of feeling which you will never see ended in this country.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I wish to commend to the gentleman from Kentucky—I mean the one who bears the name most honored in that State, [Mr. CLAY]—the philosophy of Macbeth. We are in the midst of emancipation,

"Stept in so far, that, should we wade no more, Returning were as tedious as go o'er."

Suppose that slavery is the defensible institution its friends claim it to be; suppose further that it is a beneficial institution, there will come a time, perhaps, in the progress of the pressure for emancipation by a large portion of the American people when it becomes those most interested in negro ownership to consider whether restoration is not more difficult, more expensive, and more dangerous even, than final abolition. I submit that that time has come already. If abolition was madness at one time it may be good sense and sanity at another. Sometimes it is wisdom to pursue a path upon whose unknown and threatening dangers it were folly to enter. And this may be one of these. We are near the middle of the stream: which shore is nearest and safest?

I have always understood, sir, that with the slaveholders, themselves being judges, there were two conditions to the existence of slavery on this continent: non-instruction to the slave; non-discussion by the white man in localities where it exists. These are acknowledged to be the two safeguards of slavery by the statutes of almost every slave State, where ignorance is commanded to the slave and silence to the white man by penalties which seem to us at the North to be unnecessarily severe. If anywhere the law was at fault the mob supplied the deficiency.

I do not mention these things to complain of them, but only as an evidence of the depth and sincerity of the conviction of the slaveholders that these two conditions are necessary to the safety and prosperity of the institution. Those safeguards have been wonderfully broken down by the necessities of the war. Commencing with the District of Columbia, following around the eastern and southern coast, up the Mississippi, and all along the northern borders, slavery is surrounded by a cordon of missionary schools for the black man. In those schools the slaves of all ages are taught, not only what can be learned from books and charts, but also that they are and of right ought to be free, made so by the laws of God and the President's proclamation, and that it is a duty they owe to God and the President to maintain that freedom. I am not now speaking to justify or condemn those schools. Call it fanaticism if you like; I speak only of the fact.

But there is more—something worse or better, as you please—one hundred thousand of those slaves are in the Union Army, and one hundred thousand more will be there by spring. The Army is a great school in which to learn and to unlearn—to unlearn submission and docility to their masters, and to learn the value of freedom and the power of association and organization to defend it.

When God shall please again to bless the land with peace, shall the negro lay aside his military belt and resume the master's collar? If the country would allow it the master would not. He would as soon introduce to his plantation a person charged with some fatal infection as his former slave filled with anti-slavery ideas and military skill. He might court his industry, but not his demoralized will.

But the other safeguard of slavery, the silence of the white man, is broken also. Discussion has opened in all the border States, and can never again be hushed.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I move to amend by striking out the last word. I desire to call attention to the fact that while we are here discussing a measure clearly and palpably in violation of the Constitution of the United States, oppressive and destructive, the confederate house of representatives is probably this very day discussing measures of peace, reunion, and conciliation.

I repeat that while we are preparing to violate the Constitution—a Constitution which recognizes slavery, which even recognized the slave trade for twenty years—while the Congress of the United States is preparing by its measures for entire and inevitable disunion, the people of the southern States in congress assembled by their representatives are extending the olive-branch of peace.

Mr. SMITH. I desire merely to ask the gentleman—

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I cannot yield. I have risen especially for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee, of the House, and of the country, that there is now pending in the house of representatives of the confederate government a proposition for peace, and is being debated in secret session at this time.

I read from the Richmond Examiner of February 8, three days since:

"The following extraordinary resolutions were yesterday introduced in the house of representatives by Mr. Wright, of Georgia. The house went into secret session before taking any action upon them:

"Whereas the President of the United States, in a late public communication, did declare that no propositions for peace had been made to that Government by the confederate States, when, in truth, such propositions were prevented from being made by the President of the United States, in that he refused to hear, or even to receive, two commissioners appointed to treat expressly of the preservation of amicable relations between the two Governments. Nevertheless, that the confederate States may stand justified in the sight of the conservative men of the North of all parties, and that the world may know which of the two Governments it is that urges on a war unparalleled for the fierceness of the conflict, and intensifying into a sectional hatred unsurpassed in the annals of mankind: Therefore—

"Resolved, That the confederate States invite the United States, through their Government at Washington, to meet them by representatives equal to their representatives and senators in their respective congress, at —, on the — day of — next, to consider, 1st. Whether they cannot agree upon the recognition of the confederate States of America. 2d. In the event of such recognition whether they cannot agree upon the formation of a new Government, founded upon the equality and sovereignty of the States; but if this cannot be done, to consider, 3d. Whether they cannot agree upon treaties, offensive, defensive, and commercial.

"Resolved, In the event of the passage of these resolutions, the President be requested to communicate the same to the Government at Washington in such manner as he shall deem most in accordance with the usages of nations; and in the event of their acceptance by that Government, he do issue his proclamation of election by delegates, under such regulations as he may deem expedient."

In these resolutions may be found the basis of negotiations leading to reunion under the Constitution.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a Government of white men, made by white men, for the purpose of preserving law and order, and preserving the liberties of the people, and for the protection of the States and of the white people thereof, and yet it is proposed by this bill to disregard each of these provisions and requisites; to oppress the white and to elevate the social and political condition of the black race, which, under the Constitution, the Congress of the United States has no authority to do. I desire now to speak directly to the proposed amendment, and to say that under the organic law slaves are property. They have no other status in the Constitution, and, as property, cannot be taken except by giving "just compensation" in return.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Several MEMBERS on both sides of the House proposed that Mr. FERNANDO WOOD should be permitted to conclude his remarks.

Mr. BOUTWELL objected.

Mr. CRESWELL. I do not rise to reply to the remarks just uttered. I admit that I have not the means of information which the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] seems to possess to enable me to speak of what is going on at Richmond, or what propositions the rebel congress may be about to make to this Government. But I propose, with the permission of the committee, to confine myself to a brief reply to my colleague on the other side of the House, [Mr. HARRIS.] That gentleman has said that the two members from Maryland who spoke yesterday are not in favor of doing justice to the owners of slaves, and that he would prefer, as their special representative, I suppose, to submit their case to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] I have not the slightest objection in the world to that. I am willing to unite with the gentleman from the fifth district of Maryland to make an assignment of all the slave interest of Maryland, and to submit the whole question to the tender mercies and grim justice of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRIS. Will my colleague allow me—

Mr. CRESWELL. I cannot give way.

Mr. HARRIS. I have only to say that that is a misunderstanding.

Mr. CRESWELL. The gentleman speaks of injustice to slaveholders in Maryland. I call his attention to the fact that the proposition before the committee, made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and sustained by those on this side of the House, awards to every slaveholder whose slave volunteers the sum of $300. In addition to that, I inform the gentleman that the proclamation of the Governor of Maryland, just published, offers $100 additional to slaveholders for each of their slaves that shall volunteer. These two sums make up $400.

And now I call my colleague's attention to another fact, of which I well know he is already clearly informed. It is that by the sixth section of the eighty-first article of the code of public general laws of Maryland the slaveholders of that State, while they ruled it with a power which the non-slaveholders could not resist, fixed the valuation of slaves, in the following words:

"Slaves shall be classified according to their ages and sex, as follows: male slaves under the age of twelve years shall be assessed at $75; male slaves from twelve to twenty-one at $250; male slaves from twenty-one to forty-five at $400; male slaves from forty-five to sixty at $160; female slaves under twelve years of age at $50; female slaves from twelve to twenty-one years of age at $300; female slaves from twenty-one to forty at $300; from forty to sixty years of age at $100." &c.

By this section of the public general laws of Maryland the slaveholders, while ruling the State, determined that sworn assessors should not put a fair valuation on this class of property, but that it should be taxed on the valuation of it which they themselves fixed. And gentlemen will find that the highest valuation put upon the most valuable class of slaves in Maryland is $400, precisely the same now proposed to be paid to the slaveholder for each of his slaves that volunteers. Is that unjust? We propose to pay them at their own valuation. Never, in the history of Maryland, have slaveholders paid taxes on any slave valued at a higher sum than $400. It is their own assessment, their own valuation, when they were sworn to do justice to all the people of the State alike.

One word more—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD withdrew his amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the committee do now rise, for the purpose of closing debate on this section.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. COX. I renew the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD.] I do so for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to the proposition in the rebel congress referred to by the gentleman, which seems to have been received by the committee with some mistrust and a little levity.

I, too, am opposed to this bill of conscription, because I believe it will fail of execution, because it is unconstitutional, unwise, anti-democratic, and a scheme of involuntary servitude for white men, not authorized by anything in our system of government. I do not believe it will raise the army which you need to put down this rebellion. I have indicated heretofore my plan for raising troops for this purpose.

And while I have always been ready in this House to vote all the money and all the means called for to meet and overcome the armed resistance against this Government—while, after force was arrayed against the Government, I felt it to be my duty to resist it by all the force needed for its suppression—still, sir, as my resolutions and votes demonstrate, I have also been as ready at all times, at every hush and pause of this dread conflict, at every period of decided success to our arms, to meet with favor any tender of conciliation and peace calculated to restore the integrity of the Union and the supremacy of the Government.

Now, sir, this proposition made in the Confederate congress, and debated by them in secret session, is made by Judge Wright, of Georgia, a former member of this House and a firm friend of Judge Douglas. If rightly understood and interpreted it is a proposition of peace and kindness, on the basis of the old Union. Disguised as it is by much verbiage, and hidden under the phraseology which has become common in the South, still it means substantially the return of the South to the old Government when it says, "a new Government founded upon the equality and sovereignty of the States." In the same proposition it is declared that "if this cannot be done"—that is, if recognition of their independence and the formation of such a "new Government" as above cannot be accomplished, they are then to consider—what? Mark how, by seeming to disguise their real meaning, they really express themselves in favor of the old basis. In case they cannot be recognized as independent, they would "agree upon treaties offensive, defensive, and commercial;" meaning clearly that if they do not obtain recognition they are ready to accept under the old Government such an accommodation of our difficulties as will draw us together, politically and commercially, as against all the world. Could we expect more as the initiative of a negotiation for peace, based on Union? To what would not negotiations begun in this spirit lead? Is it not worth the while to make the experiment?

Now I propose to the gentlemen on the other side to meet that proposition. Pass your resolution, either to receive from or send a commission to Richmond. Send the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] who you assert is with the South in sympathy, [laughter,] and if he does not come back within sixty days with a proposition of peace based upon the old Union and the "equality and sovereignty of the States" he will agree to join you in fighting the rebellion to its overthrow. I cannot speak for the peace Democracy, not being recognized as one of them, (for I am simply a Democrat;) but I can speak for the gentleman from New York, who is a representative man of that element, and who sits behind me, that he will in case of failure join you in every proper war measure until the rebellion is ended. Dare you do it? Dare you try this experiment for peace and Union? Will you not hear, will you not receive commissioners with a view to end the horrors of this war and this species of legislation?

Mr. SPALDING. If he will go there and stay I will vote for it.

Mr. COX. I want to know whether gentlemen on the other side are willing to restore the old Union, and whether they are ready to receive such a commission here and listen to a proposition to restore it upon that basis, of State equality and sovereignty? Or are they in favor of still continuing the strife without any effort at conciliation and accumulating pains and penalties until our statute-book groans with them? Are they still determined to make this a war of extermination and of everlasting separation? Will you continue this war for subjugation when there is at least a scintilla of hope held out by the South that they are ready to retrace their steps and return to their allegiance? Have you magnanimity enough, in the midst of our successes and their depression, to stop this piling up of debt and taxation, and to stay the further effusion of blood?

I am for restoring this Union of equal and sovereign States as it was in the peaceful days of the Republic; and if we cannot succeed in that, if we cannot treat with those men on the basis of the old Union and the equality and sovereignty of the States, then after a fair trial of this peaceful remedy, never yet tried, I believe every true man, of whatever name in politics, in the North will be, as when Sumter fell, thoroughly united to fight down the rebellion.

But, sir, you have not tried peaceful settlement. My proposition falls upon sodden hearts. You will not try it. You dare not try it. Your object is not, as at least I infer from the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] so frankly spoken just now, to restore the Union. It is to blot out a domestic institution with which you never had any business, and which was recognized by the Constitution, but which in dragging down, you are dragging down our system of local sovereignties and constitutional freedom. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SMITH. I oppose the amendment. I do not propose, Mr. Chairman, to answer the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio. I am the last man in this Congress to give a vote for any commission to be appointed to treat with the southern confederacy until they have laid down their arms and yielded their submission unconditionally to this Government.

But I desire, upon the question under consideration, to say this, and I call the attention of my colleagues to the fact. It is true, and cannot be denied, that in the Commonwealth of Kentucky, not by any law, not by any proclamation, but by the circumstances of war, the loyal people of Kentucky have lost to a greater or less extent in the property of slaves. My colleague from the Ashland district [Mr. CLAY] was correct when he said that in 1860 the value of that description of property in Kentucky was $107,000,000. It is also true that in the year, or from 1859 to 1860, the decrease in the number of slaves in the Commonwealth of Kentucky was near twelve thousand. But in 1862 the decrease of slaves in that State, notwithstanding the presence of two hundred thousand Federal troops, those men who are charged with stealing negroes from the loyal men of Kentucky, was only four hundred and seventy-seven. Yet, sir, the decrease in the total valuation of the slaves of Kentucky in that period was over $50,000,000. While in 1860 the value of the slaves in that State was $107,000,000, in 1863 it was only $57,000,000.

All that, sir, is true according to the auditor's report which I hold before me; and what is the cause of it? I must repeat again it is not by law, it is not by proclamation, it is not by any interference of the Government with that institution in the Commonwealth of Kentucky, but it is in consequence of war, in consequence of the invasion of that State by rebels, and in consequence of the great outrages committed upon the people of that State. Your people came there from the North at our request to defend us, to preserve our homes and our wives and children. They came there to save us from sacrilege. We received them with open hands; and for the two years that they passed through our Commonwealth we have lost only four hundred and thirty-seven slaves. The decrease of valuation there was some fifty million dollars. Look at this thing not as politicians. It is true, this is the inevitable result of this thing. I believe that the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland is a good one, and I shall therefore support it.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee do now rise.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 66.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MORRIS, of New York, and STEELE, of New Jersey, were appointed.

The motion was agreed to; the tellers having reported—ayes 71, noes 67.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FENTON reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration, as a special order, the bill of the Senate (No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to close all debate on the pending section of the enrollment bill in one minute after its consideration shall be resumed in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HARDING. I move to amend by making it five minutes.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 63, noes 60.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MALLORY. I will make a proposition to the gentleman from Ohio. Let it be agreed that, when we go into committee, my colleague [Mr. HARDING] shall have leave to submit a five-minutes' speech on his amendment, and there will be no further objection on this side.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am willing to agree to that.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. KING. If Kentucky is to have five minutes I want Missouri also to have five minutes on this subject.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that debate be closed in five minutes after the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union shall resume the consideration of the section, so that the gentleman from Kentucky may be heard; and I cannot yield any further.

Mr. CRAVENS demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. MALLORY. Let me make another proposition. I do not want to delay action on the bill, nor, I think, do the gentlemen upon this side of the House. I suggest that the gentleman from Missouri also be allowed five minutes.

Mr. SCHENCK. I agreed at the gentleman's request to let his colleague have five minutes, and it was promised that there should be no farther objection from that side of the House. Here we have them filibustering again. I do not agree to the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri, demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Did the gentleman from Ohio agree to give only five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky? Was not his proposition to give five minutes to this side of the House generally?

Mr. SCHENCK. I made no reference to any gentleman on either side of the House. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] arose and proposed that, instead of debate being closed in one minute, I should move to close it in five minutes, for the purpose of allowing his colleague [Mr. HARDING] to be heard. I modified my motion accordingly, and then I was exceedingly surprised to find that gentlemen continued to delay business.

Mr. MALLORY. The statement of the gentleman from Ohio is correct; but in justice to myself I will say that I did not know any other member desired to be heard. I have voted with the gentleman against those who are trying to postpone action. I must also add that I did not consult with the members on this side, so that my proposition could not be considered as binding upon them.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. That is a very charitable proposition from the Committee on Military Affairs! They have run this bill through pretty much as they pleased. It was very magnanimous of them to grant five minutes.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask consent to make a remark.

Mr. HARRINGTON. I understand that tellers were demanded. I desire to know upon what question?

The SPEAKER. Upon the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Upon what amendment?

The SPEAKER. Upon the motion to limit debate in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SCHENCK. If there is no objection, I wish to say in reply to the gentleman who has spoken of the manner in which this bill has been rushed through the House, that I repel and deny, upon the part of the Committee on Military Affairs, any such suggestion. On the contrary, I appeal to gentlemen upon the other side of the House if there has not been from the commencement a disposition to be liberal, and to allow debate to run on. It is true, we have found it necessary from time to time to stop debate upon particular sections; but never until there had been a prolonged debate upon each particular section, and upon point after point relating in the main to the subject-matter of such section. And this very day we are voting upon the first and the only proposition to amend this one section of the bill, and upon various amendments to that amendment. We have not advanced a line in the bill. And similar was the debate yesterday. Yesterday we occupied more than an hour upon the same amendment we have been discussing today.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKY, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a bill of the House making appropriations for rebuilding the stables of the President.

Also, a bill (H. R. No. 144) to indemnify the owners of the British schooner Glen.

Also, that the Senate had passed an act (No. 51) amendatory of and supplemental to an act to provide circuit courts for the district of California and Oregon, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

CONFISCATION BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to suggest that but two gentlemen upon this side of the House have expressed any desire to be heard—the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARDING] and the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. KING.] Probably if they should be allowed to occupy five minutes each the consumption of time by calling the yeas and nays would be avoided. I am not authorized to speak for this side of the House, but I think that arrangement would be satisfactory.

Mr. SCHENCK. I was about to say when I was interrupted by a message from the Senate, that I have been earnestly desirous of making this a business debate, with a view to have this bill passed as soon as possible, in order to meet the emergency of the times. For that reason, and no other, I have refrained, myself, as far as possible, from indulging in debate; and gentlemen will bear witness that I have confined myself to short explanations of the views of the committee as the different points arose. It has not been done because I did not desire to enter into some of these discussions. I had a strong desire to pitch in a few moments ago, and I mean to exercise that privilege at some future time.

It will take about twenty minutes to call the yeas and nays. Will gentlemen be satisfied with two five-minute speeches upon the other side and two five-minute speeches on this side?

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I will say to the chairman of the committee that a five-minute speech from the gentleman from Kentucky and one from the gentleman from Missouri will satisfy this side of the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. With that understanding I modify my motion and move that all debate be closed in twenty minutes after the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union resume the consideration of this bill.

Mr. CRAVENS. I withdraw my call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I understand that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. KING] desires to occupy five minutes. I do not know upon which side he is.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have already modified my motion so as to give that side ten minutes and this side the same time.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I renew the call for the yeas and nays upon the motion of the gentleman from Ohio.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. FENTON in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of Senate bill No. 36, to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863.

Mr. HARDING. I move to amend the proposed amendment by adding thereto the following proviso:

Provided, That the provisions of this section in regard to slaves shall not apply to the State of Kentucky.

I regret that it becomes necessary, on a matter of such vital importance as this, to plead and plead for even five minutes' time. As my colleague [Mr. MALLORY] very properly remarked, what more do gentlemen desire than that Kentucky shall furnish her proper quota of men and contribute her proper amount of money? It is manifest to every man that this seeks to inaugurate a general scheme of emancipation in the loyal slaveholding States. That can no longer be disguised. Gentlemen are disposed to pass it by as if that was a clear constitutional right. Sir, it is an absolute violation of the constitutions both of Kentucky and of the United States. No man can meet that proposition in argument. From the foundation of the Government to the present time the right to slave property was secured by all the laws, and approved by the Constitution, as much as the right to land was secured. It is a constitutional right in the State of Kentucky to hold slaves; and there can be no system of general emancipation inaugurated under the pretense of raising soldiers except by a plain and palpable violation of the Constitution.

Moreover, sir, slaves have never been regarded as forming part of the military force of the country. They are property. A man in Kentucky holds his slaves by the same title as he holds his land. I defy any man to draw a distinction between the two. The title is as clear to slaves in Kentucky as it is to a man's home and land; and that spirit which will run lawlessly over the one would need but little temptation to run as lawlessly over the other. I beg gentlemen of the Republican party to look back a few years to the Chicago platform, and see what its language was. It was, that the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States, and especially of the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, was essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our system depended. I embodied that same profession in a resolution which I offered a few days ago, and it was unceremoniously laid on the table; seventy-three members on the other side rising and voting to lay it on the table. I deny that there is any constitutional power to wrest a slave from his owner, either by taking the slave as a volunteer or as a conscript. You have no right to do it even though you allow compensation. You cannot inaugurate emancipation in that indirect way. The President has disclaimed, and the Republican party has again and again disclaimed, all power to do so. And yet now it is proposed to violate all these pledges, to trample under foot this platform, and with it the Constitution of the United States, in order to bring about emancipation by a wholesale system of robbery. Do you propose to take the loyal man's slave at a fair valuation? No, you propose to take him by conscription, to take him by an arbitrary process, and to fix his price by the same power. It amounts to nothing but robbery. It is a mockery of justice. The highwayman might as well seize my horse and take him from me, and then offer me a pittance.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HIGHY. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment. When slavery fired on Sumter it left the Republican party of the United States without a platform. That is the answer to the gentleman's speech. To my mind the whole argument on this question is clearly in advance of our action. The Government of the United States as a national Government recognizes no such institution as members have been talking about for the last two hours. When the national Government goes out into the States for men to assist in fighting the battles of the country, it knows no such institution in reality or in argument. Every single recognition of such an institution is a concession to it.

Now, sir, I put one distinct proposition to answer all these arguments. If the States were at peace with one another, and if we were at war with a foreign country, some of the States might find it difficult to fill their quotas to an army of the size that we are now demanding. Some members upon this floor, or some States upon this floor, have at least one Representative of this species of property about which they talk. When they come to take their slaves and count them five for three white men, I think they will find they have more than one Representative upon this floor who is representing what they call property.

Well, sir, you will say the Constitution recognizes this. Very well; then you may imagine that for instance a dozen men in some State may own slaves enough to entitle them to a Representative here in Congress; and yet, when the Government goes into that district to get soldiers to fill up our armies, it must depend upon those twelve men alone to supply the quota of the district. Suppose the quota for that district, for instance, is twenty thousand men, are those twelve men all you may call on to fill their quota?

I think if gentlemen will look at this matter in a practical way they will see that, with that construction of the Constitution of the United States, you will be prevented from raising the men you require to fill up the armies of the Union.

Sir, in my judgment, the Government may properly go into every State and every district and take men to fill up its armies, no matter what the color of their skin. They cannot properly, in my judgment, take the white and leave the black men; but the enrollment should include all able-bodied men throughout the country.

And why should these States which are clinging to this institution be made an exception to the general rule that has to be complied with in all the free States? Sir, this whole opposition is but the cry that there is more in this question of property than there is in the Union. When men come here to contend for such a proposition, they place this question above the Union itself. I have no confidence in such men, I care not how loud they may proclaim their unionism, when they place a mere question of property above the Union.

Mr. KING. I propose to amend by adding the following at the end of the section:

Provided, No slaves shall either be recruited or drafted in any State which has passed an ordinance of emancipation: Provided, however, That this shall not prevent any master or owner of a slave, by the consent and agreement of said slave, from putting him into the United States military service, and as a consideration for which the master or owner shall release any further claim to the service of said slave.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I have no expectation that this amendment will meet with the approval of a majority of the House, but I have felt it my duty to offer it, and upon it I propose to say a few words about the peculiar circumstances in which Missouri is placed in connection with this subject.

No State in this Union has made or will make so much sacrifice upon the altar of her country as the State of Missouri. It was demanded when there was no sentiment in the State at all that could control such a proposition that slavery should be abolished in our State. It was urged that that would be a means of the restoration of the Union, that so long as the institution remained in the State the Union could not be restored.

The slaveholders of my district, owning according to the last census twenty-nine thousand slaves, agreed to sacrifice the last one upon the altar of the country, if that could be instrumental in bringing again peace and a restoration of the Union. It would have been very easy for them to have said, "We will not pass an ordinance of emancipation," and it would not have been done. It could not have been passed except with their consent. But they acceded to it, and upon what ground? Upon the pledge, implied certainly, if not positive, made upon the floor of the convention which passed the ordinance of emancipation, by the provost marshal general of the department of the Missouri, himself an able and honorable man, and who would not have made a pledge unless he thought he had authority upon which to make it, that if the ordinance of emancipation was passed they should not be molested in their slaves, but the owners should be allowed to possess them in quiet for the time allowed by the ordinance. He himself proposed that we should emancipate them in six years. Every other proposition was thrown by, and under that pledge our State agreed to emancipate her slaves in six years. Yet, sir, right on the heels of that action, we were not treated with that courtesy with which they treated Kentucky. They sent recruiting officers through our country, not only to the military headquarters, to invite the negroes to come, but they sent men round to the plantations and into the houses of the negroes, telling them they had got to join the Army; that if they did not they would be drafted into the Army and get no bounty, while if they volunteered they would get $300 bounty; all such talk as that. In that way they are taking all the able-bodied negroes, and leaving only the lame, the halt, the blind and helpless in the hands of the people. Is not that injustice? Is not that a wrong upon the people of Missouri? I offer the proposition, and I do not know whether it will be agreed to or not.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HARDING,] who last occupied the floor, and the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HARRIS,] who spoke some time before, said that slaves were recognized and guaranteed as property by the Constitution of the United States. I desire, categorically, to deny that assumption as a point of law. The Constitution of the United States never recognized a slave as property. He is property, not by law of the United States, but by the laws of the respective States. The Constitution of the United States treats him as a person, and only as a person. Slaves go to increase representation. Direct tax is required in proportion to numbers, and slaves are counted; and the provision which prohibits the exclusion of emigrants prior to 1858 authorizes Congress to tax them as persons not exceeding ten dollars. They are directed to be surrendered up when they shall have fled from service. They are there treated as persons, and not as property. They are property by the laws of the States. If gentlemen say that the local law of a State can so change the relations between men that it can exempt them from the military service of the United States they place the existence of the United States at the mercy of the subordinate law of the States. The States have only to declare that every wife shall own her husband, and every parent his son, and the Government is stripped of everybody that can be subjected to military service.

The gentleman spoke of robbery. Sir, the advocates of slavery should seek some other term of reproach. Its origin was in robbery, and if time and law have sanctioned it, they have not obliterated its historic origin.

When the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HARRIS] says that he looks for justice rather than the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] than from the two gentlemen from Maryland, I desire to say that I owe no justice to the slaveholders of Maryland. They began the war—who will triumph I think events now show. When he speaks of justice, allow me to say that they have assessed their slaves at $14,000,000, and we are now told that we are depriving them of property to the value of $30,000,000 to $40,000,000. Before they speak of justice, let them return to the treasury of the State the amount out of which they have plundered it. Then they can deal in imputations of robbery and injustice.

I think that we have reached a fair, reasonable, and equitable settlement, and I have contributed to the best of my ability, as every one in this House knows, to its attainment. I want to smooth the roughness of the transition from one condition to another. I have done more than I owed them, and I will do no more.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I want to make a short reply to the gentleman who has just spoken. I am not surprised at the position that he has taken. He has declared that he owes no justice to the slaveholders, that they have been his opponents. Does the gentleman take the position that because they have been opposed to him—

Mr. SCHENCK. I call the gentleman to order. Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I was about to say—

Mr. SCHENCK. I call the gentleman to order. Mr. HARRINGTON. I call the gentleman from Ohio to order.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would inquire of the Chair what the order of the House was?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that after the twenty minutes were exhausted, debate should be closed in one minute.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is entirely contrary to the understanding, and gentlemen over the way know it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was not paying strict attention to the action of the House, and he will call upon the Speaker to state what the action of the House was.

Mr. COLFAX. The first proposition made was to close debate in one minute, the usual way of stopping debate. Upon that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] moved to amend by increasing the time one additional five-minute speech. After some debate upon that, suggestion was made for ten minutes. Subsequently a suggestion was made for two more speeches, and the motion was finally put to limit debate to twenty minutes; giving four five-minute speeches. That was the understanding of the Speaker, and that was the way the motion was put.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I fully concur in the statement of the Speaker of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Such being the action of the House, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HARRIS] is not entitled to the floor.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, by striking out "$300," and inserting "$500."

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The amendment offered by Mr. STEVENS was agreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I offer the following, to come in as an additional section after section twenty-seven:

And be it further enacted, That this act shall not be so construed as to authorize substitutes for drafted persons to be procured from men already in the Army.

Mr. HARDING. I rise to a point of order. The Chairman omitted to take a vote upon the amendment I offered by way of a proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair put the question to the House, and it was rejected by a very emphatic majority. The Chair is sustained in his recollection by the record at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. In reference to my amendment I will say that, in the fourth section of this act, which was passed over very hurriedly by the committee—no amendment being proposed at the time—there seems to be an implication that drafted persons may procure substitutes from the Army.

Mr. STEVENS. Your amendment applies to persons "already in the Army." But suppose their terms shall expire. If the gentleman will adopt the words "while in the Army" it would be very well.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have no objection to that. The object of the amendment is to prevent the Army from becoming a recruiting field for substitute brokers—a state of things which would be demoralizing to the Army itself. I modify my amendment by adopting the word "while" in place of "already."

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I do not understand the object of that modification.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It is to prevent substitutes from being obtained among men who are in the Army at the time.

The amendment, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. MALLORY. I move to amend by adding a new section to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It is proper to state here that a new section cannot be added to the bill until after the twenty-eighth section—the last one of the bill—is read. The gentleman can offer his amendment as an amendment to the twenty-seventh section, but not as an independent section.

Mr. MALLORY. My amendment is a forlorn hope, anyhow, and I will offer it as an amendment to the twenty-seventh section.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Provided, That the right is hereby reserved to the States respectively to commission the officers to command the men enrolled and drafted into the service of the United States under the provisions of the bill.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. KERNAN. Is it in order to move an additional section here, to come in after the twenty-seventh section?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

The Clerk then read the twenty-eighth section of the bill, no further amendments being offered to the twenty-seventh section.

Mr. WEBSTER. I move to amend the twenty-eighth section of the bill by striking out the words "so much" and inserting the words "sections nineteen and twenty," and by inserting after "1863" the words, "and so much of said act," so that it will read:

Sec. 28. And be it further enacted, That sections nineteen and twenty of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved on the 3d day of March, 1863, and so much of said act as may be inconsistent with the provisions of this act, is hereby repealed.

The sections to which the amendment refers are those which provide that whenever a regiment of volunteers shall be reduced to half the maximum number prescribed by law, the President may direct the consolidation of the companies of such regiment. Under these sections, which I propose to repeal, promotions are virtually stopped in regimental organizations. Whenever the number of men in a regiment is reduced below the minimum, which is about eight hundred, there can be no promotion made to the colonelcy if it be vacant; and whenever a company is reduced below the minimum there can be no promotion to a second lieutenant. The practical effect of this is that there are now scarcely any promotions among the field and line officers in the Army. That takes away one powerful motive for distinction and for the display of gallantry which actuates soldiers. That motive is the desire for honorable promotion. I have a letter here from a distinguished officer in the army of the Potomac. He is a lieutenant colonel, and is at present commanding a brigade. His regiment was reduced at the battle of Fredericksburg below the minimum of eight hundred, and from that day to this no sergeant in it could be or has been promoted. He himself is lieutenant colonel, although the Governor of the State issued a commission to him as colonel just after the battle of Gettysburg, for his gallant conduct there.

I appeal to the committee that when it is offering all these bounties to volunteers it repeal these two sections which take away from men in the field that reward for meritorious services which they should receive. There is to-day scarcely a regiment in the army of the Potomac in which, if it lose its colonel by death, promotion, resignation, or any other cause, the lieutenant colonel can be promoted to the colonelcy. I have myself left in command of the regiment with which I have been lately connected as gallant and able an officer as can be found anywhere, a lieutenant colonel commanding upward of six hundred men, and who has been commissioned as colonel by the Governor of Maryland, who yet cannot be mustered in as such, because of the orders of the War Department founded on the sections I wish to repeal.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland. If the object of this bill were to encourage or regulate promotions it might be well to adopt the amendment; but if its object be, as it is, to get men into the ranks the adoption of the amendment would be a mistake. The best way after all to secure promotion for these officers is to give them plenty of men to command. Then they will not be cut out of their promotion in consequence of the diminution of companies and regiments. While the operation of this rule may have been hard in some cases it has in the main had a good effect. It has allowed the cutting off of a lot of bad material from the Army. I know that it has done much good, although in some cases it may have worked hardship. But by filling up the Army as we propose to do under this bill, promotions will go on as before.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield to my colleague on the Military Committee.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I wish to say a word in addition to what the gentleman from Ohio has said. I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland for the additional reason that the fact that promotions are not made where regiments are reduced below the minimum is in itself a very strong inducement for the officers of regiments to procure recruits.

Mr. WEBSTER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him how can officers in the field do anything to fill up their regiments?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I think there has been no time within the last twelve months when regiments in the field have not had the opportunity of sending home recruiting parties to fill up their ranks. If these sections were repealed the result would be that in all the departments of the Army there would be hundreds of skeleton regiments, reduced perhaps to two or three hundred men, with a full corps of officers—colonel, lieutenant colonel, major, captains, and first and second lieutenants—while there would not be enough men to make more than two or three companies. The practice of the Government is not to muster out the officers when the regiment falls below the minimum, but to let the colonel receive his pay, until by death, promotion, or otherwise the position becomes vacant.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WEBSTER. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I do it simply for the purpose of making one or two suggestions in answer to the distinguished members of the Military Committee who have addressed the committee. If these two sections are repealed as my amendment proposes it will then be left discretionary with the Secretary of War whether officers shall be mustered into regiments which are below the minimum or not. The proposition is that if, for instance, a regiment has seven hundred and ninety men, the Secretary of War may in his discretion permit it to have a colonel. If a company has seventy-nine men he may in his discretion determine to allow a second lieutenant to be mustered in; but if, on the contrary, a regiment has not more than two hundred men and a company not more than fifteen or twenty men, in his discretion he might then decline to permit new officers to be mustered in. It will prevent hardships from being imposed upon gallant officers in the field.

I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SPALDING. I renew the amendment, and I desire to say in support of it that I approve highly of the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. WEBSTER,] and I oppose the views presented by the gentleman representing the Military Committee on this question.

I have seen some little of the workings of that law, and I believe its direct tendency is to do injustice to the gallantry of our Army. Why, sir, when a regiment is decimated upon the field of battle, will you not allow the gallant men who remain the poor compliment of promotion? Will you not give them the poor pay of promotion for the risks they have run? Will you not rather compel the Government to fill up their wasted ranks and allow promotion to go forward notwithstanding they have fallen below the minimum in numbers? There are vast numbers of regiments, some of them the most distinguished for gallant service and heroism, who have fallen below the minimum in numbers, and who cannot have a promotion from corporal to second lieutenant simply because the number falls one man, for instance, below the minimum.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that this law operates injuriously to the service, and that it strikes a death-blow to the heroism of our gallant men. I ask that this provision of the law shall be repealed.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The amendment submitted by Mr. WEBSTER was agreed to.

Mr. KERNAN. I propose the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That whenever the President of the United States shall call for men for the military service of the United States by virtue of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and of this act amending the same, the several States of the Union shall be allowed and have twenty days, and such further time as the President may grant, from the time when the Governors thereof, respectively, shall be officially notified of the quota of his State and of the several districts thereof under such call, to furnish said quota of men to and for the military service of the United States; and no draft shall be had under or by virtue of said acts except for the deficiency of such quota at the expiration of said twenty days or such further time as may be granted by the President; and then the draft shall be had in each district for the deficiency of its proportion of said quota.

Mr. Chairman, I had drawn this section giving a longer time than twenty days between the official notifications to the Governors of the States and the draft, within which they might furnish their quotas if they were able and willing; but with the belief that the President would be wise enough, if at the expiration of the twenty days a State was proceeding successfully to fill up its quota, to extend the time, and wishing to make the proposition as reasonable as possible I have limited the time to twenty days, so that if the section should become a law the Governors of the States would have twenty days within which to fill their quotas, and if at the expiration of that period the President did not extend the time the draft would then take place.

Now, sir, it seems to me the experience we have had during this war is such as to demonstrate the propriety of this section. The States have been patriotic and successful in furnishing volunteers, while the draft has hardly been so successful as to make it a remedy unless in the last resort.

Now in the State where I live, the State of New York, between April, 1861, and the 15th of December, 1863, we have furnished two hundred and ninety-two thousand nine hundred and eighty-two men. Of these, two hundred and thirty thousand four hundred and forty-two were mustered in for three years. The residue of the thirty thousand one hundred and thirty-one were mustered in for two years; thus making two hundred thousand and odd men for three years mainly, the rest being for two years. Never prior to the conscription act did the State fail to fill its quota. My proposition gives the opportunity to do it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to insert after "States of the Union" the words, "if in the judgment of the President it be consistent with the public service." I wish to say that with that limitation it seems to me that the amendment will be in better shape.

Mr. KERNAN. It only gives twenty days. My suggestion is to go on preparing for the draft, and if this stimulant be allowed you will never have a draft.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think that a section like that would be considered directory on the President, and, unless in a great emergency, he would follow it. I think that we ought not to tie him down to the provision; that, however great the danger or emergency, these twenty days should be allowed.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

ENROLLED BILLS.

The committee informally rose.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 144) to indemnify the owners of the British schooner Glen, and an act (H. R. No. 225) making an appropriation for rebuilding the stable at the President's; when the Speaker signed the same.

CONSCRIPTION—AGAIN.

The committee then resumed its session.

The question recurred on Mr. KERNAN's amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 55, noes 63.

Mr. KERNAN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KELLOGG, of Michigan, and KERNAN, were appointed.

The amendment was rejected; the tellers having reported—ayes 68, noes 72.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I move to add the following as a new section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That any person who, for the purpose of procuring or aiding in the procurement of a substitute under the provisions of this act, or for the purpose of procuring or aiding in the procurement of any volunteer for the service of the United States under any call or requisition of troops by the President of the United States, makes any false statement or representation in writing, or any affirmation or oath in respect to the age of the proposed substitute with the intent of procuring the acceptance of a substitute or volunteer who by reason of his being under the age of eighteen years is legally disqualified from the military service of the United States, or who by reason of his being between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one years is disqualified in the absence of the consent in that case required by law, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction before a court of competent jurisdiction, be subject to a fine or penalty of not less than $250, nor more than $1,000, and to imprisonment or commitment until such fine or penalty shall be paid: And it is further provided, That any person who, with the intent of procuring the acceptance of a substitute or volunteer, shall falsely represent himself as the father or guardian of any minor proposed as a substitute or volunteer, and shall in such assumed character give the assent required by law, such person so offending shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction in manner before provided, be subject to a fine of not less than $500, nor more than $1,000, and to commitment until such fine shall be paid, and in addition thereto to such imprisonment, not more than six months, as the court shall direct.

Mr. Chairman, I offer this section with the intention of remedying an evil of which great complaint has been made. That complaint has existed in my district. I know that it has existed in other districts in New York. I suppose that it is general. I have known of numerous instances where infants have been taken without the parent's consent, produced before boards of enrollment by recruit brokers, enlisted, and placed upon the list of volunteers and sent into the service of the United States. I know of instances where the infant was over eighteen and under twenty-one, and required the consent of his parent or guardian, and where persons who had never seen him before have come forward and entered themselves as guardian or parent. Through these instrumentalities fraud has been perpetrated upon the Government and upon parents; and the section I have proposed is to remedy the evil.

Mr. WHALEY. I move to amend the amendment by adding the following:

And be it further enacted, That the troops of African descent enlisted under this act shall be organized into companies, battalions, and regiments of their own color, and shall be commanded by white officers.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Is the amendment germane? I make the point of order that it is not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WHALEY. I now offer my amendment as an additional section.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order at this time. The question is upon the section offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DAVIS.]
